
The SECRETARY. The next amendment is to strike out from line three hundred and forty-seven to three hundred and fifty-two, as follows:

And the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Ogdensburg, New York, shall be applied, under the direction of the engineer department, on such dredging at Ogdensburg as will be most beneficial and advantageous to the existing commerce.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following proviso from line three hundred and sixty-eight to three hundred and seventy-two:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power, after one week's notice to the public, to sell and convey any real estate no longer used for light-house purposes, the avails of such sale to be paid into the national Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out line three hundred and eighty-eight, being in the following words under the appropriations for the revenue-cutter service:

For commutation for quarters, $5,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why is that struck out? Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Commutation of quarters the committee understand not to be applicable to this service. It is a new principle, as the committee supposed, applicable to this service. That commutation applies only to the Army, and has never been extended beyond it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I only wanted to understand it. I did not know why the clause was put in myself.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines four hundred and four and four hundred and five, in the following words:

For fire-proof vaults for depositories, $25,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if he has any information about that, if he knows that the appropriation is not necessary?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, Mr. President; we had not. We acted upon this presumption: no appropriation was made for this item last year, and the committee had no information that the service had suffered for the want of it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is there an estimate for it?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There is an estimate for it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should suppose it might be necessary in some cases. The depositories of the public money where they have not buildings specially erected for the purpose, but hire tenements, may require vaults. I should think it very doubtful whether it would be wise to strike out the appropriation, and I should advise that it be retained. It must have been put in for that purpose. There are several depositories which occupy buildings that are not fire-proof, not erected for that purpose, and the Government might suffer very great loss by fire if there were not fire-proof vaults. I should advise the committee not to strike out that clause unless they have investigated it thoroughly.

Mr. GRIMES. We did not know anything about it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The committee had no decided information about it. It was not appropriated for last year; but it will be seen from the nature of the item that it can be hardly expected to be an annual appropriation. All that my colleague says about it may be true, and very likely is true, but it was stricken out simply because the committee had no special information on the subject and found that it was not appropriated for last year. If the Senate should take a different view of it the committee can have no objection.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was to strike out from line four hundred and six to four hundred and nine, in the following words:

For fuel and miscellaneous items for custom-houses and other public buildings belonging to the United States under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury, $40,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know why that is stricken out. Is it not a customary appropriation?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir; the facts in regard to this item are the same as in regard to the previous one. We had no special information on the subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is it estimated for?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It must be necessary unless it is provided for elsewhere.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I believe the impression of the committee was that appropriations are usually made for the public buildings specifically, and this seems to be a general item for fuel and miscellaneous expenses for the custom-houses and other buildings belonging to the United States under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury. That I suppose would cover all the public buildings in the country. It was a little difficult for the committee to understand precisely what an item so general in its phraseology really means. If my colleague has special information on the subject so as to render it absolutely certain he perhaps can advise us better.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no special information; but it is perfectly obvious to anybody who has any knowledge of the subject that all this must be provided for, especially fuel, and unless the appropriation is found in some other bill I should think it to be necessary.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not think it is in any other bill.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was to insert after line four hundred and twenty-five:

For post office and court-house at Columbia, South Carolina, $75,000: Provided, That the site for the same shall be given to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line four hundred and thirty-two, to insert:

For custom-house at Portland, Oregon, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line four hundred and thirty-four:

For construction of court-house and post office at Des Moines, Iowa, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. At the end of line four hundred and twenty-one there should be printed an amendment which has been omitted. Although it was adopted by the committee it is not reported in the printed bill. I therefore move to amend the bill by inserting at the end of line four hundred and twenty-one this proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General are hereby authorized, with the assent of the State of New York, to exchange a part or a whole of the point at the southerly extremity of the park, now the property of the United States, with the city of New York for an equal or greater amount of land further up said park, with public places on the northerly and southerly sides of the lands so acquired: Provided, That no money shall be paid for such exchange.

Mr. CORBETT. I do not exactly understand that. I should like to have an explanation.

Mr. CONKLING. Perhaps I can make an explanation to the Senator which will satisfy him. A site for a post office has been acquired by the Government in the city of New York. The precise position of that site is at the lower extremity of the park, so that the post office would be quite adjacent to the public streets. It is not a very good situation in the park, and there is or there may be a willingness to allow the building to be located a little farther from the union of those streets, a little further up the park. The effect of this amendment is to enable the Secretary of the Treasury and Postmaster General to exchange the land which has been bought for the same or a greater quantity of land in the same park, but withdrawn a little further from the point of the park, so as to give a little more space around the post office building.

Mr. CORBETT. The same quantity?

Mr. CONKLING. The same or a greater quantity.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert after line four hundred and forty-one:

For purchase of building known as "The Club House," at Charleston, South Carolina, and the fitting up thereof for the use of the United States courts, $46,000, or so much thereof as may be required; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make such purchase and fit up said building for the said purpose, provided the same can be done at an expense not larger than the said $46,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line four hundred and fifty-one, to strike out "fifteen" and insert "fifty," so as to increase the appropriation for court-house and post office at Portland, Maine, to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line five hundred and sixty-three, to insert:

And such construction shall be given to the joint resolution No. 30, approved 25th April, 1862, as shall not abridge the grant under the act of June 3, 1856, for a railroad from Fond du Lac northerly to the State line, and the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Company may select their lands along the full extent of the original route of said road as filed under the said act.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to hear some explanation of this amendment. I do not understand what it means.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe,] who drew the amendment, for the explanation.

Mr. HOWE. This amendment was drawn by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and it was drawn to meet a difficulty which I will state. In 1856 Congress granted to the State of Wisconsin and several other States lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads. The road to be constructed in Wisconsin was a road from Fond du Lac northerly to the State line. The State located that road from Fond du Lac around the west side of Lake Winnebago down on the Fox river as far as Appleton, and then struck due north to the State line, the Secretary of the Interior having decided that that word "northerly" required the location of the road as near a due north line as the geography of the country would permit. The lake obliged the State in locating the line to deflect from a due north line to the west until they got down below the lake, and then they struck the due north line at a place called Appleton, on the Fox river. From there the road was located due north right through the wilderness. They went on and built on that line until they got to Appleton, but the line as located carried the road away from the harbor at the mouth of Fox river. The people in the interior of the State wanted to get to that harbor and the Legislature petitioned Congress to allow the location of the road along the river and bay; and in 1862 this act was passed:

"That the word 'northerly' in the first section of the act entitled 'An act granting public lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of railroads in said State,' approved June 3, 1856, shall, without forfeiture to said State or its assigns of any rights or benefits under said act, or exemption from any of the conditions or obligations imposed thereby, be construed to authorize the location of the line of railroad in said first section provided for upon any eligible route within ranges sixteen or twenty-three inclusive east of the fourth principal meridian."

That allowed them to build down the river.

"And the line of railroad as now located, according to the records of the General Land Office in pursuance of said act, is hereby authorized to be changed to within the above specified limits: Provided, however, That upon the construction of said railroad upon the new line, or of a sufficient part thereof, according to the terms of said act, the State of Wisconsin, its grantees or assigns, shall receive upon the route originally located and in the manner prescribed by the act the same quantity of lands, and no more or other, except as hereinafter provided for, as it or they would have received if such railroad had been constructed upon the line originally located."

The provision "hereinafter" made is a provision giving the State eighty acres out of the military reservation at the mouth of the Fox river, through which the new location of the road was made. They were to have the same amount of lands on the old line, and no more or less, with the exception of that eighty acres, as if the road had been built on the line first located. That provision was made because all the lands on the new line had been purchased and were then owned along that line, and no lands could be had. They have gone on and built the road down to the mouth of the river. I drew this act myself, and my intention was to give the company the same amount of lands per mile that they would have if they built the old line; but the north line of the State runs from the northwest to the southeast, so that on the new line they struck the State line in a less number of miles than on the old line. The Commissioner of the General Land Office, when this act came to be submitted to him the other day for construction, came to the conclusion that all the lands the company could have would be the quantity there was on the old line south of the point which the new line would cover if swung right around on to the old line.

It happens that the lands on the south end of the line first located for a long distance are almost all purchased and were at this time. Within the first twenty miles there are but forty acres of land secured, and within the next twenty miles there is but very little, and in the whole distance they get but a very small quantity of land. Upon stating to the Commissioner what my purpose was in drawing the act the Commissioner was satisfied that he had made a mistake in the construction of it; but the Secretary of the Interior could not see his way clear to change the construction, and so I have been obliged to come to Congress. This amendment was drawn by the Commissioner of the Land Office himself for the purpose of enabling the State to have the same number of acres per mile of road to be built which she would have had if she had built on the old line, that being, as I supposed, the express declaration of this act, as I know it was the express purpose with which the act was drawn.

Mr. HARLAN. I will inquire of the Senator how many acres per mile they would be entitled to under the law if this amendment should be adopted?

Mr. HOWE. A quantity equal to one half of six sections in width on each side of the line of the road. They will not get that whole quantity because there is not that quantity. That is what they would have been entitled to if that amount of land was on the line.

Mr. HARLAN. If the amendment be adopted the company will receive no greater quantity than six sections per mile.

Mr. HOWE. They will not receive that. That is all they would have been entitled to if the lands were all in the market and were unsold.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not suppose it is possible to have this amendment understood in the Chamber, though I believe I understand it; but I should not if it had not been considered in the Committee on Public Lands, of which I am a member. The only objection that can be raised to it is that in changing this route you propose to take the lands on the old route and appropriate them to building the road on the new route. The only injustice that I have thought could be urged against that was this; the even-numbered sections on the old route were settled with the understanding that they were to have a railroad, and I suppose they have made their improvements and bought their lands and paid for them with the expectation of having a railroad. Now, if Congress allows the road to be changed and the odd-numbered sections to be taken to build a road elsewhere I have thought it would, perhaps, work hardship to those settlers who have bought with a view to a road.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to suggest that the act which I have read was passed while the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] was chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and that very difficulty was provided for at the time.

Mr. POMEROY. What was provided for?

Mr. HOWE. The settlers were allowed—

Mr. POMEROY. To change their locations?

Mr. HOWE. Those who had taken lands on the old line were allowed to enter without any further payment anywhere within the Menasha land district in the State of Wisconsin an additional quantity of public lands subject to private entry at $1 25 an acre equal to the quantity entered by them at $2 50 an acre, so that the lands originally entered by them should thus be reduced to the rate of $1 25 an acre.

Mr. POMEROY. That might make it equal or it might not; it would depend very much on the kind of land they were able to get. I do not care to make any particular opposition to this proposition; but it is a change of the location of a road, which is generally against the public interest and against the settlers on the line.

Mr. HOWE. It was against the interest of the settlers, but they never made any remonstrance, and in point of fact there were very few of them who purchased lands on the old line after the location of it, and they never have made any remonstrance, and the road is built on the new line.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator from Wisconsin, who knows more about the facts than I do, is willing to take the responsibility of passing this proposition I will not object, though I am rather opposed to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out the proviso to the appropriation for gas for lighting the Capitol and President's House, in line six hundred and eighty-two, as follows:

Provided, That no greater sum than $2 80 cents per one thousand cubic feet shall be paid for the gas for which this appropriation is made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line six hundred and ninety-seven to seven hundred and one, as follows:

For the purchase of a portrait of the late President Abraham Lincoln, to be placed in the Executive Mansion, $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary. Provided, That said portrait shall be selected by the incoming President of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line seven hundred and three, to strike out "two" and insert "one;" so as to read:

For improvement, care, protection, and repair of seats and fountains in the Capitol grounds, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line seven hundred and sixteen, to strike out after the word "education" the words "in some institution to be selected by him;" so as to make the clause read:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to provide for the education and maintenance of such deaf and dumb of the District of Columbia as cannot command the means to secure an education, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line seven hundred and twenty-six to seven hundred and thirty, as follows:

For the purchase by the Secretary of the Interior, for the agricultural and economical purposes of the institution, one hundred and fifty acres of land, more or less, with the buildings thereon, lying directly east of the present grounds of the hospital, $23,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line seven hundred and thirty-four:

For the Sisters of Mercy in Charleston, South Carolina, in recognition of their services toward Union prisoners during the late rebellion, $20,000.

Mr. WILSON. It seems to me that $20,000 is a large sum for such a purpose. I would suggest that we put it at $10,000, unless there is some very special reason why we should vote this large amount.

Mr. SAWYER. I desire to say a word in reference to this amendment. These ladies, as is well known to a very large number of the soldiers of the Army, were untiring in their devotion to the wants of the Union prisoners in Charleston. Where there was sickness and suffering among our men they were busy at all times in administering to their relief. Month after month, I may say year after year, these good women were at the hospitals in attendance upon the sick, carrying delicacies and the necessities of life; and there is no question that they saved the lives of large numbers of Union soldiers in that city. I do not say that it is incumbent on the United States to pay these ladies for services which their religious vocation impelled them by a sense of duty to perform; but I do say that if there are persons who are deserving of recognition at the hands of the United States Government for service of that kind it certainly is these ladies. I hope the amendment will be adopted. I wish to move a slight addition to the amendment, to insert in line seven hundred and thirty-seven after the word "dollars" the words "to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. POMEROY. If this appropriation is to be made, some one ought to have the responsibility of the disbursement. It is not a corporation; they have not boards of contractors; and some public officer should be charged with the responsibility of the disbursement. I do not know who is the proper officer—there should be some one.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not understand why an appropriation of this kind should be made. I have no recollection of ever seeing an act of Congress appropriating money heretofore as a gift to people in recognition of their services. Here are ladies whose whole vocation in life is to administer to the wants of the distressed and the sick and the wounded and the afflicted; and we are called upon now to make a gift to them of $20,000, not to reimburse expenses that they have been put to, but in recognition of their services toward Union soldiers which their profession and vocation in life and the vows that bound them in their sisterhood required them to render toward all persons who stood in need of their charitable services.

All over this country, wherever the sick and wounded soldiers were found, there were bands of charitable women. Are we to begin with them in detail and go through and make donations of money out of the public Treasury to them in recognition of their services? If not, why single out the Sisters of Charity or of Mercy in Charleston, South Carolina, as the special objects of the benefaction of this Government for those services?

But, sir, what better claim have they to recognition for their services than the thousands of volunteer Union women of the country who went into the hospitals and into the camps and wherever the sick and wounded soldier was found and rendered their service without fee or reward, without the obligation of a religious vow, purely out of consideration for their suffering brothers and fathers, purely out of patriotism for the country that was in peril and in defense of which those fathers and brothers were wounded and sick and dying? Shall we make no recognition of their heroic and motherly and sisterly service in that dark hour of the Republic, but pass them all by, martyrs, as many of them were, and pass by the orphan children of those martyred mothers, and give to this institution which is supported already by other funds and is under obligations by its vows to minister to the wants of the afflicted everywhere? Sir, I object to this singling out of one institution among the many of a similar kind, and selecting out one set of Sisters in this country to the utter exclusion and neglect of the thousands of other sisters who went as these did to minister to the wants of the sick and the wounded and the dying. If this amendment is passed I shall call for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. SAWYER. I did not desire to debate this amendment; but I wish to say one word in reply to the honorable Senator from Missouri. It is in evidence before the committee of the Senate that the orphan asylum of which these Sisters of Mercy have the charge was completely destroyed during the bombardment of the city of Charleston; a large and valuable structure capable of accommodating two or three hundred orphan children was ruined so that it has since that been entirely untenanted. We are well aware that they cannot come before the Congress of the United States and ask remuneration for the destruction of a building in the city of Charleston during that bombardment; but we submit that when these women were attending our sick and nursing our wounded at the very time when those walls were being battered down by our missiles of war it is becoming in the United States to recognize the services of these women to our sick and wounded soldiers.

They do not come here and make a claim for the destruction of their property; for they know full well that such a claim could not be recognized; they come here and make no claim at all; but the loyal soldiers of our Army, our generals and our colonels and our privates, ask for them that they shall be recognized by the Congress of the United States as having that merit in the actions which they performed there. I know that it is their vocation to exercise this mission of charity; but I know, on the other hand, that they were in a community almost the whole of which had its sympathies enlisted on the other side, and that they were made the medium of large charities which passed through their hands and which would not have reached our prisoners but for their kindly offices. Large numbers of them were continually engaged in this labor of love, and while I admit as much as the honorable Senator from Missouri does that their vocation called them to these deeds, I submit, in view of the loss of property by this institution, it would be graceful on the part of the United States, it would be just on the part of the United States, and it could not form a dangerous precedent on the part of the Congress of the United States to grant to them this slight gratuity.

Mr. NORTON. I understand the basis of this appropriation is, that during the progress of the war and the military operations in front of the city of Charleston the building or the asylum of these Sisters of Mercy was destroyed. Whether it was the result of the inevitable prosecution of the war or military operations in that locality is not material. Their building was destroyed, and this appropriation is proposed to be made to them in some measure to compensate them for what they lost. I do not understand it to be urged as a claim; I understand it to be simply a charity. They make no claim. They do not urge that their property was destroyed, and for that reason they should be compensated in the way of an appropriation for an amount sufficient to make them whole. I understand it to be simply a gratuity.

I must express my surprise at the course of the Senator from Missouri on this question. I am well aware that he has often told the Senate, and through the Senate, the country, that he has no sympathy and no charity for any of those who aided, as far as their facilities allowed them, the rebellion. He will not relieve their disabilities. He will do nothing except to impose upon those people what he seems to assume to be the burden of their transgressions. But I cannot forbear expressing my surprise that that Senator on this occasion, when we have before us a mere matter of charity, should bring his political prejudices and hatreds, aye, sir, his malice, to the consideration of the question.

Sir, it is a fact that these Sisters of Mercy ministered to the wants of Union soldiers and Union prisoners just as they did to all others suffering. They knew no creeds, no religions. Can it be possible that the Senator from Missouri supposes that they made distinctions because of creeds and religious beliefs? I know what has been done, and I need only suggest it for the Senate to remember what has been done in the State of Missouri, and especially in the city of St. Louis, upon the subject of religious creeds and beliefs. But there is no suggestion of that sort in this case. These Sisters of Mercy saw our Union soldiers suffering and in want, and they came in the spirit of Christian charity to their relief. They did relieve them; and of all those who ever came within the reach of those Sisters, no one has ever suggested that they withheld a cup of water or a piece of bread. They went among our prisoners and ministered to their wants and sufferings. They come here now and ask—they make no claim, but they ask as a gratuity, and appeal to the charity of Congress to make them whole for what they lost, not because of what they did for Union soldiers and Union prisoners, but because by the inevitable accident of the war they lost their building, and it cannot be repaired. They come and ask a gratuity, and they say to the Congress of the United States, "because we did this for your soldiers, for your prisoners, for your wounded in the war, give us this as a matter of charity." Sir, what sort of record will it make among the records of the nations of the world if it should be said that this great Republic of ours turned its back upon those who had ministered to its suffering and needy soldiers and said to them, "We have no sympathy and no charity for you."

Sir, this is not a claim. I do not support it in any sense as a claim; but it is a simple charity. Shall I be told that the Government of the United States has no charity; that it may not in proper cases and under proper circumstances extend its charity? I believe we have the power to do it, and that in this instance, whatever other cases may arise, if the Government of the United States owe a charity, if they owe gratitude, if they should feel grateful and should express it, they should make to these Sisters of Mercy this small compensation of $20,000.

Mr. HOWARD. The claim which is now under discussion has once been before the Committee on Claims of this body, if I recollect rightly, as a claim for compensation, presented by the ladies who go by the name of the Sisters of Mercy, I think. The committee considered it in the light of an ordinary claim presented by persons resident within the territories of the rebellion, and they rejected it. If I recollect rightly such is the report of the committee, although there may be no written report furnished to the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Yes, there is; here is a copy of it.

Mr. HOWARD. I hold in my hand the report of the committee on this subject. They say:

"Among the papers is a letter from George W. Williams, of a firm of grocers and bankers in Charleston, addressed to Hon. H. McCulloch, February 27, 1867, strongly appealing to the more favored people of the North for assistance in behalf of the orphans as well as those who have them in charge. This letter is earnestly indorsed by Hon. William Aiken, George S. Bryan, United States district judge, and General R. K. Scott. It should be observed, however, that this letter and its indorsements were rather intended to appeal to the sympathy and charity of our citizens generally to whom it might be presented than to Congress. To the consideration of individuals the case presents great demands for liberality and generous treatment.

"The committee, however, are compelled to examine the petition in a different attitude and to decide whether the United States can be properly held to make reparation for all damages sustained under similar circumstances. They reluctantly conclude that the petition comes within a class of cases where justice to the nation must deny relief."

Then it goes on to lay down the principle upon which it is recommended by the committee to be rejected. I concurred in that report of the committee, and I am of the same opinion still. The Sisters of Mercy were the occupants of a building which seems to have been destroyed by the fire of the Union artillery at the bombardment of Charleston. Of course I will not undertake to state positively who was the real owner of the property thus destroyed, but according to the usages and the ecclesiastical laws of the Roman Catholic church the title of the property was not in the Sisters of Mercy, but in the bishop of the diocese, under an ancient decree or rather usage of the Roman Catholic church, which prohibits any layman to own church property within the diocese. I fancy it will turn out that the title of this property is in the bishop of that diocese. That, however, is not a very material circumstance in the case. This property, like any other property, was exposed to be destroyed by the operations of war. Its destruction became an inevitable necessity, and it met with the same fate that many and many a residence met in the bombardment of Charleston and at other places where the war was raging; and for one I cannot, except under extremely peculiar circumstances, give my consent to make any reparation for the destruction of such property. This item in the bill, although at present it passes under the engaging and enticing name of a charity, is nothing but a pecuniary claim for indemnity for the destruction of that property.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the honorable Senator to give way that I may offer a resolution with the general consent of the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. I do so with pleasure.

THANKS TO PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the present Congress will close to-morrow at noon. Before we separate I feel myself personally and I feel that the Senate has a debt to pay its Presiding Officer. I therefore ask leave, with much real satisfaction, to present to the Senate a resolution which I will send to the Chair to be read, and I hope that the Senate will receive it in the same feeling that prompts me to offer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. THAYER in the chair.) The resolution will be read. The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate are due, and they are hereby tendered, to Hon. BENJAMIN F. WADE, for the ability, impartiality, and justice with which he has discharged the duties of Presiding Officer of the Senate during the time he has occupied the chair.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask general consent to be allowed to make some reports. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report back the bill (H. R. No. 2023) to amend an act entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," approved July 20, 1868. This bill came to us to-day and was referred to the Committee on Finance. The committee have given it the most careful consideration, and advise, on account of the importance of the subject and the provisions contained in it, that no action be had at the present session owing to the want of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will lie on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 474) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to admit free of duty a certain submarine telegraph cable, to report it back without amendment. It is precisely similar in effect to a bill reported some days ago from the Committee on Finance, and if there be no objection I ask to have it passed now. An objection as a matter of course will throw it over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the joint resolution now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information if we are to act upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on taking it up for consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before that question is put I want to know what the resolution is, and I ask that the body of the resolution be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read at length.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to deliver to the Western Union Extension Telegraph Company the submarine telegraph cable made to form a part of the overland telegraph line to unite the United States with Russia and Great Britain, intended to be laid in the Behring's sea, without the payment of customs duty thereon.

Mr. NYE. I will state to the Senator from Ohio that I desire to offer an amendment to that resolution before it passes.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator really objects to its consideration it must go over.

Mr. NYE. I do not want to object to its consideration, but I desire to amend it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator will not add anything to it. It will inevitably defeat the resolution. If there is any objection to it it ought not to pass.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It will have to be laid aside.

Mr. CAMERON. I object to the passage of that resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, it cannot be considered.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask leave to make a report from a conference committee. The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Post Office appropriation bill have directed me to make the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1808) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from their first amendment.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu thereof "$100,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

ROSCOE CONKLING,
ALEXANDER RAMSEY,
GARRETT DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
F. C. BEAMAN,
JOHN A. NICHOLSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 476) for the payment of Caleb S. Hunt and J. Willis Menard, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had appointed Mr. J. G. BLAINE, of Maine, one of the managers of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1803) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, in place of Mr. F. C. BEAMAN, of Michigan, excused.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 2006) to establish certain post roads;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 327) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit the duty on certain meridian circles; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 475) for the appointment of Thomas A. Osborn as manager of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, to insert after line seven hundred and thirty-four the following:

To the Sisters of Mercy in Charleston, South Carolina, in recognition of their services toward Union prisoners during the late rebellion, $20,000.

Mr. HOWARD. I had nearly finished my remarks when I gave way to the Senator from Kentucky, and I will detain the Senate but a moment in what I have to say. I trust that I know how to appreciate the services of the ladies interested in this claim; but, sir, it is not to be forgotten that their profession is the doing of good to persons in distress, the poor, the sick, the naked, the destitute. To this object they are by their profession devoted. They are set apart for those purposes. They are as much, however, subject to the control of their ecclesiastical superior, the bishop of the diocese, as are any other of his subordinates; and I apprehend that although we may make this gratuity, as it is called, to them personally they will derive no benefit from it whatever. It will be to them no compensation; but the fund, if it should be thus appropriated, will be applied according to the direction of their ecclesiastical superior and to such purposes as he may see fit to apply it to. The question would be somewhat different if the money which we are called upon to appropriate was to go into the pockets of these devoted women. I suppose, however, it will not.

Now, sir, I am unwilling to make a distinction between the Sisters of Mercy or the Sisters of Charity, ladies belonging to the Roman Catholic church devoted to these deeds of well-doing, and other ladies belonging to Protestant churches at the North and at the South who have evinced an equal spirit of devotion to the country and to the offices of humanity and of Christian kindness. There are all over the country thousands and thousands upon thousands of those devoted ladies who in our hour of need gave their services, and many of them their fortunes, their healths, and their lives to the cause of the country who have not come forward here to ask any such plausible recognition as this on the part of Congress, but whose services, compared with those rendered by members of the Roman Catholic church, certainly are equally meritorious and, in my humble judgment, incalculably more meritorious to the cause of the country. I think the truth demands of me to state it here in my seat.

Mr. President, I have not forgotten, I do not think you have forgotten, and I know that the people of this country have not forgotten, the famous circular letter addressed by the Pope of Rome to the Roman Catholic bishops in the United States in the year 1863, when the war was flagrant, when our cause in Europe was regarded as almost hopeless, appealing to the Roman Catholic bishops of the United States to see to it that peace was restored between the two sections of the country; and what did that mean as used by his Holiness in his circular letter? It meant nothing less than this: that they were to see to it that peace was brought about upon the principle of a recognition of the independence of the southern confederacy—an object toward which he was persuaded undoubtedly by the secret emissary established at his court by the confederate government. And after that event, so potent, so influential upon the minds of the members of that communion, we saw but very few enlistments from that church. We had to go forward and offer large bounties in order to fill up our armies, to recruit them, and to make headway against the rebellion. It is not too much to say that, with a few most honorable and brilliant exceptions, the whole influence and power of the Roman Catholic bishops of this country and of the Roman Catholic priesthood was brought to bear against the cause of the Union, not to say in favor of the rebellion. These Sisters, whatever may have been the character of their acts, and I am not here to question their character, belong to that same communion; while the Protestant churches of the North throughout almost unanimously were devoted, heart and soul, hand and purse, to the prosecution of the war for liberty and the preservation of our nationality. Here are some staring facts which ought not to be forgotten or thrown out of sight. I see nothing meritorious in this claim at all, and I shall therefore feel compelled to vote against it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am very much surprised at the attack which the Senator from Michigan has thought himself justified in making upon one of the churches of the country. I do not agree at all with his statement of fact. To the extent of my observation it was not true that there were but few enlistments in the Army from the members of the Catholic church. On the contrary, I observed the fact that there were very many in the State of Indiana. How it was where the Senator is I do not know.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator will allow me, what I said was that after the publication of the circular letter of the Pope there were very few enlistments from that communion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, there were influences during the war that made enlistments difficult, and to secure enlistments high bounties became necessary, and those bounties were received and demanded by men of all churches and men who belonged to no church at all. So far as that is concerned it was common to all. The Senator is not sustained by the facts in the charge that he has made, that there were not enlistments on the part of that church. He is not sustained either in regard to the conduct of the clergy of that church. They are not to be charged as he has stated, for I recollect very well that the most distinguished churchman of the Catholic church, Archbishop Hughes, went as a representative of that church, perhaps as a representative in some sense of the Government of the United States to Europe, to exercise his great influence in behalf of the cause of the Union. I believe that he was called upon by President Lincoln to go upon that mission, and I have always understood that to him and to Bishop McIlvaine, of another church, and some others maintaining the like relation to the American society and the American churches, the country was under very great obligations for an influence felt in Europe. So that the charge made by the Senator from Michigan, as I think, is not sustained at all by the facts.

But, sir, the only difficulty that presents itself in this case, as I think, is this: that property which is destroyed in battle, whether the property of the enemy or the property of the supporters of the Government, is not to be paid for. That is the general proposition; and the proposition is absolute in regard to individuals of the enemy's country as in a war between independent nations. But I think that doctrine ought not to be applied or need not be applied to the case of a charitable institution destroyed. Among nations a charitable institution would not be regarded and could not be regarded as a public enemy. I suppose that if a great Power were to conquer a country and in the progress of the war had destroyed one of the institutions of charity it would not be inconsistent with the duties of that nation in taking possession of the resources of the country conquered to restore that charitable institution. While we would not at all think of making up to individuals the losses sustained in the war, it would seem to me very proper to restore an institution of charity which had fallen under the prosecution of the war, for the reason that an institution of charity cannot be regarded as an enemy. Its nature forbids it; its mission forbids it.

Now, Mr. President, this institution, worth more money, as I understand from the Senators from South Carolina, than the appropriation proposed, was destroyed during the bombardment of Charleston. I understand, as suggested by a Senator near me, that the institution was worth twice the amount that we propose to appropriate. What was that institution? The Senator from Michigan says it was owned by the bishop. I do not know who owned it and I do not care who owned it. It is enough to know that the little children, who are to be protected by men with hearts in their bosoms, of all nations and under all circumstances, that little orphan children without fathers to care for them, the children of the State, were fed and clothed in that institution. It was not established, it was not maintained, it was not continued for the purpose of giving aid to the military power of any section; but it was maintained, by whomsoever owned, for the purpose of feeding and clothing little children; and he and that Government that provides for the orphans has God's blessing. It is not unbecoming the Government of the United States, when in the dreadful casualties of the war a charitable institution like this has fallen, that it shall help to rear it again. It is proper for the reason that it is a charity. We do not bestow charities by appropriations made by Congress, but we may restore that which the prosecution of the war has destroyed.

Now, let me ask the Senator from Michigan this question: if we were making war upon a foreign Power, and in its prosecution necessarily we should destroy the home of the orphans and we were to take possession by conquest of that country, appropriating its public property, appropriating its treasure, appropriating its public resources, what obligation would rest upon us as a Christian people? The obligation to restore that charity, because in regard to it we would then assume the relation that the conquered Power had before occupied in relation to it?

Mr. HOWARD. Does the honorable Senator refer to the laws of war as practiced between nations, and does he rest the obligation of which he speaks upon that law? If he does, then I must take the liberty of saying that in my opinion he is mistaken; that the law of war would not require us to perform any such obligation, if it exists; that is, to rebuild any such property or restore it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not say that the laws of war imposed it as a duty. I said that it is not forbidden by the laws of war and the usages of war. It is forbidden, as we understand and practice the laws of war in this country, to restore private fortunes that are lost during the war by its immediate prosecution; but I say that the laws of war do not forbid that the conquering Power taking possession of a conquered country shall restore an institution of charity which has fallen in its prosecution.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not say that the laws of war forbid such a restitution at all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir; the laws of war do not forbid it. The laws of war not forbidding it, the law of charity, Heaven's law, God's law, requires it. We have destroyed in the necessary prosecution of this war an institution of charity. It is not forbidden by the usages of this country and the laws of war that we shall restore it. The persons who had charge of that institution did not give their efforts in favor of the cause of the South. On the contrary, according to the evidence before the Senate, they gave their endeavors to the extent of their ability to relieve the suffering of the soldiers of the North while in that city.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the honorable Senator point to the evidence that is before the Senate of that fact?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I refer to the speech made twenty minutes ago by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. SAWYER,] in which he stated as a fact that the charitable kindness to our soldiers of these Sisters saved the lives of very many of them. That is the evidence to which I refer.

Mr. DRAKE. If the honorable Senator will allow it now I will present evidence directly to the contrary; and if he will not allow it now I will do it when he gets through.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator can do it when I have closed my remarks. I do not care about having two speeches going on at once. I have referred to the statement made by the Senator from South Carolina. He is acquainted with the facts, and has made his statement. Then these Sisters, as I claim the fact to be, upon the statement of the Senator from South Carolina, have extended their kindness to the soldiers of the United States. There is no question of loyalty or disloyalty involved. It is a question of a destroyed home of the orphan, destroyed in the prosecution of the war, destroyed in the taking of a city which it became necessary, in the prosecution of the war, to capture. Shall we make this appropriation of $20,000? I do not care whether that charity in its legal ownership belonged to the bishop or belonged to the Sisters. There is no question that the institution was used properly for the highest purposes, and it is not for the individual benefit, when it is restored, either of the bishop or of the Sisters; it is for the benefit of the orphan; and being consistent with the laws of war, and required by the laws of charity and kindness and morality, I choose to respond to the appeal that is made.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not look at this subject in a sectarian view or desire to invoke those feelings and prejudices. I look upon it as a proposition to take so much money out of the Treasury, and as guardians of the Treasury the question for us to determine is whether it is our duty to vote it or not. Now, this is either a legal claim against the United States or it is a gratuity. It is not both.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator will allow me, the committee put it simply on the latter ground, that it is nothing more nor less than a gratuity.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But the Senator from Indiana puts it partly on the one ground and partly on the other. It is either the one thing or the other. Is it a claim against the Government to pay for the bombardment of property in Charleston, of all places in this world for a legal claim to come from? The Senator says that we are not forbidden by the law to pay for the destruction of institutions of charity. Neither are we forbidden by the law to pay for private property. The question is whether there is any obligation of law upon us to pay for either in enemy's country.

Then the Senator from Indiana plays with that word "orphan;" and a man must be very callous whose heart does not make some response whenever that word is mentioned; but I would remind the Senator that within the last ten days the Committee on the Judiciary, on an appeal being made to the Senate to vote money for the orphans of the soldiers who were killed at Gettysburg, for institutions which are there established, not sectarian in their character, felt it their duty to report and advise this Senate not to make the appropriation. As to its being a gratuity, all I have to say on that subject is that if we enter upon that line of gratuities we enter upon a line which has no limit; for there is not a State in the Union, there is hardly a neighborhood at the North, that has not had similar institutions to promote the welfare of the patriotic soldiers of this country; but they never have thought of coming here to ask the Government to reimburse them for their charity. Why should we not make an appropriation to the Christian Commission, to the American Bible Society, to the Tract Society? Why not to the hundreds of nurses and surgeons and chaplains who went voluntarily to the field? Mr. President, this war has been a weight upon the nation; it has furrowed the whole land with graves; and the people now groan under the burden of taxation; and I trust that that which was done in charity will remain a charity, and that they may seek their reward from that source from which they expected to receive it, when the charity was performed.

Mr. SAWYER. I beg to call the attention of the Senate to this fact: that in the southern States during the war a whole race of people were taken from the protection of those who had before that cared for their animal wants; that the nation, looking at their condition, passed a law, called them the wards of the nation, and appropriated immense sums in charity to those men; that the whole southern land was spread over with the charities of the United States to those people, who had become in a certain sense orphans; and that here we have the amplest precedent for a charity of this kind. In this case the orphans were turned out of house and home upon the world, and their guardians deprived of the power of protecting them by the accidents of war, while those guardians at that very time were ministering to our wounded and sick. When the honorable Senator from Missouri denies that they were the means of saving the lives of our own soldiers I point him to the testimonials of General Scott, General Sickles, General Sherman, and other distinguished officers of the American Army, whose names are all appended, not to this claim, for these ladies make no claim; not to any petition to Congress that they may be reimbursed for the loss of their property; but those officers do petition Congress that the services of these ladies may be recognized, and that they may be put in a position again to do that charitable work which the accidents of war have taken from them the power to do.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think a plain statement of this case will show very clearly that it ought not to be considered by the Senate of the United States. The papers came here more than a year ago. The Sisters of Mercy started upon a mission to procure aid from the North, and obtained letters from various individuals with that view. They started out for no other purpose. But when they reached Washington some kind friend, rather than put his hand in his own pocket and contribute, advised them to come to Congress for relief. That was the character of the papers which were referred to the Committee on Claims; and being considered by the Committee on Claims, the case was unanimously reported against. It seems that these Sisters of Mercy had a building in Charleston for the instruction of orphan girls and a residence for themselves, both of which were more or less damaged during the bombardment of that city. The Government, through its officers then stationed there, repaired their dwelling-house and made it complete again. Such was the evidence that was before the Committee on Claims.

Now, Mr. President, if this claim is to be allowed as a gratuity or in any other form, why cannot the owners of any school-house or of any church in the city of Charleston, or in any other spot that has been destroyed by the armies of the United States, come forward with equal grace for a gratuity on the part of Congress? I do not understand that we are the almoners, the dispensers of the charity of the people of the United States. If there is any charity to be bestowed let us put our hands in our own pockets.

Mr. POMEROY. I listened to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Michigan, and remember to have seen the circular letter to which he has referred; but the effect of that letter in the section of country in which I live was entirely different from its effect as represented within the knowledge of the Senator from Michigan. I saw that that letter, counseling peace and pursuing the things that made for peace, had very little effect in deterring our adopted citizens in my State from entering the Army. We have in the West, in my own State particularly, a large class of adopted citizens, and we have found that by dealing with them in the most cordial and liberal manner they responded with equal cordiality and liberality. We do not proscribe them. They are citizens when they arrive in the State for all practical purposes. The moment they declare their intentions to become citizens and take the oath they enter upon the public lands and have all the rights of native-born citizens. They can go directly to the ballot-box if they have been in the State six months or a year, and they are required to have no papers except their first declaration of intention, and they are eligible to office. And I will say that during the struggle we had on the frontier we had no more cordial supporters from any section than from our adopted fellow-citizens of the Catholic church.

Living in eastern cities I imbibed early prejudices that other men had there; but when I saw that we had in the Army, and in every way where citizens were called upon to act, a larger proportion of adopted citizens than we had of native born, my prejudices began to vanish. In this war to which the Senator refers the people of every nation under heaven fought, bled, and died together. The Swede, the Norwegian, the Irishman, the German, the African, all nations mingled in this conflict and fought out here the liberties of mankind.

I would not approach this subject in any sectarian or narrow spirit. These are American citizens from choice, not from necessity. The Senator from Michigan and myself were born here, but we could not help it. There is no great merit in being born where you cannot help it. We could not avoid being American citizens. But there is a class of men among us who are Americans from choice, who have seen the struggle on this continent to establish a civil government for mankind and a government of freedom and liberty, and who longed to identify themselves with us in the struggle, and they have left home and country and fatherland, and they are American citizens from choice and not from necessity, and I as much honor him who chooses to be an American as I do him who is obliged to be.

I know that this is somewhat foreign to the subject before us, and I will close my remarks, as I see the chairman of the committee is anxious to take a vote, by saying in response to what the Senator from New Jersey has said that I will not stop doing a charity to one class because I cannot do it at the same time to all classes. I know there are others equally meritorious. I have read and seen tales of suffering and trial and sorrow and destitution that I would gladly alleviate, and with the Senator from Vermont would gladly have put my hand in my pocket to alleviate; but this case is one, and providing for one is no hinderance to providing for many. I have thought myself that if this appropriation was confined to $10,000, as we appropriated for other institutions, it would be perhaps within the reach of those appropriations we usually make; but because we cannot provide for every case why should we say we will turn a cold shoulder upon this one? I should favor this proposition more cheerfully if it was reduced to $10,000.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The fact stated by the Senator from Vermont as to the action of his committee in my judgment goes for nothing in this debate. Of course the Committee on Claims could only report to the Senate bills where there were legal demands against the Government, but I understand this case is put upon grounds somewhat different from those of a strictly legal demand, which, if you sent it to the Court of Claims, would be enforced there under the principles of general law. I say, then, the fact that the Committee on Claims did not report this appropriation to us in my opinion goes for nothing in this debate. It does not touch the ground upon which this case has been placed before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then, if a claim should be rejected by the Committee on Claims, all the party has to do is to approach the Committee on Appropriations and ask for a gratuity.

Mr. BUCKALEW. He would have to do a great deal more. He would be compelled to obtain the assent of the judgment of that committee, which is somewhat difficult, for so far as my experience and observation go that committee is habitually rigid in money matters.

But what I rose to speak upon was this: the Senator from Michigan has intruded into this debate—and I use that word in no unkind or offensive sense—a topic which I observe introduced into proceedings of public debates always with regret. He has alluded to one of the churches of the country, and has pronounced from his point of view a criticism upon it, upon its spiritual head in another part of the earth, upon its leading officials in this country, and to some extent, by way of inference at least, upon the great body of its membership. Now, sir, I always deprecate discussions of this kind. I think that in this country we should sedulously avoid them upon all occasions where our convictions of public duty will permit. The effect and the influence of debates of this sort, in my judgment, must be pernicious, always tending, as they do, to inflame the dormant passions of our people, to produce bitterness, heart-burning, ill-will, enmity, and all uncharitableness among them; and especially must this effect be produced when these words proceed from this place and from a Senator so distinguished, so widely and favorably known, as the Senator from Michigan.

What was the letter of the head of this church to which the Senator has alluded? Why, sir, it was nothing more than a general invocation to peace. It was nothing more than putting into form a principle of the Christian religion, a thing done often before by those who preceded him in his great spiritual office, directed not to the people of the United States, but to the people of other countries who at various times have been engaged in civil convulsions, and who required advice and counsel looking to peace and the cultivation of the arts of peace.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania tell me whether he himself and the Roman Catholic church and priesthood, including of course the Pope of Rome, holds it to be immoral or irreligious or improper for the Government to defend its existence against an armed rebellion? Is there any principle in the Christian religion which forbade the loyal part of the people of the United States to defend their Government when attacked by traitors? I do not understand that there is any such principle.

Although I would deprecate as much perhaps as the honorable Senator the introduction of any sectarian topic into our discussions here, I referred to the letter of the Pope of Rome, addressed to the bishops of the United States, impressing it in very strong terms upon the bishops to exert their influence in their various dioceses in favor of peace in the United States. At a moment when we were, as the French say, aux prises with the rebels, when it was not perfectly certain that we should succeed in overcoming the rebellion, at a moment when the darkness was the thickest, when discouragement was the greatest; at a moment which was the most uncertain of all the hours of the rebellion as to our final triumph; at that particular critical moment the Pope of Rome, a foreign potentate with whom we were at peace, exercising, as the honorable Senator knows, an influence next to Omnipotence over his subordinates and over his people, came forward and invoked, commanded the American bishops to see to it that peace was restored; a recommendation which had in contemplation nothing short of a cessation of the war and a recognition of the confederate States as one of the independent nations of the world—a matter in which the Pope of Rome, I will undertake to say, had no business to intermeddle. It was on his part an act entirely unfriendly to this Government, and entirely gratuitous, performed in complete hostility to this Government and to the principles of liberty upon which it rests. If this be introducing sectarianism into our discussions here I have only to say that I take the responsibility as an American Senator and as a free citizen of the United States, fearless of the Pope of Rome or any other foreign potentate or any other people, to indulge in the expression of it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I did not assert that good morals or religious principles require a nation to suffer itself to be torn to pieces, to suffer revolt in its limits to go unchastised. No such thing has been asserted by me, nor was any such doctrine or idea contained in the letter of which the Senator from Michigan complains. I was about to say, when the Senator interrupted me, that the letter about which so much has been said was addressed to the dignitaries or officials of the church, not in the northern States alone, but in the States of the North and South both, in all parts of the United States—an invocation to cultivate the spirit of peace, directed just as much to the men who were engaged in rebellion against us as it was directed to the men in the North who were putting forth efforts to subdue that rebellion; and it would be just as legitimate for a confederate of the southern States who admitted the authority of the confederate government over him to complain of interference from abroad as for a citizen of the North to make such complaint in connection with this letter. He might say, "You ask and invoke us to cultivate the spirit of peace; to do so far as the circumstances of the case will permit, the works of peace; to pray for and labor for its return in this country. What does that mean? It means that we shall lay down our arms; that we shall submit to Federal power; that we shall give up this revolt upon which we have entered; that we shall take back over us the dominion of that flag against which we have raised our arms; that we shall give up a struggle upon which we have staked everything that is dear to man as a member of a social community; and what business has the head of the church in a foreign country to address us in that manner?" Why, sir, such language from the South, from the adherents of the rebellion, would have had just the same logical force that the language of the Senator from Michigan now has, directed to the same quarter, and pronouncing a criticism pari passu with that, exactly similar to it, only coming from a different source.

Sir, the voice of the Christian church speaks impartially to all peoples in time of war and in time of peace. Its mission is peace. The mission of its founder was peace; and amid the very storm of war, when human passions rage over a country and deluge it with blood, it always speaks to them in the same language, which, though but a still, small voice, has power to reach the human heart, to operate upon human conduct and to restore again, when war has disturbed nations, that normal condition of peace in which the nations rejoice, which is their crown of glory and the security of their happiness and of their advancement in all the arts of progress and civilization.

Sir, I tell the Senator from Michigan that he speaks from too narrow a position. This letter was not written by a citizen of the United States. It was not written by one who owed allegiance to our Constitution and laws, as a citizen who was bound to take part in the struggle as an active partisan either by his voice or by his arms. It was from an ecclesiastical authority in another country, standing impartial, so far as regarded our struggle here, not bound to have an opinion upon the political aspects of it, and who had none, or at least expressed none in the letter which the Senator from Michigan criticises; who from his standpoint could address both parties to the struggle, or rather could address those who held his own faith, who believed his own doctrines, who acknowledged his spiritual supremacy, his advisory power in both sections of the country, and call back their attention amid the very storm of the conflict to those great principles, true and benevolent always, upon which the salvation of nations and of man depend. He did that. He did no more. Although I have no sympathy with his church, no communion and no connection with it, although my ancestors fled from persecution abroad in which that church was implicated and came to this country as to an asylum and a refuge, nevertheless I speak the words of justice in its behalf when assailed here, and when I think it is against public policy, against the fitness of things, against the truth of the case for the Senator from Michigan to rise here and attempt to raise and inflame the passions and feelings that exist among our churches. It was to perform that duty that I rose.

One word, sir, as to this amendment. I am indisposed to vote for it as it is presented here. I think the appropriation is rather large. I should like it to be put in a somewhat modified form, so as to conform to the argument which has been made in its behalf. If it be so changed I will vote for it. However, I shall not enter into a discussion of the amendment. I have, so far as I could for the moment, attempted to do my duty to a great principle of toleration, which is fundamental, which is necessary in this country, and which we must maintain in Congress and out of it if we are to live together a united and happy people.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if he will not permit this amendment to be passed over for the present for the purpose of enabling me to offer an amendment in which my State is interested? I make this appeal to the honorable Senator from the fact that my colleague is not well this evening and must necessarily leave the Senate Chamber in a short time, and it will be necessary for me to be absent, perhaps, for some hours on account of the duty imposed upon me by the Senate to serve on a committee of conference. If this amendment could be disposed of by the Senate it would enable my colleague to retire, and enable me to discharge the other duty assigned me.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If it will take no time and can be done by general consent I have no objection.

Mr. HARLAN. I hope it will not take any time. It ought not to.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is it?

Mr. HARLAN. An amendment that I desire to offer to this bill to come in under the head of "miscellaneous."

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to know what it is before I consent.

Mr. HARLAN. It will take no more time here and now than it will after awhile.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for information.

The Secretary read as follows:

For reimbursing the State of Iowa for expenses incurred and payments made during the rebellion, as examined, audited, and found due the State by General Robert C. Buchanan, commissioner, under the act of Congress approved July 25, 1866, §229,848 23.

Mr. SHERMAN. That will evidently take time. I think we had better finish the pending amendment. I think it is rather extraordinary, in the first place, to introduce a claim of this kind while an amendment is pending.

Mr. HARLAN. I think it is not extraordinary for the Senate to accommodate its business to the duties of its own members. Several members of the Senate will be compelled to withdraw to serve on a conference committee. I am one of those. I should regret to be unable to offer this amendment. I feel it to be a duty that I owe to the State which I in part represent, and I have already stated that my colleague will be unable to remain much longer in the Chamber on account of ill health.

Mr. ABBOTT. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa whether this amendment has been submitted to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. HARLAN. It was offered yesterday and referred to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the consideration of the amendment?

Mr. ABBOTT. I object to it.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not understand that one objection carries it over.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us have a vote on the pending amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope we shall have a vote on the pending amendment. This is not a claim. This is not presented here as a claim. It is simply a gratuity. It rests simply on the idea, in the minds of the committee, to say the least of it, that these Sisters of Mercy, so described in the bill, had rendered meritorious services; that they had rendered a great charity to the soldiers of the country, and that while they were in the performance of that charity the Government, whose soldiers they were nursing and caring for, destroyed their property. Now, they come here not as claimants, for they have been elsewhere as claimants and they have been told their claim does not rest in that principle of law which we are bound to recognize. If the Senate of the United States say this is not an obvious gratuity, then I ask them to vote and simply to say that, and we shall be content; for these people are not here urging this as a claim in any sense whatever. All I ask is for the Senate to vote upon it; and if I had the power to do it I would withdraw it, but I have not. If the Senate intimate their sense that it is not a safe and proper thing to do give to either $10,000 or $20,000 in this case, let them so vote; but I beseech the Senate to vote. I ask the Senate just to say whether this is a proper thing or not. Now, let us have a vote.

Mr. DRAKE. Not yet.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I wish to add a few words in support of the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations. It seems to me so obviously just and proper that I must express my surprise at the opposition that has been made to it in the Senate. Here is an institution devoted to the care and maintenance of orphans in the city of Charleston, under the charge of the Sisters of Mercy, who, according to the evidence presented, performed many acts of kindness to the Union prisoners in that city. During the bombardment of the city the building was almost destroyed. General Sickles, when he was in command at Charleston, would have had the building repaired, but upon an examination it was ascertained that it could not be repaired, it having been so much injured by the shells of our forces. The Sisters of Mercy now ask to have their building restored in order that they may be enabled to take care of the orphans in their charge. This is surely one of the greatest charities in the world. These orphans need the protecting arm of the Government. Their former institution being untenable from the destruction caused by our shells, they are now confined in a small, narrow building, in an unhealthy part of the city, where a great many of them will suffer and probably die from disease contracted in that unhealthy locality. These Sisters simply ask enough aid, enough charity from this Government to enable them to restore their buildings, and I sincerely hope that the Senate will grant their request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. THAYER in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. DRAKE. Let it be read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment of the committee is to insert the following clause after line seven hundred and thirty-four:

For the Sisters of Mercy in Charleston, South Carolina, in recognition of their services toward Union prisoners during the late rebellion, $20,000.

It is proposed to add to the amendment the words "to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Treasury."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee as amended.

Mr. FERRY. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. As we are called upon to vote by yeas and nays on this question it is but right that the Senate should know the precise facts. The papers on which this matter rests have not been referred to in the course of the debate. I desire very briefly to call attention to them so that Senators may vote understandingly.

This is an appeal to the generosity of the Senate, and unless the case were unusually clear and strong I would not vote for it; but it seems to me that if any Senator will take the pains to read these letters he will be satisfied that his duty to his country would be promoted by voting for this appropriation for a reasonable amount, $10,000 or even $20,000.

Mr. STEWART. Can you not have them read?

Mr. SHERMAN. Here is a letter from Governor Scott, who was known to be a brave and excellent officer of the Army, who served for a long time at Charleston, was himself a prisoner, was very harshly treated by the rebels, and is now Governor of South Carolina. He writes as follows about his personal experience with these ladies:

"I was personally cognizant, during my imprisonment in Charleston and subsequently while I was stationed in that city, of the active and unceasing benevolence of the Sisters of Mercy, their charitable offices being freely dealt out to all who needed them without reference to class, condition, or nationality; and I know of many of my friends and acquaintances in the Federal Army who were the recipients of their beneficent and kindly attentions. Many a sick and wounded Federal prisoner was indebted to them for necessary nourishment and attention, and frequently their dying pillows were soothed and comforted by pious consolations of the Sisters of Mercy."

This letter is rather of a general character.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the date of it?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a recent date—January 27, 1869. Here is a letter from an officer of Connecticut volunteers who signs himself as having belonged to the seventh Connecticut volunteers.

Mr. DRAKE. What is his name?
Mr. SHERMAN. F. R. Jackson. He speaks of his imprisonment on his arrival at Charleston:

"Soon after our arrival in Charleston we were visited by Sister M. Xavier, accompanied by another Sister of Mercy, each bearing comforts for us, the wounded Union prisoners. Sister Xavier came to the hospital prison daily, accompanied each time by another Sister, and each day went to all of our number and gave fruit, corn-bread, cake, meat, gruel, arrow-root, and sometimes chicken and chicken-broth. She brought me daily either a bottle of wine or of brandy, &c. There were eight wounded men confined in our cell, only one of whom, Captain Lawler, was a Roman Catholic. All received the same attention at the hands of Sister M. Xavier and companion. The great majority of our number were of the Protestant faith, but there was no distinction made between us on account of religion or nationality."

He then goes on at some length, giving the details of the services of these Sisters of Mercy to him and his comrades.

Mr. DRAKE. Does he state when that occurred?

Mr. SHERMAN. In 1862.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. SHERMAN. This is an affidavit sworn to by this gentleman recently.

Mr. DRAKE. When was it sworn to?

Mr. SHERMAN. February 6, 1869. I have here another sworn statement dated June 7, 1867, two years ago, by an officer of the Army, John M. Hammill, late colonel of a New York regiment and brevet brigadier general of volunteers. This gentleman, after describing his being captured and his being taken to a hospital, says:

"It was at this time I met the Sisters of Mercy from Charleston, who almost daily visited the hospital, not only cheering us with words of consolation, but substantially administering to our wants by bringing us food and clothing secured by them at their own expense, and furnished to us brandy."

And so he goes on at length. I have in addition a letter signed by an officer of some distinction, whose name is familiar to me—L. S. Payne. I think he was of the Connecticut volunteers. He states:

"This hospital was assigned exclusively to and for our wounded prisoners, and all citizens were forbidden permission to visit the hospital; but the Sisters of Mercy, after much opposition, succeeded in obtaining permission to visit the hospital for the purpose of dispensing their truly Christian charity and relieving the sufferings of the wounded and dying. I need not particularize, but will state that the attention of these angels of mercy to our wounded soldiers were at this time incessant and unceasing, never failing to call daily, and some one or more of them (of whom there seemed to be many) calling oftener and administering to the severe cases. In their supplies of palatable food and changes of clothing furnished to those destitute, and in all their ministrations they made no distinction between rank, color, or creed; but their efforts of relief were directed to all alike. The excessively hot weather, the insufficient supply of medicines and other necessities, together with the little nursing help, induce me to believe that through the aid of these kind people the lives of many of our soldier prisoners were saved. After being transferred from Charleston to Columbia, and since my return home, I have met with many of the officers and soldiers who had been in Charleston as prisoners, and they all universally speak of the unbounded kindness of these Sisters of Mercy of Charleston."

He then goes on at some length to state other facts. There are a great number of officers who recommend in the very strongest possible language this appeal to the charity and the benevolence of Congress, and among them is General Gillmore, who was in command for a long time of that department. I will read his brief statement:

I most cheerfully add my name to this appeal in behalf of the "Sisters of Our Lady of Mercy, of Charleston," having in view the reconstruction of their buildings nearly destroyed by the bombardment from Morris Island. The aid rendered by the Sisters to Union prisoners during the war was unremitting, and I have no doubt that many valuable lives were saved to the Union cause thereby. I most earnestly commend the cause of the society to my friends and others in Congress, and hope that an appropriation for the object in view will be made.

Q. A. GILLMORE,
Late Major General United States Volunteers and Brevet Major General United States Army.

There is also a statement made by General Sickles to the same effect in his own handwriting, and another by General Hardie. There are quite a number of testimonials of this kind. I have also a number of other papers which it is not necessary to read. It appears, in addition to the extraordinary services rendered by these ladies, that their property was necessarily destroyed by our troops when bombarding the city of Charleston. That does not give them any ground for a claim to rebuild their building; and the Committee on Claims were justified in rejecting it on the ground of a claim; but it is an additional ground for the appeal now made to our generosity. With these letters before me, and having also conversed with the lady who is now here pressing this matter, Sister Xavier, one of the Sisters of Mercy, I cannot refuse on behalf of the people of the United States at least a reasonable response to this demand. I am willing to vote an appropriation of $10,000 or $20,000, not on the ground that this property was destroyed, but because these ladies in Charleston in the midst of the war, after the bull of the Pope of Rome referred to by my honorable friend from Michigan, expended their time, their money, their labor, and risked their lives in saving the lives and relieving the wants of our distressed countrymen there. I should think myself wanting if I did not respond to that appeal. I believe the people of the United States would respond to it. I do not care whether that relief was rendered by Catholic or Protestant, white or black, slave or free, it equally appeals to our generosity; and unless it appeals so strongly that we would be willing to take our own money under the same circumstances as a matter of course we should vote no; but from the facts stated in these papers I am inclined to vote whatever the Committee on Appropriations think reasonable, $10,000 or $20,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to ask the honorable Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, under what clause of the Constitution or whereabouts it is that he finds the right to make appropriations of this kind as a charity to people outside of the District of Columbia?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should find it very clearly in the right to declare war if there were no other. We sent soldiers down there, and I think we have a right and I can furnish the honorable Senator with many precedents where we have actually paid for gratuitous services rendered to our own soldiers. There was one about a year ago. I do not recollect the circumstances.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not ask the Senator for cases. I asked him, as I merely want to be informed and of course he knows all about this, whereabouts the idea is found in the Constitution of a right to make charitable appropriations like this?

Mr. SHERMAN. In reply, I am rather surprised that my friend from Maine should make a constitutional point of this kind. I would expect it rather to come from the other side. I think, according to our theories and construction of the Constitution, the Congress of the United States may appropriate for those expenditures incurred in the ordinary prosecution of the war for the defense of the country or anything of that kind without having the express clause pointed out in the Constitution. That has been the practice of the Government.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have received the answer I expected and it amounts to this, that there is no power anywhere to make such an appropriation.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, this debate has taken a much wider turn than I supposed it would take when I began to express my views against this appropriation. The Senate will bear me witness that I have not turned it into the wide field in which it has been expatiating. I simply wish, in a few concluding words, to state the exact position of the matter. Here is a body of ladies, doubtless earnest, charitable, every way respectable Christian ladies. They constitute an association, a part of the organization of the church with which they are connected. They are bound by the vows of their organization to devote themselves to works of charity all the days of their lives. In pursuance of those vows they administered in charity to the Union prisoners in the city of Charleston, thereby doing nothing more than their religious obligations; that the vows of their sisterhood demanded that they should do for all persons in distress. We are asked, in view of this voluntary rendition of services of that kind, to which their whole lives have by special vows been dedicated, to give them this donation of money in recognition of those services as it appears upon the face of the amendment. I am desirous of knowing when and where the Congress of the United States have engaged in work of this kind before, and even if they have engaged in it, where it is to end.

But, sir, when we come to sift this matter what do we find? That the claim or the appropriation is urged upon the Senate on the ground that the house occupied by these Sisters of Mercy in the city of Charleston was destroyed by the bombardment of that city by the Union forces. That is the foundation that is laid for this claim, and that foundation having once before been examined by the Committee on Claims it was totally rejected. Sir, if we are going to pay for the institutions of charity that were destroyed by the bombardments made by the Union soldiers where shall we end? How many of them are there? Does not every Senator here know that we are not only under no obligation to rebuild such fabrics but that it is altogether contrary to our duty in the premises? Let those who founded the charities look after them when they have met the fortune of war, not the conquering Government that in fighting a rebellion was compelled to destroy them.

But it seems that this is not a sufficient foundation. We have paraded before us "the orphans," "the poor little children," "the little orphan children," tenderly spoken of, affectionately and affectingly mentioned here in the Senate Chamber; that because these ladies have charge of these orphans we should give this $20,000 from the national Treasury. Sir, apply the principle asserted as the basis of this appropriation on a wider field and see what you will come to. Are these ladies the only ones in the United States that ministered to the wants of the Union soldiers? Are they the only associated ladies who ministered to those wants? The whole country knows that they were not. I can point you to associations of American women, not bound by any vows to charity for a life, but bound by higher vows, the charity of home, of the wife and the mother, that left them all and went abroad into the field, into the camp, into the tent, into the hospital, and at the deathbed of the soldier and at his grave, impelled not by any vows of charity, but by the dictates of patriotism. I demand of this Congress, I demand of this nation, if you pass this amendment, that there shall be a recognition of the glorious heroism and self-sacrifice of the wives and mothers and daughters of the Republic to the dying sons of the Republic in that war.

But suppose you put it upon the ground of the destruction of the house. Mark you, sir, it was in enemy's territory. It shared the fate of the other houses that surrounded it. You want now to pay for it, do you? Where is the ghost of the Sue Murphey claim? A loyal woman, claiming to be loyal, supported here as loyal—you tore down her house to make way for your cannon balls to shoot in the ranks of the enemy; and when you did that and she came here you spent three weeks in debating the claim and turned her away from the door of Congress. A loyal woman, too, mark you! What do you know of the loyalty of these South Carolina Sisters of Mercy? Have you any proof of it? Not a syllable. The locality is prima facie evidence against their loyalty. Why not turn around now and go and hunt up the loyal men and women of this country whose property has been destroyed by thousands of millions by the Army of the Union for military purposes and pay them all?

But, sir, if you put it upon the ground of the orphans, where are the thousands, nay, perhaps hundreds of thousands of the orphans of the dead Union braves who saved your country? Will you do nothing for them? Will you do nothing for the asylums for them, located all over the country, based upon the charities of loyal men and women—pay nothing for them, but give it all to the Sisters of Mercy for their orphans? Ah, sir, let the Senate of the United States do such a deed as that once and how many more will they have to do?

Sir, I forbear to consume time in the discussion of this matter. I trust that under no circumstance whatever could the Congress of the United States be induced to pass such an appropriation as this.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. President, I should not trouble the Senate again except for the fact that the Senator from Vermont said a few moments ago that a plain statement of this matter ought to determine the judgment of the Senate against the proposition. Sir, I think a plain statement of the matter ought to determine the judgment of the Senate for it; and what is it? These Sisters of Mercy for whom this appropriation is proposed to be made, living there in the enemy territory, could do nothing actively in aid of the Government; they could not take up arms; they could not enlist in the service of the General Government; but there in the enemy's country, when our friends, our soldiers came within their reach they came and relieved them. In the progress of the war their building was destroyed. They do not come here and make a claim for that; and let me inquire of the Senate what would be the first question asked if they came here and made a claim for the destruction of their property? Why, sir, it would be as to their loyalty. That was the question made on the claim of Sue Murphey, of which the Senator from Missouri just now spoke. That was the question as to her, and upon that her case turned.

If these Sisters of Mercy made a claim and the question of their loyalty was raised, and the proof was that all they could do there in the enemy's country they did for our friends and for our sick and our disabled and our wounded, who would say that they were not loyal?

The Senator from Missouri says they were enlisted in a cause for which they had pledged their lives and had made sacred vows; that they devoted their lives to that purpose. Sir, it was not a question with them of loyalty to the Government; it was a question of loyalty to humanity. Your sick came within their reach and they relieved them; your wounded came there and they ministered to their wants and they relieved them; your hungry came there and they fed them; your naked, came within their reach and they clothed them. In obedience to the dictates of Him who endeavored to establish on earth peace, of which we have heard so much this evening, they sought to do what they could to bring about peace.

Sir, the plain statement of the case is that they relieved our sick and our wounded, and they come here now and ask that we should acknowledge that in the way of a substantial compensation or remuneration which will be of benefit to them.

I think the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] asked of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] a moment ago what clause in the Constitution would authorize this appropriation. Sir, there is no such clause there any more than there is one that authorized the appropriation of millions for charities in the southern States. As was said by the Senator from South Carolina a few moments ago, we have spread these southern States all over with the ministers of our charity, and millions have been appropriated as matters of charity. Now, merely the small pittance of $20,000 is asked; and it would be a scandal among the nations of the world if this American Congress could not do this little charity of $20,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to say one word in explanation before I vote. I find on looking at this amendment that it is urged quite differently from what I supposed from the character of the debate. It does not propose to make an appropriation in consideration of the destruction of property, but for services rendered to the Union soldiers.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On this question I have paired off with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] who is necessarily absent at this moment. If he were present he would vote for the amendment, and I should vote against it.

Mr. COLE. I am paired off on this question with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. FOWLER,] He would vote for it and I against it. The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Buckalew, Conness, Davis, Harris, McCreery, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Sawyer, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Van Winkle, Wade, and Warner—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Osborn, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Vickers, Whyte, Williams, and Wilson—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cattell, Cole, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Hendricks, Kellogg, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Ross, Saulsbury, Welch, Willey, and Yates—24.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert after the seven hundred and thirty-seventh line the following:

Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum:

For the support of the asylum, over and above the probable amount received for pay patients, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out in line seven hundred and forty-seven the word "twelve" and insert "six;" so as to read:

For the care, support, and medical treatment of sixty transient paupers, medical and surgical patients, in some proper medical or charitable institution in the city of Washington, under a contract to be formed with such institution, $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line seven hundred and fifty-nine the following new section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the Clerk of the House be directed to pay out of the contingent fund the sum of $400 to W. S. Morse, and the sum of $100 to Charles S. Shambaugh, which shall be in full of all claim by them on account of services rendered to the Committee on Military Affairs in collecting during the recess of the Thirty-Ninth Congress the papers and evidence respecting artificial limbs furnished to soldiers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following as a new section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $7,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the relief of the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association of the Union, to be applied to the repair and preservation of the property at Mount Vernon under the direction of the military officer in charge of the public buildings and grounds.

The amendment was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House further insisted on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1746) for the removal of certain disabilities from the persons therein named, asked a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. H. E. PAINE of Wisconsin, Mr. F. C. BEAMAN of Michigan, and Mr. JAMES BROOKS of New York managers at the same on its part.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1746) for the removal of certain disabilities from the persons therein named, disagreed to by the House.

On motion of Mr. STEWART, it was Resolved, That the Senate further insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House, and agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. EDMUNDS, and Mr. ROBERTSON.

HOUSE BILL.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 476) for the payment of Caleb S. Hunt and J. Willis Menard was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are some amendments of the Committee on Appropriations passed over which will now be read if the Senator from Maine desires.

Mr. HARLAN. I have the consent of the Senator from Maine to offer an amendment now. It is to add to the first section:

For reimbursement of the State of Iowa for expenses incurred and payments made during the rebellion, as examined, audited, and found due to the State by General Robert C. Buchanan commissioner under the act of Congress of July 25, 1866.

Mr. SUMNER. I will offer an amendment to the amendment:

Provided, That the claim of any State for expenditures in aid of the United States during the war of the rebellion shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, where such claim has been audited and found due by any commission appointed for that purpose under the authority of Congress.

That is the Iowa case, and I believe there is one other case that is like it. The language is simply to make the Iowa proposition applicable to any other State that shall be in the same situation; that is, if the claim has been examined, audited, and found due by any commission acting under the authority of Congress it shall be paid.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that is extraordinary. Congress appoints a commission to examine a claim and report to Congress; and now, without knowing what that claim is or what the report is or how many cases there are, it is proposed to confirm that report, whatever it may be, and pay the amount.

Mr. SUMNER. It is the same with the original proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the original proposition has not been voted upon. I suppose some explanation will be given of that before we act on it. I appeal to the Senator himself whether he thinks it proper that an appropriation should be made without the report being before us?

Mr. SUMNER. Where a claim has been audited and found due by a commission acting under the authority of Congress, what more does the Senator ask?

Mr. SHERMAN. The commissioner is appointed to examine the matter and report to Congress. The amount is found due, is reported to us and referred to our committee, and we proceed to act. This proposition is precisely as if a judge should say to a master or commissioner, "Go on, find out what there is due, report back to me, and without any action or looking at the report or knowing what it is I will confirm it."

Mr. SUMNER. The point is, as I understand, that a certain sum is found due to the State of Iowa, having been duly audited. Shall it not be paid?

Mr. SHERMAN. If it is found to be due by a committee of this body and then by a vote of the Senate, it will be paid.

Mr. SUMNER. In this case it is found due by a commission appointed under the authority of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. There were many commissions appointed during the recent war. One in the case of Missouri, where they allowed some claims and disallowed others. The matter came before Congress and Congress passed a bill authorizing payment of a portion of the claims passed on by the commission. This principle would go back of the action of Congress and allow in that case all the claims that had been allowed by the commission but were rejected subsequently by Congress. Is that what the Senator wishes?

Mr. SUMNER. No; I do not ask for that. Mr. SHERMAN. There is a case in my mind that would be covered by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to be against the Iowa proposition?

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to know something about it.

Mr. SUMNER. The proposition I move upon it is identical in character. The two should go together.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not heard anything about the Iowa proposition. When I hear about it I shall answer.

Mr. CONKLING. It strikes me the difference between the Iowa proposition and this may be thus stated: the Iowa proposition we can understand, at least we can know after it is explained, the length and breadth and possible effect of it; this proposition we know nothing about. There is no enumeration of the cases which it may cover; it is a leap entirely in the dark; and its action may be such as its mover does not at all contemplate. At all events, if we are to enter upon the payment of claims of this sort I hope, they will be enumerated that we shall know at the time we vote whether they be greater or less in number and be furnished without some sort of yardstick by which we can measure the amount and not undertake in the lump to pay we know not whom for claims we know not what.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Chair, as a matter of order, whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa is in order? It proposes an additional appropriation. It is not reported by any committee. It is not to carry out the provision of any existing law. I raise the question of order that it is in the very face of the express rule—Rule 30 of the Senate. If there is any statute which directs this sum to be paid to the State of Iowa I should like to see it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand the ground of the Senator's motion is that it is to execute a law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to see the law it is to execute.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have called on the Senator to show that fact.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no such law to my knowledge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the amendment is not reported by a committee, is not to carry out a statute, or is not estimated for by one of the Departments, it is not in order.

Mr. HARLAN. Before the decision is rendered I wish to call attention to the fact that the amendment itself refers to the law which is intended to be carried out by the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us see the law.

Mr. HARLAN. It is the act of Congress approved July 25, 1866.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the matter in dispute.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend from Iowa will be kind enough to turn us to the statute we shall see whether there is any act of Congress which authorizes the payment of any such thing. All the act of Congress contemplated, as I recollect it, was to provide for a commission to inquire into this claim of Iowa and report to Congress. The law made no provision for the payment of any sum to the State of Iowa. It made no acknowledgment of any debt to the State of Iowa. It was merely a law directing an inquiry, as I recollect it. Now, my friend can refer to it and we can see exactly what it was.

Mr. HARLAN. I cannot lay my hands on the statute at this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will find it.

Mr. HARLAN. But it seems this objection is rather technical than real. Congress passed a law directing an investigation to be made to ascertain what amount is justly due to the State of Iowa. That commissioner appointed in pursuance of law makes his report. He finds that this exact sum is due the State, and this amendment is intended to carry into effect that law authorizing this investigation to be made.

Mr. MORGAN. While gentlemen are finding the papers I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As soon as I can find the statute I will submit it to the Chair on the question of order.

Mr. MORGAN. The amendment I offer is in line six hundred and seventy-eight, after the word "garden," to insert:

And the erection of suitable iron stands for plants in new conservatory, $4,000, to be expended by the architect of the Capitol, under the direction of the joint Committee on the Library.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to offer a similar amendment from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to insert after line six hundred and seventy-three:

For continuing the work of grading and filling the Capitol grounds, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I expect to be absent very soon, and while the Senator from Iowa is looking up the law I should like to offer an amendment.

Mr. HARLAN. I have the law. The act referred to in the amendment offered by me reads as follows:

"That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and required to appoint a commissioner, whose duty it shall be to examine and report, on or before the 1st day of December next, upon the claim of the State of Iowa for forage, transportation, subsistence, and clothing furnished by said State to certain volunteers of said State who, under the command of Colonels Morledge and Edwards, and at the request of certain officers commanding troops of the United States in the State of Missouri, marched into the State of Missouri to cooperate with the troops of the United States in that State in suppressing the rebellion. Also the claim of the State of Iowa for repayment of certain moneys paid by said State in raising, arming, equipping, paying, and subsisting certain troops of the State maintained by the State on the southern and northwestern borders thereof during the late rebellion, for the purpose of defending the State against attacks by bushwhackers and Indians. And also the claim of said State for compensation for certain forage procured and barracks built by the State on the northwestern border thereof and turned over by the State to and used by the United States."

In pursuance of this law a commission was appointed, discharged its duty, and found due the State under these various heads the amount named in the amendment, the exact number of dollars and cents, and this amendment, therefore, is necessary in order to carry into effect this provision of the statute itself. I ought to state perhaps a word or two on the merits of the claim itself. These troops were called for by—

Mr. EDMUNDS. What has this to do with the question of order?

Mr. HARLAN. Troops were called for by the general in command of the United States troops in Missouri. They marched down into that State and performed service there in connection with the volunteers of the State of Missouri, for whose services the United States has already paid the State of Missouri more than seven million dollars. These troops served with those troops that have been thus paid, and were only relieved after a sufficient number of regular troops were marched into that State. On the northern border a part of the claim is for barracks, buildings, and forage collected to support the volunteers. These buildings and barracks afterward were sold and the money covered into the Treasury of the United States, and this is merely to reimburse the State of Iowa for these expenditures.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I inquire of my friend from Iowa what that has to do with the question of order? The rule says—and it is intended to protect the Treasury against sudden raids upon it—that no amendment of this kind shall be received to a general appropriation bill unless it is to carry into effect the provisions of some existing law. Then the question is whether this amendment is to carry into effect the provisions of that law. What are its provisions? The provisions are merely that a commissioner shall be appointed who shall report to us. Is this to carry those provisions into effect—to appoint a commissioner and pay him for his report? Not at all; something altogether beyond that; and therefore it does not come within any possible construction that can be fairly put upon that rule.

I do not raise this question because I am opposed to or in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa on its merits. I do not know what the merits are. I wish to know what they are; but the last night of the session of Congress, without examination by a committee, is not the time to ascertain them. That is the ground on which I make the objection.

Mr. HARLAN. I have only this remark to make: if the original law had provided for the payment of the money my amendment would be unnecessary. It is only necessary for the purpose of carrying into effect the law I have read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the law creates no obligation; that is the ground of objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is in order, inasmuch as it seems to be to carry out the provisions of this law, it being asserted that the amount is ascertained by the very commission provided for by law. There was no order to pay the amount found due, and this amendment makes that provision. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to say that that presents precisely the same case that is presented by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, except that it is the case of Massachusetts instead of Iowa.

Mr. CONNESS. Let the Clerk read it again.

The SECRETARY. The amendment to the amendment is as follows:

Provided, That the claim of any State for expenditures in aid of the United States during the war of the rebellion shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated where such claim has been found due by any commission appointed for that purpose under the authority of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that amendment in order?

Mr. SHERMAN. I inquire of my friend from Iowa whether the report of the commission has been made and sent to Congress?

Mr. HARLAN. It has been made and sent to Congress; but my colleague, who is more conversant with the matter than I am, has been compelled to retire from the Chamber on account of sickness.

Mr. SHERMAN. Was the report of the commission referred to any committee of this body?

Mr. HARLAN. I do not know whether it was referred to a committee of this body or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the case of Missouri, the case of Indiana, the case of Kansas, and in many other cases, the reports were submitted here, referred to the Committee on Claims, and then reported in the form of resolutions or bills from the committee. Any other course would be extraordinary, I think. The commissioner may be a very dull man or he may be a very bright man; he may be a very liberal man; his reports may be absurd. Such a report is always referred to a committee of this body for the purpose of ascertaining whether it is a proper claim or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Nobody has seen the report yet that I can find.

Mr. SHERMAN. It would be evidently wrong to vote hundreds of thousands of dollars from the Treasury on a matter never acted on by a committee of this body, and of which now the honorable Senator from the very State from which the claim comes cannot tell us anything about. He does not know what committee it is before, where it is, whether it has been considered, or whether it has been reported adversely upon.

Mr. HARLAN. I perhaps ought to say one word in reply to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Ohio. If the committee did not examine it it was not the fault of the Senator from Iowa. It was referred to the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. What committee?

Mr. HARLAN. The Committee on Appropriations, under the rules of the Senate itself, in ample time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You do not mean the claim, but the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to ask the Senator how these figures are ascertained? The sum appropriated here is $229,848 23. The amendment is in this language:

For reimbursement of the State of Iowa for expenses incurred and payments made during the rebellion, as examined, audited, and found due to the State by General Robert C. Buchanan, commissioner, under the act of Congress of July 25, 1866, $229,848 23.

Mr. HARLAN. That is the exact amount found to be due by the commissioner under the law that was read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the reading of the report of the commissioner. Let us see what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No such report is here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand the Chair to say that the document is not before this body?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not before the Chair. The Chair cannot undertake to judge of the facts. It is said that the amount was ascertained. That is a question for the Senate, whether it is ascertained or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not my point. I ask that the public document referred to in the amendment may be read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in the possession of the Secretary, I believe.

Mr. CONNESS. I suppose if the Senator will send it to the Secretary he will read it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; but the Senator is entirely unable to find any such document, and he supposes, inasmuch as the Senator from Iowa states in his amendment that there has been such an official report made to this body, that this body is in possession of it and that it can be used on this question. If no such report has been made then my honorable friend from Iowa is mistaken in moving the amendment at all. If it has been made and is a part of our proceedings I wish to have it read in this connection; but I understand the Chair to say it is not in the possession of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It seems to me the difficulty about the case is that it is not made out on the facts. I understand the Chair to rule that the amendment is before the Senate. The question is whether the Senator from Iowa, offering his amendment, makes out his case on the facts. The amendment is that a certain sum of money be paid as found due according to a certain report. There is no evidence here; there is no evidence the committee could act on as to such a report.

Mr. HARLAN. I think it is a little unkind for the chairman of the very committee to whom the case was referred to say they have not reported on it, when if I could say publicly what has been said to me privately it is a mere oversight that it was not reported and carried into the bill by that committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Does the Senator refer to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. HARLAN. I do refer to him; but perhaps, judging from a suggestion made to me by my honorable friend upon the right, the Senator may be talking about one amendment and I about another.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I was not talking about the notice given; that was all right; but the Committee on Appropriations had no evidence furnished to verify the statement in this amendment, and the suggestion I make to the Senator is that he does not furnish the Senate with evidence to verify the fact stated in the amendment.

Mr. HARLAN. I would inquire of my honorable friend if that is the reason the Committee on Appropriations did not report in favor of the amendment formally?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir, it was not; because the truth is my attention was not called to it personally.

Mr. HARLAN. It was an oversight.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It was an oversight on the part of the committee; but we had no evidence before us and I saw no amendment. So far as the rule is concerned the Senator from Iowa performed his duty when he sent it to the committee. The Senator's colleague is a member of that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SUMNER. I was explaining the amendment to the amendment. I said that it stood on precisely the same ground with the proposition moved by the Senator from Iowa. If that can be sustained by the Senate then my amendment can be sustained. The only difference between the two is that one concerns Iowa and the other concerns Massachusetts. The case of Massachusetts is identical with that of Iowa. There were troops employed there at considerable expense to the State during the war of the rebellion, especially for the defense of the coast, and the expenditures of the State on that account have since the war been examined, audited, and found to be due by a commission acting by the authority of Congress, precisely as in the case of Iowa. Therefore, if the Senate can recognize the validity of the Iowa claim, it must also recognize the validity of the Massachusetts claim. I see no difference between them. I would say, however, that I do not move this now with any idea of embarrassing the amendment of my friend, the Senator from Iowa. I do it only to take advantage of the proposition he has made in order to secure the rights of my State.

I have had too much occasion for the last two days to see in this Chamber that a claim presented from Massachusetts hardly receives the favor that a claim from another State might expect and actually receives. There is a difference. Senators are disposed to attack Massachusetts, to vote against her claims. The Senator from Ohio smiles. He led in an attack on Massachusetts which was utterly unjustified. Now, here is another opportunity for him to lead in an attack on Massachusetts. I insist that the two cases shall go together, identical as they are in their character. You cannot vote for one without voting for the other. You cannot reject the one justly without rejecting also the other.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I now have in my hand the report of the commissioner which seems to be so much desired by the honorable Senator from Maine and the honorable Senator from Vermont. I can read now the items. I could read the whole report, but I prefer to confine myself to the substance of it. General Buchanan reports:

"My examination of these accounts shows me that they are carefully made up in accordance with the laws of the State, verified on oath, and though not in the forms used by the Treasury Department, yet sufficiently like them for all practical purposes. I therefore did not attempt to apply to them the regulations of the accounting officers of the Treasury, for had this been possible it did not seem likely that Congress would have provided by law for a commissioner 'to examine and report upon' claims that could have been as well decided upon by those officers themselves. The letters of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller, hereto appended, sanction this opinion."

The commissioner then proceeds to make a detailed statement of the amounts that he finds due under the various heads, of which this is an example:

Colonel Morledge's regiment.
On account of pay of officers and men.....	$14,405 11
On account of subsistence.....	1,206 56
On account of transportation.....	1,988 60
On account of forage.....	206 35
On account of other expenses.....	105 02

Amount claimed on all accounts.....$17,911 64

Then he states minutely the amount found due under the head of Colonel Edwards's regiment; then again under Captain Jones's company; then the southern border brigade, northern border brigade, northwestern frontier guard, and summing up the whole claim it amounts to $223,848 23, and is signed "Robert C. Buchanan, Brevet Major General United States Army, Commissioner."

I hope this will be satisfactory to the two honorable Senators who have called for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I supposed that if claims for expenditures during the war were such that the Department could not under existing laws settle them they underwent some investigation in the Senate; that they were referred to a committee of the Senate and reported upon. This claim has been submitted to no investigation in the Senate. The report of the commissioner I really do not think amounts to anything. My point is, that it must either be a claim of that character that the Department may settle it, or if it is to be passed upon by the Senate it must be submitted to a committee of the Senate and we not forced to take the mere report of a commissioner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would inquire if that is in order? I make a point of order on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts and ask the decision of the Chair. It seems to be a general provision for all States, making appropriations for the benefit of all the States—a piece of general legislation. It seems to me to be out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment seems to the Chair to be in order. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not feel at all encouraged in favor of voting this large sum of money instantly on the first inspection by this report. The document which my honorable friend from Iowa has produced purports to be a report made in the House of Representatives by Mr. GARFIELD from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARLAN. He copies the whole report of General Buchanan.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps he does. I do not know whether he does or not. But that purports to give a report dated "Commissioner's office Iowa Claims, Washington, District of Columbia, December 6, 1867," which proceeds to set out under a variety of accounts what the claim is, not undertaking to pass upon it, because he had no authority to pass upon it; he was merely to report to us; he pursued his duty if he did report it. The act under which he was to proceed expressly provided that he should report on or before the 1st day of December, 1866. His authority, therefore, was entirely exhausted for more than a year before he undertook to report at all, because he did not report until December, 1867.

Congress had a purpose in providing for some immediate limitation in the examination of these accounts; but the matter was allowed to lie for more than a year, and then it is said we have this report. Now, in what I say I do not mean to express myself as opposed to this claim or any other of the State of Iowa. I only mean to say that the Senate has no right to dispose of the tax-payers' money on the jump here, the last night of the session, without any investigation, which is impossible now; and saying that, I appeal to the Senator from Iowa if it is right to press a claim that has not been audited and allowed by anybody, that the statute never authorized to be audited and allowed by anybody, that has not been examined by any committee, without any opportunity of examination, but which is only reported to us as a claim of the State of Iowa by this officer.

Now, without expressing any opinion on the ultimate merits of the claim, I appeal to the honorable Senator if it is consistent with our sense of what is good policy and justice to the people as well as the States to press an amendment of this kind at this late hour?

Mr. HARLAN. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator's vote depends on my judgment in the matter I will say to him that I think it is right and that it ought to be paid. The officer appointed by the President has attempted to carry into effect the law. He is a high officer of the Government acting on his official responsibility. He goes to the ground or to the proper Departments, finds all the papers, examines them minutely, and makes his report on his official responsibility to Congress.

What did the law mean? It certainly intended that if anything was due to Iowa it should be paid. The President appointed the commissioner provided for in the law. The commissioner proceeded to perform his duty, and has made his report, and has reported the exact amount of money due the State of Iowa under these various heads, which is mentioned in the amendment I have offered, and which was referred to the proper standing committee of this body. I do not think it at all conclusive that the honorable Senator from Vermont may not have examined this particular claim and that he may have some doubts whether he might not have found some objections to its payment if he were to examine it. Why, Mr. President, as great as the honorable Senator is it is impossible for him individually to examine all the cases that come before this body. He examines, I have no doubt, carefully and minutely and ably everything that is submitted to him or submitted to a committee of which he is a member, but he not happening to be a member of the committee to which this was referred the Senate has not the benefit of the light which he could have thrown on this subject; but as it is impossible for any one Senator to do all the business that is necessary to be done for this country, he ought not to complain of the rest of us who have examined subjects if we desire the judgment of the Senate on them, even though he may not feel perfectly clear in regard to them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I congratulate my honorable friend from Iowa upon the successful demonstration he has made, so far as I am personally concerned. I admit that the Senate cannot wait for my investigations, but I do submit that they ought to wait for his. It was not fifteen minutes ago that he was apologizing for knowing nothing at all about this claim because his associate was away.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not do me injustice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; justice.

Mr. HARLAN. I only gave my colleague credit for knowing more than I did on the subject. That was all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well. I think it very likely that my friend is correct in his statement. I hope so, at any rate. [Laughter.]

Now, what I was objecting to was not the fact that I was unacquainted with this claim myself, except as one sixty-sixth part of this body. What I did object to was that the Committee on Appropriations had not investigated this claim; whether it was their fault or not is not for us or for the tax-payers. The Senate has not had the benefit of anybody's investigation except that of the two Senators whose State is claiming the money. That is the trouble.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask my honorable friend whether he understands it to be the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to investigate all possible claims of which they have notice that some other committee will move them on their bills?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President; I do not think it is. I do not care whether it is or not. I am not imputing any blame to the Committee on Appropriations. I think they did right. Here was this amendment sent to them, with no document before this body upon which it was founded, no evidence furnished to which they could refer, and therefore they did not report upon it. But no matter how that may be, this body is entitled and the people who have to bear the burden are entitled to have every claim investigated, by somebody besides the claimant before this body. This claim has not been investigated, confessedly; no committee has looked into it at all; and here it is offered by my honorable friend at the last moment of the session and he desires the Senate to pass it, so far as I can study his argument, upon the sole ground that the Senator from Vermont is not satisfied with it.

Mr. HARLAN. Why, Mr. President, I am amazed at the Senator. He says it has not been examined by anybody when it has been examined by the very officer provided for by the law itself. Congress, both branches of Congress, passed a law directing the President to appoint a commissioner to examine this claim of Iowa; the President appointed the commissioner, and the officer thus appointed has examined the claim. It was not intended by Congress that the payment of this claim should depend on the investigation of a committee or it would have been referred to a committee; it was intended that it should depend on the report of the commissioner appointed under the provisions of the law itself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The honorable Senator is entirely mistaken in his construction of the law. The law expressly requires this commissioner to examine these claims and report them to Congress for its action. This statute does not admit any liability at all to the State of Iowa; none can be wrung out of it by any amount of construction or pressure. It is merely to have the amount stated and reported to this body or the other body for their consideration.

Now, the Senator says that it being reported we have no right to consider it; the report of this officer is conclusive, and we have nothing to do but put our hands in our pockets and take out the money and pay it. If no further investigation is required why did not Congress provide in the same act that this officer should certify to the Secretary of the Treasury and he should draw his warrants for the amount? The statutes are full of laws of this kind, where Congress, in order to facilitate its own investigations, appoints a commission to report to it the evidence and the statement of a claim. When we have got that report we, through our own committees, investigate the grounds upon which it is based. It is because we have not had that investigation in this case that I object to this amendment.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator cannot put words in my mouth and I take it silently. I said no such thing. I did not say that the Senator or any member of the Senate had no right to examine this claim. I only said that the Senator's suggestion that it had never been examined was not according to the facts as I understood them, for it has been examined and the evidence is before the Senator's eye. It has been examined as provided by law, under the very law for which I doubt not the Senator himself voted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The law provided that it should expire a year before he made his investigation, so that it was not under the law plainly.

Mr. HARLAN. If a claim thus examined and presented to Congress cannot be paid I do not know what claim can be paid. When a special act is passed authorizing the appointment of a high officer of the Government to examine into the merits of a claim, and when that report has been made and is laid on the desk of every member of Congress and has been lying there for weeks and months, if it is to be defeated by this kind of snap argument I should despair of ever getting a just claim through. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 18; as follows: YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conness, Drake, Harlan, Henderson, McDonald, Morgan, Norton, Pomeroy, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Warner, Welch, and Williams—19.

YAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Conkling, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harris, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pool, Rice, Sawyer, Sprague, Stewart, Whyte, and Wilson—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fowler, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Trumbull, Willey, and Yates—29.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I offer the following amendment as a new section:

*And be it further enacted, That to enable the President to carry out the provisions of the third article of the treaty of November 15, 1861, with the Pottawatomie Indians, as modified by the treaty of March 29, 1866, by passing to certain members of said tribe who have elected to become citizens in accordance with said treaties the proportion of the cash value of the Pottawatomie annuities to which they may be entitled, the sum of $233,163 80 in currency and the sum of $128,699 73 in gold, to be paid out of the funds belonging to said tribe of Indians, or so much of said sums as may be necessary to pay the members of said tribe who have actually withdrawn from their tribal relations and under said treaties have become citizens of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated: *Provided, That no part of said money due or belonging to minor children shall be paid to any person for such children until such person shall have been duly appointed the guardian or curator of such children and shall have executed a bond of security as required by the laws of the State of Kansas.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That before the President shall cause any money to be paid under the preceding section or any patents to be issued he shall cause evidence to be taken and shall be satisfied that the recipients are entitled to the same under the aforesaid treaties, and he may require the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be sold such proportion of the bonds held by him in trust for said Indians as may be necessary to comply with said provisions.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I raise the question of order.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is not a dollar appropriated from the Treasury by the amendment. There are funds belonging to the Pottawatomie Indians held in trust, and under the treaties alluded to there whenever any portion of them shall separate from the tribe and take their lands in severalty, the President is required to sell a certain proportion of their stocks, that is an amount to give to each one his proportionate part so as to set him up in life as a citizen of the United States. In the Indian appropriation bill this matter was overlooked. That bill is now before a conference committee, but nothing having been said on this subject in either of the Houses of course it is impossible to get it into that bill. It is a matter of considerable importance. Some six hundred and seventy-four of these Indians have taken their lands in severalty. We provided for six hundred of them last year. Six hundred and seventy-four more have now separated from the tribe and have taken their lands in severalty and desire their proportion of the funds. It is but right that the stocks held in trust should be sold, or a sufficient amount of them sold, in order to give these Indians the proportion they are entitled to. The amendment does not take a dollar from the Treasury, and it is not worth while to object to it on that ground. The Indian Committee have unanimously recommended it.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senator from Maine will not object to it. They are citizens and vote in our State.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the amendment makes no appropriation I do not object.

Mr. HENDERSON. It comes out of their own money.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to amend the bill on page 26, line six hundred and fourteen, by striking out all after the word "provided," as follows:

That for surveying the timbered lands lying west of the coast range of mountains the same pay may be allowed for township and section lines as is allowed for standard lines.

And inserting in lieu thereof:

That the Commissioner of the General Land Office in his discretion may authorize public lands in said State densely covered with forests of thick undergrowth to be surveyed at augmented rates, not exceeding eighteen dollars per mile for standard parallels; fifteen dollars for township, and twelve dollars for section lines.

This amendment is simply changing the form of the bill, not affecting it particularly.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have an amendment to offer to which I presume the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will not object, as it is to carry out more precisely the amendment on page 27. It is to insert after the word "made" in line six hundred and forty-three:

And the act entitled "An act to amend the charter of the Washington Gas-Light Company," approved January 30, 1865, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have another amendment to come in on page 29, after line six hundred and ninety-one:

To aid in supporting the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children of this District, $5,000, to be expended under the direction of the executive committee of its board of managers.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to offer two amendments. The first is to insert after line two hundred and forty-four:

For improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi river, $50,000.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Are you going to put on the river and harbor bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir; only two items.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to insert the following, to come in after the amendment just adopted:

For improvement of the St. Clair flats, Lake St. Clair, $159,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This is from the Committee on Commerce, I suppose.

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir; and I served notice on the Senator. It has the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is this the same amount that was agreed upon by the Committee on Commerce in the bill reported to the Senate?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THAYER. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line seven hundred and fifty-nine:

For deficiency in the appropriation for the relief of the Navajo Indians, now at or near Fort Sumner, to be expended under the Secretary of the Interior, $80,813 58.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the Senator if that is the same item which the Senate put on the Indian appropriation bill?

Mr. THAYER. Yes, sir; it has passed this body twice.

Mr. CONNESS. My recollection is that that is contained in the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is just what I am inquiring about.

Mr. CONNESS. If so, certainly it should not be here.

Mr. HARLAN. That makes it necessary. I suppose, if I have leave to do it, that I can make a verbal report from the joint committee of the two Houses in regard to the Indian appropriation bill. The committees of conference have met, and after a conference have come to the conclusion that it will be impossible for them during the brief remaining hours of the session to consider the various points of difference of the two Houses. They therefore agreed not to make the attempt, but to recommend to their Houses respectively, immediately after the reorganization of the next Congress, that the whole subject of Indian affairs be referred to a joint committee of the two Houses.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I offer an amendment from the Committee on Commerce, to come in after line three hundred and seventy-two:

For life-boat station on Narragansett beach, Rhode Island, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I believe there is an amendment of the Committee on Appropriations on page 8 which has not yet been acted upon.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There are two amendments not yet acted upon reported by the Committee on Appropriations. I should like to have the Clerk read them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments which have been passed over will now be taken up.

The SECRETARY. After line one hundred and seventy-five the Committee on Appropriations propose to strike out the following clause:

To defray the expense of a preliminary survey of the site for the proposed navy-yard at League Island, $5,000.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I asked that this amendment should be laid over until the Senator from New Jersey was present, and he is now here. This is an appropriation of only $5,000 for the survey of League Island, which the Senate will remember was purchased by the city of Philadelphia and donated to the General Government and accepted for naval purposes. I suppose there can be no objection now to retaining this appropriation and voting down the amendment, especially since the appropriation has been made for New London.

Mr. CATTELL. I trust the appropriation will be made. The city of Philadelphia has not only fulfilled its original contract with the Government, but in addition has at an expense of over one hundred thousand dollars bought the shore line. The Secretary of the Navy recommends this appropriation simply for a survey and for a preparatory report. I sincerely hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. How many times has it been surveyed?

Mr. CATTELL. Never at the Government expense, I will say, if the gentleman wants a categorical answer.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish to make a statement about that to remind the Senate of what I said when I was up before. When my attention was called to it I said the committee had no especial information on the subject and so struck it out; the committee were not confident whether it was right or wrong, but having no information on the subject they deemed it best to strike out the clause. Now, I understand the Senator from New Jersey to say that it is important, and if so, I think it would be well, perhaps, for the Senate not to strike it out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to strike out the appropriation.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is one more reserved amendment of the Committee on Appropriations which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is to strike out from line one hundred and seventy-nine to one hundred and eighty-one, as follows:

For the completion of a bridge over the Dakota river, and to locate and survey the road from said bridge to the Vermillion bridge, $1,000.

Mr. RAMSEY. That is an old matter. I do not know why this action should be taken now. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] had it in charge some time ago as a member of the Committee on Territories. The bridge is over the Dakota river, in the Territory of Dakota. It seems a very moderate appropriation; and really, in view of the wants of these new communities, it seems but a small contribution from the Government. I should like to know from the chairman why the committee recommend striking out so moderate and reasonable an appropriation.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator from Connecticut had this matter in hand a year ago, and I hope he will explain it to the Senate.

Mr. FERRY. The question, as I understand, is upon agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations striking out the appropriation for the completion of a bridge over the Dakota river; and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, when that amendment was first reached, stated that the reason of the amendment proposed by the committee was that the committee had no information where or what this bridge was or why any such appropriation was needed.

A year ago a bill was reported by myself from the Committee on Territories, which I have before me, providing—

"That so much of the unexpended balance of an appropriation made March 3, 1865, for the construction of certain wagon-roads in the Territory of Dakota as shall not exceed the sum of $6,500 be, and the same is hereby, applied to the completion of the bridge over the Dakota river on the line of the Government road leading from Sioux City, in the State of Iowa, to the mouth of the Cheyenne river, in Dakota Territory."

That bill, as reported from the Committee on Territories, applied so much of an unexpended balance of $11,500 as might be necessary to the completion of the bridge, and on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] the appropriation was limited as it stands in the bill to $6,500, against my remonstrance, I then stating that I did not believe that sum would be sufficient; but the limitation was inserted by the Senate, and the Delegate from the Territory, rather than risk the bill at that time, took it as it was with the intention, if it proved insufficient, to ask for a further appropriation. He called upon me a few days since and stated that the amount had been expended and it would require about one thousand dollars more, and it would be upon one of the appropriation bills, and asked me to look at it when it came in. I had not observed it until my attention was called to it by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. This is undoubtedly the appropriation referred to.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEWART. I offer an amendment, to come in after line five hundred and four:

For continuing the collection of statistics of mines and mining by Professor R. W. Raymond, $10,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the sum of $2,500 appropriated for said purpose by the act of July 20, 1868, shall be transferred by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Treasury Department, to be expended as provided in said act.

The amendment was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the House No. 1803, being an act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their sixth, eighth, and sixteenth amendments.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, seventh, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth amendments of the Senate and concur in the said amendments.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the ninth amendment of the Senate and concur in the same, with the following amendment, namely, strike out "eight" and insert "six and one half;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the fifteenth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same, with the following two amendments, namely:

1. Strike out the first twelve lines and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That there shall be no new commissions, no promotions, and no enlistments in any infantry regiment until the total number of infantry regiments is reduced to twenty-five; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to consolidate the infantry regiments as rapidly as the requirements of the public service and the reduction of the number of officers will permit.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That no appointments of brigadier generals shall be made until the number is reduced to eight, and thereafter there shall be but eight brigadier generals in the Army.

2. Strike out all after and including line fifteen down to and including line twenty-one of the said fifteenth amendment of the Senate.

And that the Senate agree to the said amendments.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the seventeenth amendment of the Senate and concur in the same, with the following amendment, to wit: strike out all after the word "enacted," in line one, and insert: "brevet rank shall not entitle an officer to precedence or command except by special assignment of the President, but such assignment shall not entitle any officer to additional pay or allowances;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

HENRY WILSON.

JOHN CONNESS.

W. SPRAGUE.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. A. GARFIELD.

J. G. BLAINE.

G. M. DODGE.

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask to have again read the provision in reference to the number of brigadier generals.

The Secretary read the section.

Mr. CONKLING. I submit to the chairman of the committee that that language is repugnant. There is to be no appointment made until the number is reduced to eight and thereafter there shall be only eight. When it is reduced to eight the first appointment would make it nine. I am not sure what would be the construction of such a provision.

Mr. CONNESS. I was a member of the conference committee. There is evidently a word left out. "Less than eight" is the language intended to be used; and that being inserted and corrected in the House will make it right.

Mr. CONKLING. We had better change it now.

Mr. CONNESS. They are going to change it. It is a mere clerical error.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The report had better be withdrawn and have it corrected.

Mr. CONNESS. The committee are all present.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The House committee are not present.

Mr. CONNESS. When it goes to the House it can be corrected there also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest that it had better lie over informally until the correction can be made and the managers on the part of each House assent to it. They can do it in a few minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over if there be no objection.

Mr. WILSON subsequently submitted the report corrected by the insertion of the words "less than" before "eight."

The report was concurred in.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. THAYER. I submit an amendment to come in after line five hundred and thirty-one:

For the purchase of a site at Omaha, Nebraska, and for the erection upon the same of a building for a post office, the Federal courts, and Federal offices, $25,000.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That was put into another bill.

Mr. THAYER. It was put on the deficiency bill by the Senate, but it is now stricken out because that bill is for deficiencies alone.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The deficiency bill has not been finally closed.

Mr. THAYER. But this item has been stricken out of that bill, and I move it on this.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But it passed the Senate on the other bill.

Mr. THAYER. Yes, sir; but the conference committee have stricken it out.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The conference committee have not reported yet.

Mr. THAYER. I have just had the information from the members of the committee that that amendment is stricken out.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to it, but I do not think we should appropriate it in both places.

Mr. THAYER. The committee of conference are in session, and I went to them and they told me they had agreed that the Senate should recede from the amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. That is not in order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I did not know that my friend from Nebraska was going to put this item on this bill. If there is any idea of ever getting this bill concluded I think I shall have to observe some order. It is now twelve o'clock at night and this bill has to go to a committee of conference. If the Senate is to continue to load down this bill between now and sunrise to-morrow morning we shall certainly have to abandon the whole bill. My friend from Nebraska must see that I cannot allow this amendment to go on.

Mr. THAYER. I am obliged to state that it was by the advice of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that I offered this item as an amendment to this bill. I consulted him yesterday on the subject.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My friend must certainly be mistaken about it. This is the first intimation I have had of it. It was on the other bill.

Mr. THAYER. I consulted with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations about it. It has been before the Committee on Appropriations for a week, having been reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads by my friend from Minnesota, the chairman of that committee. I have complied with every rule of the Senate. I have consulted the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations twice or three times, and he himself suggested—he will pardon me, he has forgotten it—that I might move it on the miscellaneous bill. I unintentionally moved it on the deficiency bill when I ought not to have done so.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suppose the honorable Senator means to say that he consulted me about which bill he should move it on and I advised him to move it on this; but he really moved it on the other. He does not mean to say that after he moved it on the other I advised him to move it on this?

Mr. THAYER. Not at all, because it was not necessary.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Having moved it on that, and having carried it on that, the misfortune of my honorable friend's case is that he finally lost it.

Mr. CONNESS. And he brings it forward here again.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senate think it a prudent thing for me not to raise questions of order and to allow any gentleman to put on anything he pleases at this late hour, be it so. If it meets the general sense of the Senate that I shall not raise the objection it is better, perhaps, to rescind all rules. I do not wish to stand here against the general sense of the Senate. I am advised by the Senator from North Carolina that if this proposition goes on he has an amendment of a similar character to move for his State.

Mr. ABBOTT. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CONNESS. The difficulty about this point seems to me to be that it can hardly be right to offer this amendment here, it having been adopted heretofore on another bill and then lost in the conference. Its rejection in a conference, if it has been rejected there, is a rejection by both Houses. Now, is it proposed to go on offering these amendments to every bill that shall be pending after both bodies have rejected them? I do not see where we are to end if we go on in this way. I hope we shall take a vote.

Mr. ABBOTT. I send to the Chair an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. THAYER. I hope the Senator will not load down my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. ABBOTT, which was to add to the amendment of Mr. THAYER:

For court-house, custom-house, and post office at Wilmington, North Carolina, $50,000: Provided, That the present custom-house and court-house may be sold within such rules as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the proceeds thereof paid into the Treasury.

Mr. ABBOTT. If you will permit me, sir, I will state that the present post office and custom-house building at Wilmington is located near the water, in a very unhealthy place. The building itself is inconvenient. It can be sold for mercantile purposes, I suppose, for about $30,000. We ask an appropriation of $50,000 in order to build a new court-house, custom-house, and post office building in a different locality, and I offer that as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to know from what committee these amendments come.

Mr. ABBOTT. My amendment comes from no committee; neither does the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. On consultation with the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I had agreed to waive my amendment; but since that time the Senator from Nebraska has offered one of precisely the same character, and therefore I offer mine now as an amendment to his.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have said to the Senator from North Carolina that this amendment at the present time in my judgment would be irregular; but the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska has had the sanction of the Senate on another bill which he now tells us has failed by a disagreement of a committee of conference.

Mr. THAYER. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CRAGIN] is on that committee of conference, and as he has just come in he can state the facts.

Mr. CRAGIN. I suppose I am at liberty to state that that item has been stricken from the deficiency bill mainly because it is not properly applicable to a deficiency bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. So we have had the judgment of the Senate as to the propriety of the measure, and now the Senator from North Carolina proposes to attach this to it as an amendment. The Senator has informally presented his case to me, and I am satisfied that if his case had been sent to the committee properly his amendment would have been adopted. So that I believe both these measures are proper enough in themselves, but they are irregularly before us. I do not wish to raise the question of order if it is the general sense of the Senate that these items had better go on. I have no desire to raise the rule.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the rule is not raised on this, is it to be raised on others? I want to know where we are to stop. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations certainly is not going to raise the rule on one amendment and not on another.

Mr. THAYER. I submit to the Senator from Illinois whether his objection is a good one. I have complied with the rule in every respect; the Senator from Minnesota can bear testimony to that. This amendment has been before the Committee on Appropriations.

Several SENATORS. Let us vote.

Mr. THAYER. Very well; I will not take up time.

Mr. ABBOTT. I wish simply to say that in my judgment this amendment which I offer is for the interest of the Government in the place in which this building is located as much so as any amendment could possibly be; and I have offered this amendment on consultation with the best men in that part of the State. I ask that it be added to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment. The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move an amendment, to come in after line six hundred and forty:

For survey of reservation for the Sisseton and Wahpeton bands of Dakota or Sioux Indians, as per third, fourth, and fifth articles of treaty with said

Indians, February 19, 1867, $45,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. CONNESS. Where is this from?

Mr. RAMSEY. This comes from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I raise the question of order on the amendment. The Committee on Appropriations have had no notice of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is out of order unless reported by a committee.

Mr. RAMSEY. This item was placed upon the Indian appropriation bill, and that bill has gone to a committee of conference, and I understand there is no probability of the committee of conference acting on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It cannot be debated. Does the Senator appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to a question of order. It is that the Senator from Minnesota is not in his seat and his proper place, and cannot address the Chair out of it. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is overruled by the custom of the Senate from time immemorial. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAMSEY. I appeal to the Senator from Maine to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to propose an amendment based on a communication from the Secretary of State:

For expenses of the commission to run and mark the boundary line between the United States and the British possessions bordering on Washington Territory, $13,600.

I have a communication from the State Department, in which the Secretary says:

"I have the honor to inclose a copy of a letter of the 8th instant from Archibald Campbell, esq., and for the reasons set forth in that paper recommend that an appropriation of the amount specified by him be made by Congress to enable the joint commission of the northwest boundary to accomplish the object for which it was organized."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have another amendment which I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate, after making the statement, to present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to provide for the proper maintenance and tuition of the beneficiaries of the United States in the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, for the year ending June 30, 1869, $17,500.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will state the facts. This is what purports to be a deficiency strictly for the support of beneficiaries whom by the law we are bound to support at that institution; and it is not provided for in any of the bills that I have noticed. I hope I shall have the unanimous consent of the Senate to offer it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have another amendment which I desire to offer:

For the maintenance and tuition of the same, for the year ending June 30, 1870, $30,000.

I desire to say only a word in regard to this institution. For the deaf, dumb, and blind the Government has uniformly appropriated this sum of money for the support of this institution since I have been in the Senate; and this is the first time there has been a failure to do so. This appropriation should more properly have been on the legislative and executive appropriation bill, but it is not there. It was referred to the Committee on Appropriations informally, but was not passed upon by that committee. I submit it, therefore, to the judgment of the Senate whether they will make the usual appropriation for the next year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VICKERS. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line three hundred and twenty-seven:

For a light-house on Love point, on the northern extremity of the shoal, Kent Island, mouth of Chesapeake river, Maryland, $15,000.

Mr. CONKLING. What committee does that come from?

Mr. VICKERS. This appropriation is recommended by the Department, and is also to carry out a law passed in 1854 appropriating similar sums for the same purpose, so that it is in virtue of the recommendation of the Department and also to carry out an existing law. I will only say that it is a very important point. It is at the mouth of a river navigable for fifty miles and five miles wide at its mouth, and is necessary for the protection of the commerce of the bay as well as important for foreign commerce going to the city of Baltimore. I do not think it comes within the rule, and I suppose the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will hardly object.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is very unpleasant for me to cite to my honorable friend the thirtieth rule, but I think I shall be obliged to do so.

Mr. VICKERS. No question of order has been raised that I am aware of. As it was not raised on many other cases of less importance than this I hope it will not be raised here.

Mr. WHYTE. It is not raised. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has it been submitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then, if exception is taken, it is out of order.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. VICKERS. I offer another amendment, which is in order:

And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CONKLING, (at twenty-five minutes past twelve o'clock.) I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

NATIONAL BANK REPORTS.

Mr. CATTELL submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1881) regulating the reports of the national banking associations having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill, and agree to the same with the following amendments, namely:

In line fourteen, page 1, after the word "association" insert the words "above required."

Add the following as an additional section:
SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in addition to said reports each national banking association shall report to the Comptroller of the Currency the amount of each dividend declared by said association and the amount of net earnings in excess of said dividends, which report shall be made within ten days after the declaration of each dividend, and attested by the oath of the president or cashier of said association; and a failure to comply with the provisions of this section shall subject such association to the penalties provided in the foregoing section.

And the Senate agree to the same.

GEORGE H. WILLIAMS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.
SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
E. C. INGERSOLL,
JOHN LYNCH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I submit the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1672) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 29, 34, 35, 36, 40, 41, 43, 44, 45, 65, 71, 75, 76, 77, 78, 84, and 90.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 8, 10, 12, 13, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 30, 32, 33, 37, 38, 39, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 66, 67, 68, 73, 79, 85, 86, and 89, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the fourth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the words "one thousand dollars" and insert in lieu the following words: "ten dollars" worth for each member, seven hundred and forty dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the fifth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the words "two thousand dollars" and insert in lieu the following words: "ten dollars" worth for each member and Delegate, twenty-two hundred and sixty dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the sixth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line three of said amendment strike out the word "eleven" and insert in lieu the word "five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their seventh amendment, and on page 10, line fifteen of the bill, strike out the word "five;" and the House agree to the same as so modified.

That the Senate recede from their eleventh amendment, and on page 11, line twenty-five of the bill, strike out the word "legislative;" and the House agree to the same as so modified.

That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 24, 25, 26, 27, and 28; and on page 17 of the bill strike out all after the word "dollars," in line twenty, down to and including the word "classes," in line twenty-five.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the thirty-first amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: after the word "dollars," in line thirteen, on page 20 of the bill, add the following: "Provided, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall make a detailed report to Congress of the expenditure of this appropriation at the next December session, to whom paid, how much to each, and for what purpose, giving the items of each payment and the number of employees; and hereafter the said Commissioner shall estimate in detail by collection districts the expense of assessing and the expense of the collection of internal revenue."

That the Senate recede from their forty-second amendment, and that the word "and" contained in said amendment be stricken out and the word "at" substituted in lieu thereof.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the sixty-ninth amendment and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in lieu of said amendment insert "sixty-eight thousand five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the seventieth amendment and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the words "one thousand" and insert in lieu "seven hundred and twenty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the seventy-second amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the words "seven thousand five hundred" and insert in lieu "fifteen thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the seventy-fourth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: strike out of said amendment the word "fifteen" and insert in lieu the word "ten;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eightieth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment "twenty-five thousand two hundred" and insert "twenty thousand;" and at the end of line fourteen, page 42 of the bill, add the following words: "Provided, That hereafter the salaries of the clerks and messengers employed in this office shall not exceed the sum herewith appropriated."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighty-first amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out the words proposed to be inserted by said amendment, and insert in lieu "ninety thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighty-second amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the words "twenty-four" and insert "twenty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighty-third amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the word "ten," and insert the word "eight;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighty-seventh amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the word "seven" and insert "five."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighty-eighth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out the words "fourteen thousand eight hundred and fifty" and insert "ten thousand."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the ninety-first amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line six of said amendment, after the word "Departments," insert the following words: "the number of clerks in their several Departments, the number employed therein during the preceding fiscal year, when employed, and when discharged, and the amount of compensation received by each."

L. M. MORRILL.

TIMOTHY O. HOWE.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

BENJAMIN F. BUTLER,

W. H. KELSEY.

CHARLES E. PHELPS.

Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. THAYER in the chair.) The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire what disposition that makes of the provision as to the compensation of female clerks?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It leaves it as it was before.

Mr. POMEROY. As the Senate agreed to it, or the House?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It does not change the compensation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senate and the House both agreed to do that. The committee then, I understand, has stricken out what both Houses agreed to. I do not think the committee had any authority to do that. Both Houses agreed that the compensation of the females employed in the Departments should be the same as that of males for like service. The bill came from the House in that shape, and to some extent the Senate amended and enlarged it; and now, I understand, a committee of conference has struck it out entirely. I should like to know what authority a committee of conference has to strike from a bill what both Houses have agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But the Senator does not state the proposition accurately. The House and the Senate were not agreed on the proposition.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They were both agreed to raise the compensation to some extent.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir; they were not agreed upon any one point as to what they would do. It was that disagreement on which we were to confer.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have the bill before me here as it passed the House. It declares that—"The compensation of the female clerks authorized by this section shall be the same as clerks of the first class."

The Senate amended that by declaring that the female clerks, copyists, and counters should have the compensation of clerks of the first class. It put in "copyists and counters."

Mr. CONNESS. But it did not say they should have the compensation of clerks of the first class.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The amendment at one time as proposed did. I am not sure that I have the very words that were adopted.

Mr. CONNESS. I can state the substance of the Senate amendment very readily, I think. The Senate amended that provision so that when a female was employed as a clerk of any class she should receive the same compensation that a male clerk of that class received.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That was the proposition.

Mr. CONNESS. And in addition to that it provided that copyists and counters, being females, when they took the place of copyists and counters who were males, and received a higher compensation than the copyists and counters now did, they should receive that higher compensation. That was what the Senate did.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. All I intended to say was that the House and the Senate were disagreed on the question of compensation; and having so disagreed the committee of conference could not agree, and so recommend striking out the proposition entirely.

Mr. CONNESS. Of course we are sorry that the ladies are stricken out.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There was nothing clearer than the proposition of both the House and the Senate to place females on the same footing with males to some extent. Both Houses were in favor of that; and the committee have struck it out. I think it is defeating the will of the two Houses; and I trust the report will not be agreed to; but that the bill will be sent to another committee of conference for the purpose of correcting this report in that respect which misrepresents both Houses.

Mr. STEWART. I think it would be very well if this report were not agreed to. I think the very best provision of the bill has been left out by the committee.

Mr. CONNESS. What was that?

Mr. STEWART. That was a provision to place the business men, bankers, miners, and people of the United States, with regard to refining and parting gold, to some extent on as good a basis as they are in England and France, so as to give them a chance to compete with foreign countries in that regard. There are a few persons, exporters of bullion, who want to buy it cheap in the mines, thereby working as a tax upon the miners, who are opposed to this proposition and who want to put restrictions upon the business of the country. They are loading the Mint unnecessarily with business that does not belong to it, of parting and refining. For two years the Director of the Mint and the Secretary of the Treasury have urged a reform in this particular. The Senate placed it as an amendment on this bill. Last year it was passed by the House and stricken out by the Senate. Now the Senate pass it and this committee has left it out. I believe that a new committee would certainly retain it, and as we are getting along pretty well with our bills, I think we had better have a new committee of conference on this bill to consider those two items.

Mr. POMEROY. I think the two Houses, in the phraseology of the amendment with regard to the compensation of female clerks, did not precisely agree, but I think they did agree substantially; that is, they agreed to raise some class of the clerks. The House agreed to it, and we agreed to it and made some additions. I am surprised at this report of the committee of conference, because that proposition was not resisted in the Senate. No member of this committee and hardly any member of the Senate objected to what the Senate agreed to, which was not only all that the House had agreed to but something more. I confess to great disappointment with this report. I make no particular hobby of this question. There is a point in it that I think every Senator ought to insist upon, and that is that equal and exact justice should be dealt out to all persons in the employ of the Government. I cannot reconcile myself to any other course of procedure. I cannot conceive how Senators can content themselves to discriminate unfavorably against one class of persons employed in the public service. Because it has been an old custom is no justification of it. Because this class of labor is cheap from a necessity, and from a custom that has existed of not paying females half as much as males for the same labor, it cannot be justified on any ground of precedent. I confess I would rather have another committee of conference than agree to this report.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My friend must consider that if this bill goes to another conference it may as well go over until the next session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not at all; only two items have to go there.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It will be utterly impracticable to enroll this bill in time if you send it to another committee.

Mr. HOWE. And it opens the whole of it, every disagreement.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It opens the whole of it, of course.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Of course it is well understood in this body that if we disagree to this report it is only in reference to two or three items. The others can be agreed upon in a moment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senate should understand that we have one hundred and four amendments on the bill, and if it is left open it is open as to the whole of them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As to time the Senate need not be misled, as I think it would be if it acted on the suggestion of the Senator from Maine. There are over one hundred amendments to the bill. There is no objection made in the Senate to the report of the committee of conference upon more than two of them, I think.

Mr. STEWART. That is all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Now, if a new committee is appointed what will that new committee on the part of the Senate say? They will say at once to the conferees on the part of the House, "We agree to all the report of the former committee of conference except as to two items."

Mr. SPRAGUE. Suppose the House conferees do not agree to it?

Mr. TRUMBULL. If you assume that the House is ready to agree to take the whole of this report certainly they will agree to all of it but two items, and those will be the only matters in dispute. If the House disagree to the report then it throws it all open, of course, if they disagree on the whole substance of the report. We shall gain nothing by adopting the report here if the House disagree to it. But we are acting for the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator's argument is on the assumption that a new committee of conference would think precisely like the present one on all subjects except as to those two.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Undoubtedly they would after the Senate disagreed to it for specific reasons.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senate so instruct undoubtedly, but the Senate do not propose so to instruct.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it would be tantamount to an instruction. I should so regard it if I was on the committee of conference, and I think the Senator from Maine would.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator must understand that when this goes back to the House the House may wish to disagree for entirely different reasons, and that is altogether probable when it is considered that out of one hundred and four amendments a great many of them, I will say to the Senator, are matters of compromise.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have already replied to that. The House will either agree to this report of the committee of conference or it will not agree. If it does not agree to it our agreeing to it amounts to nothing. If the House does agree to this report of the committee of conference then it is willing to take one hundred amendments that have been agreed upon between the two Houses, and the question will be open as to the others. There can be no difficulty about it if there is a disposition on the part of the Senate to carry out what the Senate deliberately voted; and if there is a disposition on the part of the House to carry out what the House deliberately voted, which disposition by the action of the committee of conference has been thwarted, there can be no difficulty in having another committee and putting this as the two Houses intended it should be.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the Senator whether, as a matter of fact, if it goes to a new conference the whole subject-matter is not open to them?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have said that it would be and they could consider it unless the Houses instructed them; but I have said that when the action of the Senate, which its committee would bear in mind; was taken into consideration no committee of conference would be justified, when only two of the recommendations were objected to in the Senate, in opening the whole subject.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But the Senator is assuming that the Senate is satisfied with all the other amendments, when as a matter of fact—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should assume it if no objection be made.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. When as a matter of fact the other amendments have not been brought to the consideration of the Senate particularly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If nobody objects they are acquiesced in.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not agree entirely with the Senator from Illinois in his view of this case, that there was any agreement between the two Houses on this proposition.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not in detail, I admit.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not think the propositions of the two Houses were essentially alike. I do not differ from him upon the question itself. I should like to have the Senate amendment sustained, and I will vote with him against the report with a view to that end; but I could not put my vote upon the ground that the conference committee had violated their duty in the course they have taken, because I think they have disposed of a proposition upon which the Houses did not agree at all. But I incline to think that they might have agreed if they had made an effort on that proposition, because the House has shown a disposition to advance the salaries of the female clerks of the higher class; that is, of the more meritorious class as to labor and capacity; and the Senate have shown a like disposition, though they did not at all come near each other in their efforts to attain that end. I could wish, and do wish, that we may have another conference—I think there is time enough for that—with a view of expressing the position of the Senate more clearly, and with a view of doing, as I think, a palpable justice to persons who deserve it at our hands, who have no representation here except in us. I do think that of all the meanness that this Government is guilty of now there is not one more despicable than the refusal to pay a talented woman the same compensation for doing the same work and doing it as well as a man can do it. I call it despicable.

Mr. CORBETT. As I understand this disagreement, the House were willing to raise the compensation of a certain class of clerks. The Senate added to it the copyists and counters, who constitute a very much larger number. When it went to a conference I suppose the House conferees were not willing to include all the female clerks, which brought in quite a large number, some hundreds, and therefore to dispose of the case the committee had to strike out the whole thing. The Senate wished to raise the compensation of all the females employed, and the House only a few; and for that reason they could not agree, and therefore they disposed of the question by striking it out entirely. It seems to me that that was entirely within the province of the committee.

Mr. COLE. We have quite a number of hours yet before the end of the session, and therefore I shall not hesitate to vote in favor of referring this bill to a new conference committee. I suppose if there are only two subjects with which Senators are dissatisfied those two subjects only would be reconsidered by a conference committee that may be appointed. The one which relates more particularly to the Pacific coast I regard as of very great importance. I allude to the amendment relating to the refining of gold, a matter that has been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, and which is essential for the benefit of the industrial population of that region of the United States. The committee of conference have seen fit, on the opposition of persons living in the city of New York, and perhaps of Boston, to strike it out. It is a matter of economy to the Government; its aim is economy to the Government, and the adoption of it would save to the Government forty or fifty thousand dollars a year. Unless the proposition is adopted the appropriations for carrying on the branch mint at San Francisco as reported in the bill are certainly inadequate.

Mr. HOWE. What is the authority of the Senator from California for saying that that amendment was stricken out under the influence of opposition from persons living in New York and Boston?

Mr. COLE. It is improper, of course, to mention the names of members of the House here; but the Senator will remember that a member of the House from the city of New York was sent for and came into the committee and entered his protest and left a threat that the bill would be defeated in the House unless that was stricken out. That is my authority so far as that goes. I will not refer to a particular member of the conference.

Mr. HOWE. I beg leave to say that I do remember that there was a member of the House before the committee. I did not know that he was sent for. I do not know that he was not.

Mr. COLE. I know he was.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know that he made such a threat. I did not hear it.

Mr. COLE. I did.

Mr. HOWE. But if there was a member of the House who was opposed to that amendment there, there were two members of the Senate before the committee who were in favor of it.

Mr. COLE. Yes, sir; that is very true, and those two members were from the Pacific coast who were representing the interests of their constituents, or supposed they were. The opposition to it, I believe, has its origin in foreign influence, and for that reason more particularly we were anxious for it. We believe it to be a measure essential to our own people, and particularly those who are engaged in the hardy pursuit of mining. The opposition comes from those who are engaged in the business of exporting the raw material, so to speak, or unparted work. I am in favor of the recommitment of this bill to another committee of conference, that these two subjects may be again considered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think this report ought to be concurred in. If the bill is to become a law we had better agree to the report. So far as the pay of female clerks is concerned, I think that was a matter entirely within the power of the committee. I think the compensation of the ladies in the Departments is very handsome indeed as it is, and we had better adopt this report and go on with our business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is plenty of time. We have got to meet to-morrow morning, and there will be abundance of time to correct it if the Senate is disposed to carry out its former vote.

Mr. ABBOTT. I desire to say that I am in favor of raising the pay of the female employes in the Departments, and voted for it before; but I shall now vote to concur in the report of the conference committee, so as to get this matter closed up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We have plenty of time to close it up.

Mr. ABBOTT. We can fix that matter at some other time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think it best to reject this report on this account, entirely independent of the question whether these particular ladies' salaries ought to be raised. The truth is the whole Treasury Department must be very soon reorganized and the whole service put upon a footing entirely different from what it is now. It has got to be weeded out and corrected and readjusted. I have spent a year every odd day that I had and some that I had not working away there to find out what had become of the bonds and money and securities of the Government; and I have become pretty familiar with the way things go in that Department; and without doing injustice to anybody by singling out specimens I will tell the Senate the result upon my mind and upon the minds of my associates who worked there with me. It is a very bad policy to begin to tinker with the salaries there at this moment, any part at a time or all at a time, until we shall take up, on a bill devoted to that exclusive purpose, the whole subject and reorganize it. The public service calls for it most decidedly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference on this bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. HENDRICKS. Oh, no; look at the time of night.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I call for a division, if the Senate will not give the yeas and nays. The report was concurred in; there being on a division—yeas 22, noes 13.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOWE. I ask leave to make a report from a committee of conference.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1911) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 17, 22, 23, 24, 28, 29, and 30, and agree to the same.

They recommend that the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 1, 5, 16, 18, 21, 26, and 27.

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2½ and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: after the word "compensation" insert "exceeding one eighth of one per cent. in any case."

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the fourth amendment of the Senate so far only as it proposes to strike out the second proviso in said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the nineteenth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: insert in lieu of said Senate amendment the words "for the construction of basin and new dock barge office at New York, $25,000."

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the twentieth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out the words "fifteen thousand" and insert in lieu thereof "seven thousand five hundred."

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: insert in lieu of the words stricken out the words "for collecting, preparing, and printing the proceedings at the decoration of the soldiers' graves, under resolution of June 22, 1863, $2,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a resolution in relation to the printing of the debates of Congress after the 4th instant, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1803) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1808) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1746) for the removal of certain disabilities from the persons therein named, reported that having met, the committee after full and free conference were unable to agree.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that that bill lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

NATURALIZATION OF ALIENS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 654, to regulate proceedings in the naturalization of aliens; and I will state that I make the motion for the purpose of submitting a few remarks upon it if the Senate have nothing better to do. After that is done I shall withdraw the motion.

Several SENATORS. Go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. THAYER.) The Chair will state that the Senate came into open session for the purpose of receiving a message from the House and to act on reports of committees of conference. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The doors are open.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The reporter has been here all the time.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senate cannot proceed to the consideration of executive business and order the doors to be closed except by vote.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from New Jersey is going to speak I want the doors open.

Several SENATORS. They are open.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They are closed in point of fact.

Mr. CONNESS. The reporter is here.

Mr. WARNER. I move that the doors be opened.

Several SENATORS. The doors are open.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They are not open in point of fact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from New Jersey is in order.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I hope the doors of the galleries will be opened so as to make the room more pleasant.

Mr. WARNER. I submit the question to the Senate whether we are in executive session or open session. We went into executive session and there has been no order made to open the doors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is in open session; the doors will be opened. The Senator from New Jersey is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is now manifest, Mr. President, that a measure affecting the well-being of the whole nation and in which the people feel a deep interest must be postponed to the coming Congress. Before handing over the bill "to regulate the proceedings in the naturalization of aliens" to other hands I ask the indulgence of the Senate to say a few words.

The existing evil growing out of the naturalization law is, first, that a large and constantly increasing fraudulent vote is in certain localities being cast, and is defeating in many cases the legitimate will of the people and bringing into contempt American citizenship and suffrage. A second vastly greater evil is that fraudulent and counterfeit naturalization papers are extensively used as the ready and convenient bribe even in the illicit use of the ballot, thereby poisoning and corrupting the very fountains and springs of national life. That this evil exists is too patent to require proof. It is manifest to all the people; and with laws so loose in their enactments and in the provisions for their execution it might naturally be expected that such evils would exist. In some of the courts having jurisdiction over this subject sessions are continued until a late hour in the night. No records are kept. Roughs and bullies are admitted to the exclusion of respectable citizens and the reporters of the press. Large numbers of applicants for naturalization are vouched for by the same witnesses; and the whole proceeding is a disgrace to the nation. Such is the extent to which the evil has grown that courts having no jurisdiction whatever assume the high prerogative of conferring American citizenship; and in one instance a justice of the peace in the State of New York issued seventeen hundred pretended certificates of naturalization.

But the evils resulting from the abuses of some of the courts, great as they are, lose their importance when contrasted with those resulting from the manufacture, sale, and distribution by individuals of counterfeit certificates of naturalization. In the preliminary proceedings on an indictment in one of the courts recently had one individual appears to have furnished from five to seven thousand fraudulent certificates of naturalization, and there is good reason to believe that there are thousands who hold from year to year large numbers of these certificates to be loaned at elections to those who will use them to promote the party ends they seek to advance.

Mr. President, better far let a law be passed enacting that the very hour an alien places his foot on American soil he shall be a citizen than prostitute this great gift of American citizenship into a means of bribery and corruption. The boastful asseveration of the Roman, civis Romanus sum, is tame and unmeaning when contrasted with the full meaning of the declaration, "I am an American citizen." To possess a title to that distinction, the more precious because enjoyed and to be enjoyed by unnumbered millions, is the most priceless temporal gift of God to man. You must spend days in reflection; you must call to your aid the annals of history through long cycles of time; you must hear the cry of the oppressed for ages; you must listen to the tumult of a thousand battles, ending in a deeper degradation, before you can estimate the worth of American citizenship with its immunities from thralldom, its elevating rights and privileges, and its opportunities of dignified usefulness. Contrast our condition with that of those who live and move and have their being in a society where civil affairs are consigned to a pampered aristocracy, religious affairs to the priestly officials, social elevation to the domination of a caste, so that it is treason and sacrilege for the individual man to assume to be more than the food and fuel of a society which is but a grand machine of despotism, and by the contrast thus made learn what it is to be an American citizen. Here is a field of individual exertion which has no limits excepting those imposed by God on the original powers of the man. Here is a field of usefulness so inviting that none but the sordid and besotted can decline to enter it, and so captivating when entered that it requires a special edict of heaven to justify a withdrawal to retirement. If such be American citizenship, heaven forbid that it should be suffered by us to be prostituted to a mere means of corruption.

The acts conferring all civil and political rights on aliens are of two kinds, collective and personal; collective, where a State or country is incorporated with another, as, in 1803, when Louisiana was ceded by France to the United States, the third section of the treaty provided that its citizens should be entitled to all the rights and privileges of citizens of the United States, and a similar effect was produced when the republic of Texas was annexed to and became one of the United States. So in the reign of Queen Anne, when Scotland and England were formed into one kingdom.

Personal naturalization in England is now by special act of Parliament; and when, before the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the right of naturalization was with the States the right of citizenship was conferred for the most part by special acts of State legislation.

In 1787 the Federal Constitution conferred upon Congress the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization throughout the United States. At the second session of the first Congress, after the adoption of the Constitution, an act authorizing naturalization, after a residence of two years under the jurisdiction of the United States and of one year in the State where the applicant resided, was enacted. In 1795 the period of residence was increased to five years, with a previous declaration of intention to become a citizen of three years. In 1798 the residence was increased to fourteen years, with a previous declaration of five years. In 1802 the residence was reduced to five years, with a previous declaration of three years. In 1824 the declaration of intentions was reduced to two years; and so now stands the law.

After the adoption of the Federal Constitution some of the States claimed concurrent jurisdiction with the Federal Government; but in 1817 the Supreme Court of the United States determined that the power was exclusively in Congress. But now, though no State can confer citizenship, the States can and do confer civil and political rights upon aliens not inconsistent with the laws of the United States; and in most of the States aliens are allowed to hold lands, and in some States to vote. A law establishing a uniform rule of naturalization should be marked by a liberality harmonizing with the spirit of our institutions. We should not forget that one of the acts charged against George III in the Declaration of Independence was that "he has endeavored to prevent the population of these States, and for that purpose obstructed the laws of naturalization." But at the same time the laws should be so guarded with restrictions and sanctions that it cannot be brought into contempt by its violation with impunity, and that this great gift may not be made a means of corruption.

The bill which is reported from the Committee on the Judiciary to the Senate contains these provisions: the jurisdiction over the whole subject of naturalization is conferred upon the courts of the United States and upon a commissioner in each of the representative districts, with authority to the court and direction to the commissioner to hold sessions requisite to afford full and convenient opportunity for naturalization. Second, that one month before the final application the applicant shall file a notice stating when and where the declaration of intentions was made, where he has resided for the year previous, his name, age, occupation, and description of person. The proof of all the facts stated in the notice is to be made at the final hearing, and the applicant and his witnesses to be subject to a cross examination. There is to be a record kept of all the proceedings. The certificate granted is to take effect six months after its issue, thus avoiding the temptation to fraud which the approach of elections occasions.

The Secretary of State is directed to provide blank certificates, so guarded as not to be subject to counterfeit, and of which an account must be carefully kept; that all certificates that have been issued within one year last past shall be subjected to the inspection of the court or commissioner, and if approved to be so indorsed, and then to have the verity of a record; otherwise they are to be void; and that all certificates issued prior to a year last past may be so submitted, and if submitted and approved they are to have the validity of a record; and if not submitted they are to be subject to investigation before whatever tribunal they are presented for use. Provision is also made whereby those possessing fraudulent certificates may be compelled to surrender them. The bill also contains stringent provisions in the nature of penalties and sanctions.

And now, Mr. President, when about to end the pleasant relations which have subsisted between me and my associates here, I commend not so much the bill which I have had the honor to report as the great subject to which it relates to the careful attention of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. CONKLING. I desire to submit a motion to go into executive session, long enough at least to suspend the two-days rule, so that the confirmations shall not die with the session; otherwise all work is lost.

Mr. CATTELL. They do not die.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand that they do.

Mr. WILSON. There is a very small bill which I should like to have acted upon now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The executive business is not finished. Why not go through with the Calendar?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are not in executive session. Does the Senator move to go into executive session?

Mr. WILSON. I hope I shall be allowed to have a little bill taken up. It will not take a minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks for the present consideration of a bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Let me suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts, will it not answer his purpose just as well if we now go into executive session, and go through some formal matters, and then resume legislative business?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let us finish the executive business before we do anything else.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not like to press it against the wishes of the Senator from Massachusetts; but if he will allow me I beg to submit a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WILSON. Very well.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. CONKLING. We shall be back in a little while.

PRINTING OF DEBATES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York; but before putting that motion the Chair will lay before the Senate a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the Congressional Printer be directed to report and publish the debates of Congress, commencing at twelve o'clock on the 4th of March, until further and definite action can be had under the joint resolution recently passed.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the Senate concur in the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is a matter that must be disposed of in some way or other.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The contract covers everything. The parties will go on and report and print as usual.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senate will allow me to make an explanation—

Mr. FESSENDEN. The contract will cover everything.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is no contract at all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You can make one.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is no provision to publish the proceedings of Congress after twelve o'clock to-day.

Mr. CONKLING. They will be published, I suppose.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I saw one of the proprietors of the Globe, and he said they would have reporters here and go on until a contract was made; and I understood him to say that he notified the chairman of the committee to that effect.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CONKLING. I insist upon my motion for an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, at a quarter to three o'clock a. m., [March 4,] the doors were reopened; and, on motion of Mr. BUCKALEW, the Senate took a recess for fifteen minutes.

At three o'clock a. m., [March 4,] the Senate resumed its session.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business the doors were reopened.

PRINTING OF DEBATES.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following order:

Ordered, That the Clerk be directed to request the return from the Senate of the concurrent resolution of the House in relation to the printing of the debates of Congress after the 4th instant.

The Senate proceeded to consider the request of the House; and, in compliance therewith, it was Ordered, That the Secretary return the resolution to the House of Representatives.

MRS. ELLA E. HOBART.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the Senate now to take up House joint resolution No. 280.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 280) for the relief of Mrs. Ella E. Hobart. It provides that Ella E. Hobart, who was appointed as chaplain to the first regiment of Wisconsin volunteer heavy artillery, shall be entitled to receive the full pay and emoluments of a chaplain in the United States Army for the time during which she faithfully performed the services of a chaplain to the regiment as if she had been regularly commissioned and mustered into service.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is the funniest thing I have ever heard of in my life.

Mr. WILSON. I will state the facts of this case. This lady lived in Wisconsin. She went, like many other women, to help the soldiers and wait upon them in the hospitals; and such was her capacity and her devotion that the regiment elected her as the chaplain of the regiment instead of a man. She performed that duty, and went into the service and served for some time in that capacity, and when she asked for pay Mr. Stanton said there was no law of Congress that would allow a woman to act as chaplain of a regiment, and she received nothing whatever. The House have passed this bill. The evidence is full and complete. The lady is of high character and high standing and a great deal of capacity. I hope there will be no objection to its passage.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WIDOWS OF GENERAL OFFICERS.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Unless there should be serious opposition I should like to take up the bill granting a pension to Mrs. Hackleman.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is it a House bill?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir. The name that was added to the bill when it was last under consideration should be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WILLIAMS in the chair.) The question is on taking up the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think it very wise or creditable for this body to be passing bills at this time of night in the condition the business of the Senate is. There is scarcely a quorum here. Senators are not, from their great fatigue, paying much attention to business; and I hope the Senate will not persist in taking up any measure of this sort now. The Senator can call it up in the morning.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mrs. Hackleman's condition is such as to make it almost my duty to try to call up this bill; and I shall not be here to-morrow to do it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will call it up for you, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on taking up the bill mentioned by the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1741) granting an increase of pension to Emily B. Bidwell, widow of Brigadier General Daniel D. Bidwell, and to Sarah Hackleman, widow of Brigadier General Pleasant A. Hackleman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask to have the bill, as amended, read. If we are to do business here in this way at this time of night some of us may as well know what is going on.

The Secretary read the bill, as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Emily B. Bidwell, widow of the late Brigadier General Daniel D. Bidwell, for pension at the rate of fifty dollars per month from the 19th day of October, 1864, on which day General Bidwell fell mortally wounded at the battle of Cedar Creek, Virginia, to continue during widowhood.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the pension heretofore allowed said Emily B. Bidwell under general law be discontinued; but the sum received by her under the same shall be deducted from the pension hereby granted.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Sarah Hackleman, widow of the late Brigadier General Pleasant A. Hackleman, for pension at the rate of fifty dollars per month from the 3d day of October, 1862, on which day General Hackleman fell mortally wounded at the battle of Cornith, to continue during her widowhood.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the pension heretofore allowed said Sarah Hackleman under general law be discontinued; but the sum received by her under the same shall be deducted from the pension hereby granted.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the pensions hereby granted shall be subject to the provisions of the general pension law, except as to the amount thereof, as above provided for.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That an act entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to Emily B. Bidwell, widow of Brigadier General Daniel D. Bidwell, and to Sarah Hackleman, widow of Brigadier General Pleasant A. Hackleman," approved July 27, 1863, is hereby repealed.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Sallie P. Griffin, widow of the late General Griffin, late of the United States Army, now on the list of pensioners, the sum of fifty dollars per month during her widowhood, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire if that last section is an amendment put on in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is. The question is on concurring in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, if the Senate can be restored to order I should like to call attention to this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will resume their seats.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to lay aside this bill for a single moment in order to pass—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The other Senator from Vermont has the floor.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If my colleague will allow me, there is a bill which has passed both Houses—

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right; you shall have your turn, but this bill has got to be discussed. Now, Mr. President, this sum of money which you are going to vote to these three or four persons is not of any very great consequence. I suppose the tax-payers can bear it, particularly as we are perhaps not of that number; but you are establishing a precedent which will justly entitle all soldiers' widows in the country to a similar increase, and they are better entitled to have it. I repeat, Mr. President, that if we are to act on bills of this kind we must act under a certain sense of responsibility; for although it may be a very fine joke to pass bills of this kind to-night the records of the Senate will show it to-morrow and the country will know it to-morrow, and you will have entered upon a line of legislation to which there can be no end. In selecting out these three or four distinguished ladies who come here into the reception-rooms and the marble-room and make very persuasive appeals to us to give them fifty dollars a month, while a colonel's widow or a captain's widow with her little ones is having her ten or fifteen or twenty dollars, I say it may be a very fine thing to do to-night, but it is a thing which we shall all be sorry for to-morrow.

There is no justice in selecting from this great mass of persons, to whom we are paying as much pension as we can, a few favored individuals who happen to be about the Capitol and are pressing their particular claims. If the pension laws now give as much to soldiers' widows as the country can afford to pay then let them stand as they are and let all share alike. If they do not give to the soldiers' widows as much as they deserve and as we can afford to pay then apply it to all alike and elevate the amount of pensions you are to give them all. But what justification is there, I should be glad to be informed, for selecting out of twenty thousand widows in the land, or more, four, if that be the number in this bill, for special favor and consideration over and above all the others? There is no excuse for it; there is no principle upon which it can rest. That is the fact about it; and I should hope that at these last moments of the session we should not commit ourselves to an act of this kind; that however personally agreeable it may be to us to do it for these particular ladies, and involves in it such a grave impropriety, as it appears to me this does, as to make an invidious discrimination of this character. It ought not to be done.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to lay aside this bill in order to take up House joint resolution No. 474.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What is that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is a joint resolution that passed the Senate once and was considered and hung up. The same measure has now passed the House, and I understand there is no objection to passing it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What is it about?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is a resolution in favor of certain parties who started to lay a cable connecting our country with Russia, and who failed and lost about three million dollars, and who have pulled up about five hundred miles of their cable and have brought it back to New York in a damaged condition; and now in that condition, if they land it, they have to pay duties; and I suppose it may be worth something to them if they can be allowed to land it without paying duties.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will it be debated?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. No; nobody desires to debate it. It has been approved by the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the bill before the Senate be laid aside.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Informally?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not informally. You cannot lay it aside with my consent in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the pending bill be laid aside for the purpose of taking up the joint resolution indicated by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CAMERON. That is a resolution to take money out of the Treasury, as I understand it, and I am opposed to taking it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution proposed to be taken up by the Senator from Vermont will be read by its title.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. R. No. 474) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to admit free of duty a certain submarine telegraph cable.

Mr. STEWART. I object to that resolution; and if it is to be taken up I have an amendment that I wish to offer to it.

Mr. CAMERON. I should like to know the reason for the passage of such a resolution as this at this time.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I trust there will be no amendments made to it and that the Senator from Nevada will not undertake to embarrass it by any amendment. If he insists on offering an amendment I shall not call it up.

Mr. STEWART. I most certainly do insist on offering an amendment. I think it would be a very great outrage to pass any resolution favorable to this monopoly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think the Senator does not understand what monopoly it is.

Mr. STEWART. I think I do. It is the Western Union Telegraph Company.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. NYE. Not at all; it is the old telegraph between our country and Russia, of which they have taken up five hundred miles.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is a bankrupt affair.

Mr. STEWART. Let the resolution be read, and see if I am not right about it.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to deliver to the Western Union Extension Telegraph Company the submarine telegraph cable made to form a part of the Overland Telegraph Company to unite the United States with Russia and Great Britain, intended to be laid in the Behring sea, without the payment of customs duty thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on taking up the resolution.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate take a recess for ten minutes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We shall get the civil bill from the House in a moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; we shall not. I move that the Senate take a recess for ten minutes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think that is exactly the right way to treat these widow women. If the Senate do not want to pass their bill it is an easy thing to vote it down, but to take that sort of advantage of my proposition I do not think is right. I yielded to the request of the Senator from Vermont to call up his resolution as he was so zealous about it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It was a public measure, and had previously passed both bodies.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It was claimed that it was a public bill, and of course the telegraph companies had to crowd the widows aside. I do not think this is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on taking a recess for ten minutes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should sympathize with my friend from Indiana in favor of the widow women whom he desires to pension if he had not united a short time ago with a conference committee of this body who had made a report in opposition to the expressed wishes of both the Senate and the House in favor not of pensioning widow women, but of paying the same compensation to females for precisely the same work as is paid to men. Now, then, after the Senator from Indiana united with the conference committee of the two Houses to prevent such an act of justice as that, and against the wishes of both Houses, I do not think he is in a position to appeal to the Senate in favor of pensioning widows. I therefore regret very much that I have to vote against the Senator's proposition on account of his inconsistency.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish to say a word in reply to the Senator from Illinois, who complains of the action of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the legislative appropriation bill; and I wish to correct an impression which may go to the country and create a misapprehension in the popular mind on that subject. The idea seems to have prevailed to some extent that—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend his remarks to enable the Chair to receive a message from the House of Representatives?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1881) regulating the reports of national banking associations.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1672) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1911) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 784) to amend the judicial system of the United States.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes; asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. RUFUS P. SPALDING of Ohio, Mr. HENRY H. STARKWEATHER of Connecticut, and Mr. S. S. MARSHALL of Illinois, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 413) in relation to lands and other property of W. W. Corcoran, in the District of Columbia, used by the United States Government during and since the war of the rebellion; asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. GLENNI W. SCOFIELD of Pennsylvania, Mr. HORACE MAYNARD of Tennessee, and Mr. CHARLES A. ELDRIDGE of Wisconsin, managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House insisted on its amendments to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 178) tendering sympathy to the people of Spain; asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. NATHANIEL P. BANKS of Massachusetts, Mr. DEMAS BARNES of New York, and Mr. AUSTIN BLAIR of Michigan, managers at the same on its part.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1808) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. THAYER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 418) for the relief of John E. Reeside, and his sub-contractors, reported it without amendment.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the Senate to take up the civil bill for consideration with a view to the appointment of a committee of conference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw the motion I made for a recess in order that the Senator may make that motion.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am much obliged to the Senator; I had forgotten that.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House, and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. EDMUNDS, and Mr. HARLAN managers at the same on its part.

WIDOWS OF GENERAL OFFICERS.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to take up the bill laid aside a few minutes ago.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We want a conference on another bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to take up the bill granting a pension to Mrs. Hackleman and other ladies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. WILLIAMS.) The motion is to take up the bill mentioned by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope that will not be done. I do not wish to divide the Senate on it as things are now situated, but I must do so because I am opposed to this bill on principle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was not agreed to.

SYMPATHY WITH SPAIN.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the bill just from the House be taken up and the action of the House read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Resolved, That the House insist on their amendment, disagreed to by the Senate, to the resolution of the Senate No. 178, tendering sympathy to the people of Spain, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that that be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate take a recess until ten o'clock.

Mr. RAMSEY. Let us dispose of the business on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the Senate take a recess until ten o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, at three o'clock and thirty minutes a. m., took a recess until ten o'clock a. m.

MORNING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at ten o'clock a. m., [Thursday, March 4.]

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions:

A bill (S. No. 860) for the relief of Wright Duryea;

A bill (S. No. 896) confirming certain purchases of land in the Ionia district, Michigan, made by Charles H. Rodd and Andrew I. Campan;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 238) extending the time for the completion of the first twenty miles of the Cairo and Fulton railroad; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 195) requiring the Commissioner of the General Land Office to transfer certain money.

THE GALLERIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will do his duty and have less noise in the galleries or they will be cleared.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Unless the galleries keep silence they will be cleared. I shall make that motion unless the galleries are silent, so that business can be transacted.

HOUSE SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask leave to make a report. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 473) relating to the pay of the Sergeant-at-Arms, have instructed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. I ask unanimous consent to consider it now.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 473) relating to the pay of the Sergeant-at-Arms was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that hereafter the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, in lieu of all fees and mileage for summoning and procuring the attendance of witnesses before committees and the House and the attendance of members upon a call of the House, shall be reimbursed the actual and necessary expenses incurred in rendering the services, to be allowed by the Committee on Accounts and paid by the Clerk upon the presentation of a voucher sworn to by the person performing the service and certified by the committee directing the service to be performed, or by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, when the services are performed by direction of the House.

Mr. DRAKE. Is that a joint resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. DRAKE. I should like to know, if anybody can give me the information, why it should not include the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate as well as of the House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It would be quite fatal to amend the resolution at this time. I think we had better secure what there is in it.

Mr. DRAKE. Well, I will not throw any obstacle in the way of that much of reform.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate.

Mr. CRAGIN. I hope the resolution will not be acted on.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. CRAGIN. I object to the third reading of that joint resolution, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then it cannot be read a third time to-day.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the resolution (S. R. No. 108) constraining and giving effect to the joint resolution entitled "A resolution for the relief of the State of Wisconsin," approved July 1, 1864, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Walter Crane, of Michigan, for recognition of the right of the State of Michigan to escheat of lands which accrued while Michigan was a territorial government, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1588) for the relief of Solomon Oliver, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. CATTELL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 747) to regulate the price and encourage the production of cotton in the United States, reported adversely thereon and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

W. W. CORCORAN.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendment to the resolution (H. R. No. 413) in relation to lands and other property of W. W. Corcoran in the District of Columbia, used by the United States Government during and since the war of the rebellion, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the joint resolution and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. HARLAN, Mr. PATTERSON of New Hampshire, and Mr. VICKERS.

SYMPATHY WITH SPAIN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the message of the House of Representatives insisting on its amendments to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 178) tendering sympathy to the people of Spain, and asking a conference thereon.

Mr. DRAKE. That was laid on the table during the night.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the action of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate agree to the conference.

Mr. DRAKE. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

PETITIONS.

Mr. POMEROY. I have the honor to present a resolution from the Legislature of the State of Kansas relating to settlers on a portion of the Shawnee lands, in that State, asking that they may have the right to buy those lands at $1 25 per acre. I move that it be printed, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I present several petitions which I have received from the State of Massachusetts, signed by citizens of that State, relating to the right of suffrage, asking that in any change of the Constitution of the United States, or in any effort to make suffrage more general in the District of Columbia, there may be no distinction among American citizens, but that all, native and foreign, male and female, may be admitted to equal participation in the right of suffrage. As this subject has been disposed of, I move that the petitions be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Before the session closes I desire to make a brief statement—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is impossible to do business here unless we can have more silence in the galleries.

Mr. TRUMBULL. These ladies and gentlemen in the galleries ought to understand that the Senate has business to transact, and unless their sense of propriety will allow the Senate to do its business the Senate will be compelled to clear the galleries. There is important business yet to be transacted; some appropriation bills have not finally passed, and we must have an opportunity to do business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, at the last session a select committee was appointed by the Senate to inquire and report whether corrupt influences had been used upon the votes of any members of the Senate in the case of the impeachment of President Johnson. That committee had two meetings at the last session, but the adjournment arrived without any report being made. At the present session, by a resolution, the committee was continued. We are now about to adjourn and there will be no formal report made from that committee. I desire to state, however, that neither at the former session nor at the present one has any information been communicated to that committee upon the subject in regard to which they were appointed. From no quarter have we received any information which would even justify us in entering upon any regular investigation, and so far as the committee are concerned I have to say that nothing has appeared to justify any imputation upon any member of the Senate. I need hardly add my own private conviction, although that is very strong, that there was not the slightest ground for imputing to any member of the Senate or to any person connected with any member of the Senate the use of or subjection to any corrupt, illegitimate, or improper influences in connection with the impeachment.

Inasmuch as this committee was appointed at the last session and was continued at the present session, I thought before our adjournment it was proper for me to make this brief statement.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 783) to amend the judicial system of the United States;

A bill (S. No. 896) confirming certain purchases of land in the Ionia district, Michigan, made by Charles H. Rodd and Andrew J. Campan;

A bill (S. No. 860) for the relief of Wright Duryea;

A bill (S. No. 729) to provide for the execution in the District of Columbia of commissions issued by the courts of the States and Territories of the United States or of foreign nations, and for taking depositions to be used in such courts;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 195) requiring the Commissioner of the General Land Office to transfer certain money; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 238) extending the time for the completion of the first twenty miles of the Cairo and Fulton railroad.

COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a resolution I offered a few days ago, touching the compensation of committee clerks.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to the committee clerks their per diem salary from September 22 to November 11, 1868.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to explain to Senators concerning this resolution. The committee clerks were paid up to the meeting of the first additional session after the regular session, occurring in September. We made further provision for meetings of Congress to that time, and the clerks of the committees came and remained here as they were bound to do. It is a mere question of whether they shall receive pay for the additional sessions that we provided for and required them to come. It applies to only a very few persons, and I hope that it will be adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has that resolution been reported from the Committee on Contingent Expenses?

Mr. CONNESS. It has not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand they reported against it.

Mr. CONNESS. The resolution that was reported against was one which included all the messengers and attachés of the Senate, including the pages. This is entirely another thing, and the chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses informed me that he believed this should be paid. It was intended it should be paid, but the Comptroller finds a warrant for refusing to pay. I have just seen the chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses. He is a member of the committee of arrangements, and said he had to go. It is a very small matter.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move for the reading of the resolution.

The resolution was read.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that they were paid for the first provisional session.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The chairman of the committee himself requested me if anything in relation to these committee clerks was brought up to object to it until he could have time to present it.

Mr. CONNESS. That statement certainly does not relate to this resolution. The Senator can scarcely think that I would make a misstatement in this body. I have within ten minutes conversed with the chairman, and he said he would like to remain and support it, but had to be absent on the committee of arrangements for the inauguration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the ground on which you put it?

Mr. CONNESS. That they came. We created and provided sessions and they came. The resolution which he is opposed to is one which includes all the attachés of the body.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I spoke from information he gave me yesterday, and very likely the Senator from California is correct.

Mr. CONNESS. I am correct, sir.

Mr. BUCKALEW. As a member of the Committee on Contingent Expenses I have never agreed to any such resolution as this. As far as I understand the views of the chairman, they are very different from what have been stated by the Senator from California. As I understand from his statement, these clerks were paid up to the September session, when there was a brief meeting of the two Houses. The effect, then, of this resolution would be to pay them from September until the commencement of the regular session in December. I believe there was a formal, not a substantial, meeting of the officers of the two Houses in October and again early in November. That was a mere form. There was in fact no session of Congress and none was contemplated; and these officers were not here at all. They had no occasion to come and they did not come. As to the September session, there might be a fair presumption that there would be a session; but as I understand that they were paid up to and including the day or two days of the September session I see no reason for the passage of this resolution. If it was within the rule I would object to its consideration at this time.

Mr. CONNESS. It is up for consideration.

Mr. BUCKALEW. It is simply to pay a class of officers of the Senate who are among the best paid of all of them from September until the opening of the regular session in December, or nearly to that time, for services which they never performed, when they were not here at all in the city of Washington, when there is no reason or pretext in the world for voting the money except that it would be a very graceful and a very pleasant thing for those who are their friends in this body to give them a little gratuity of this sort at the end of the session. For my part I have always resisted here and elsewhere the voting away of public money for services which were not performed. This is clearly a case of that description, and therefore for one I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. FOWLER. I move to amend the resolution by adding the words "and messengers" after the words "committee clerks."

Mr. CONNESS. If the messengers should be included the pages should also. The reason why I did not include them in the resolution was that the committee reported against it.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 11, noes 15; no quorum voting.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cole, Corbett, Davis, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Harris, Kellogg, McDonald, Morton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Warner, Whyte, and Willey—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Conness, Drake, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Welch, Williams, and Wilson—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Bayard, Cattell, Conkling, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, McCreery, Norton, Nye, Pool, Ross, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Spencer, Sprague, Thayer, Vickers, and Yates—26.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end:

Provided, That no person shall be benefited by this resolution who did not actually attend the November session of 1868.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to know how many messengers and clerks are included in this resolution. There are about fifty or sixty, I believe.

Mr. CONNESS. I cannot answer that question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Only a few who lived here in Washington.

Mr. WILSON. That is all now. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont beyond all question settles it that none of the persons who reside outside of this city will receive any pay.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did they not attend?

Mr. WILSON. My belief is that they did not, though here and there possibly a man did. Many of them held themselves in readiness to do so and governed their business affairs accordingly and had to bear the burden of it. The hour came and they had notification like the rest of us that Congress would not meet. The few who reside in this city will get the benefit of it, but nobody else.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Manifestly the resolution ought not to pass in the shape it is, because it will pay to every person residing in Washington the additional compensation. Certainly they are no better deserving of it than others.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I agree with the Senator from Illinois in a part of his observations. Manifestly the resolution ought not to pass in the shape it is or any other. These clerks of committees get better pay than the regular clerks do who are paid by the year, and they did not come to attend these sessions, and I do not believe the clerks who lived in this city, if there are any, came either. Now the question is whether we are to pay constructive per diem to the clerks of committees when everybody over the country, clerks and all, knew that there would be no November session a long time before the period arrived for which it was appointed. I entirely agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania that we shall not be justified in expending the public money for any such purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand that the Senate has voted on the amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like a division on that.

Several SENATORS. Too late.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment was agreed to. The question is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move to reconsider the vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope it will be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall be glad to hear from the honorable Senator from Massachusetts upon what ground it is that he thinks we ought to expend the public money to pay constructive per diem to the clerks of committees who were enjoying themselves in Massachusetts and Vermont elsewhere in November.

Mr. SUMNER. They held themselves in readiness for service here, and it seems to me they have the same title that my friend, the Senator from Vermont, has to his compensation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, Mr. President, I cannot say that I held myself in readiness for service here then; and the Senator perfectly well knows that the law fixes an annual compensation to us and it fixed a per diem compensation to them. The result is that you cannot escape the position that you set, the precedent of paying the employés of the Senate constructive per diem, covering months of time when they were not here and not performing service, and when they and everybody else knew that they would not be required to come here and perform service.

Mr. SUMNER. And yet the resolution as amended by the Senator from Vermont will apply exclusively to those clerks who reside here in Washington; and it is favoritism to them. I wish to have all the clerks treated alike; those who were here in Washington and those who were not. That is the reason that I assign for the reconsideration of the proposition, which I think was hastily adopted.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Warner, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Conness, Fowler, Harlan, Kellogg, Morton, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Spencer, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, and Welch—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Conkling, Cragin, Doolittle, Henderson, Howard, McCreery, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Nye, Pool, Ross, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Thayer, Vickers, Whyte, and Yates—20.

So the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 239) more efficiently to protect the fur-seal in Alaska; and the bill (S. No. 875) for the relief of Mathilda Victor.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1881) regulating the reports of national banking associations;

A bill (H. R. No. 1803) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1672) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1911) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I make a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 7, 8, 9, 15, 26, 32, 34, 37, 47, and 48.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 16, 17, 19, 20, 21, 22, 24, 25, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 33, 35, 36, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, and 46, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line nine of said amendment, after the word "paid," insert "and no liability incurred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the word "fifty" and insert in lieu the words "twenty-five."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: at the end of said amendment add the following words: "Provided, That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury shall review the said claim upon its merits, and allow only so much, not exceeding said sum, as shall be just;" and the Senate agree to the same.

L. M. MORRILL,
JAMES HARLAN,
GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

R. P. SPALDING,
H. H. STARKWEATHER,
S. S. MARSHALL,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is impossible to understand that report without an explanation. I hope the Senator from Maine will tell us what the purport of the report is. What is the last proposition about a claim?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is in regard to a claim for military expenses of Iowa. The House recede and concur with a proviso that it shall be subject to the audit of the accounting officers of the Treasury.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is that all the change?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is all. I will answer any inquiry which may be addressed to me as to any other item. There are many minor items which I suppose will not interest the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

PAY OF SOUTHERN SENATORS.

Mr. MORTON. I move to take up for the purpose of having a vote on it, the resolution with regard to the compensation of the Senators from the reconstructed States.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay the Senators from the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Arkansas, and Louisiana the compensation allowed by law, to be computed from the commencement of the second session of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. FERRY. I call for the yeas and nays upon that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I feel that it is a mockery to undertake to transact business in this Senate Chamber this morning except so far as it may be absolutely necessary for the interests of the nation. I will therefore do in this case as I shall do in reference to every other piece of business, move to lay it upon the table.

Mr. MORTON. I ask for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Hendricks, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Stewart, Whyte, Williams, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Corbett, Fowler, Harlan, Morton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wiley—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Bayard, Conkling, Cragin, Doolittle, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Kellogg, McCreery, McDonald, Norton, Nye, Osborn, Pool, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Spencer, Trumbull, Vickers, Warner, Welch, and Yates—27.

So the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

A bill (S. No. 860) for the relief of Wright Duryea;

A bill (S. No. 871) to authorize the transfer of lands granted to the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, between Denver and the point of its connection with the Union Pacific railroad, to the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, and to expedite the completion of railroads to Denver, in the Territory of Colorado;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 238) extending the time for the completion of the first twenty miles of the Cairo and Fulton railroad;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 195) requiring the Commissioner of the General Land Office to transfer certain money;

A bill (S. No. 729) to provide for the execution in the District of Columbia of commissions issued by the courts of the States and Territories of the United States or of foreign nations, and for taking depositions to be used in such courts; and

A resolution (S. R. No. 239) more efficiently to protect the fur-seal in Alaska;

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 239) more efficiently to protect the fur-seal in Alaska; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 280) for the relief of Mrs. Ella E. Hobart.

PENSION TO MRS. LINCOLN.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 196, granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Lincoln, widow of the late President of the United States, who was killed during the war of the rebellion; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Cameron, Cattell, Conness, Corbett, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Harris, Kellogg, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Sawyer, Spencer, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, and Warner—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Cole, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Hendricks, Howe, Morrill of Vermont, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pool, Sherman, Sprague, Tipton, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Welch, Whyte, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Conkling, Cragin, Dixon, Drake, Henderson, Howard, McGreevy, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Robertson, Ross, Salisbury, Trumbull, and Yates—16.

So the motion was not agreed to.

TENURE OF OFFICE.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I move to take up the bill to repeal the civil tenure-of-office act; and upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fowler, Grimes, Hendricks, Kellogg, McDonald, Morton, Patterson of Tennessee, Vickers, Warner, and Whyte—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sawyer, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—35.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cragin, Fessenden, Henderson, Howe, McGreevy, Norton, Pool, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Salisbury, Thayer, Van Winkle, Welch, and Yates—16.

So the motion was not agreed to.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of two members be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that unless he may have some further communication to make the two Houses of Congress, having finished the business before them, are ready to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. WHITE the committee.

When twelve o'clock noon of March 4 arrived the Vice President-elect, Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, of Indiana, entered the Senate Chamber, and the oaths of office were administered to him.

Whereupon,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour having arrived for the termination of the Fortieth Congress, the Senate of the United States stands adjourned without day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 3, 1869.

The House met at ten o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. GEORGE F. MAGOUN, D. D., president of Iowa College.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had passed the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and the Post Office appropriation bill, with sundry amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

Mr. SPALDING. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move non-concurrence in those amendments and request committees of conference.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

RESIGNATION OF SPEAKER COLFAX.

The SPEAKER. Before proceeding to tender to the House of Representatives my resignation of the office of Speaker—to take effect at the election of my successor—I have, as the rules authorize me to do, asked Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, to preside as Speaker pro tempore when I shall leave the chair.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

The opening of the legislative day at the close of which I must enter upon another sphere of duty requires me to tender to you this resignation of the office which by your kindness and confidence I have held, to take effect on the election of a Speaker for the brief remainder of this session.

The parting word among friends about to separate is always a regretful one; but the farewell which takes me from this Hall, in which so many years have been spent, excites in me emotions which it would be useless to attempt to conceal.

The fourteen years during which I have been associated with the Representatives of the people here have been full of eventful legislation, of exciting issues, and of grave decisions, vitally affecting the entire Republic. All these, with the accompanying scenes which so often reproduced in this arena of debate the warmth of feeling of our antagonizing constituencies, have passed into the domain of history. And I but refer to them to express the joy which apparently is shared by the mass of our countrymen that the storm-cloud of war which so long darkened our national horizon has at last passed away, leaving our imperiled Union saved; and that, by the decree of the people, more powerful than Presidents or Congresses or armies, liberty was proclaimed throughout the land to all the inhabitants thereof.

But I cannot leave you without one word of rejoicing over the present position of our Republic among the nations of the earth. With our military power and almost illimitable resources, exemplified by the war that developed them; with our rapidly augmenting population and the welcome at our open gates to the oppressed of all other climes; with our vast and increasing agricultural, mechanical, manufacturing, and mineral capabilities; with our frontage on the two great oceans of the globe, and our almost completed Pacific railroad uniting these opposite shores and becoming the highway of nations, the United States of America commands that respect among the Powers of the world which insures the maintenance of all its national rights and the security of all its citizens from oppression or injustice abroad.

Nor is this all. The triumphant progress of free institutions here has had its potential influence beyond the sea. The right of the people to govern, based on the sacred principle of our Revolution, that all Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, is everywhere advancing, not with slow and measured steps, but with a rapidity that within a few years has been so signally illustrated in Great Britain, Spain, Italy, Prussia, Hungary, and other lands. May we not all hope that by the moral but powerful force of our example fetters may everywhere be broken, and that some of us may live to see that happy era when slavery and tyranny shall no more be known throughout the world from the rivers to the ends of the earth.

I cannot claim that in the share I have had in the deliberations and the legislation of this House, as a member and an officer, I have always done that which was wisest and best in word and in act, for none of us are infallible. But that I have striven to perform faithfully every duty, and that, devoted as all know to principles that I have deemed correct, the honor and glory of our country have always been to me paramount and above all party ties, I can conscientiously assert; and that I have sought to mitigate rather than to intensify the asperities which the collisions of opposing parties so often evoke must be left to my fellow-members to verify.

In the responsible duties of the past six years I have endeavored to administer the rules you have enacted for your guidance, both in letter and in spirit, with an impartiality uninfluenced by political associations or antagonisms. And I may be pardoned for the expression of gratification that while no decision has been reversed there has been no appeal—sometimes taken as they are by a minority as a protest against the power under the rules of a majority—which has ever been decided by a strictly party vote. If in the quickness with which a Presiding Officer here is often compelled to rule, hour after hour, on parliamentary points, and in the performance of his duty to protect all members in their rights, to advance the progress of public business, and to preserve order, any word has fallen from my lips that has justly wounded any one, I desire to withdraw it unreservedly.

I leave this Hall with no feeling of unkindness to any member with whom I have been associated in all the years of the past, having earnestly tried to practice that lesson of life which commands us to write our enmities on the sand but to engrave our friendships on the granite.

But the last word cannot longer be delayed. I bid farewell to the faithful and confiding constituency whose affectionate regard has sustained and encompassed me through all the years of my public life—farewell to this Hall, which, in its excitements and restless activities, so often seems to represent the throbbings and the intense feelings of the national heart; and finally, fellow-members and friends, with sincere gratitude for the generous support you have always given me in the difficult and often complex duties of this chair, and with the warmest wishes for your health, happiness, and prosperity, one and all, I bid you farewell. [Applause upon the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Speaker, as the instance of several political friends on this side of the Chamber, as well as in expression of my own opinions and feelings, I offer this resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the retirement of Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX from the Speaker's chair, after a long and faithful discharge of its duties, is an event in our current history which would cause general regret were it not that the country is to have the benefit of his matured talents and experience in the higher sphere of duty to which he has been called by a majority of his countrymen. In parting from our distinguished Speaker the House records with becoming sensibility its high appreciation of his skill in parliamentary law, of his promptness in administering the rules and facilitating the business of the body, of his urbane manners, and of the dignity and impartiality with which he has presided over the deliberations of the House. He will carry with him into his new field of duty and throughout life the kind regards of every member of this Congress.

The resolution was adopted unanimously.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I move that Hon. THEODORE M. POMEROY be declared duly elected Speaker of this House in place of Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, resigned, for the remaining term of this Congress.

Mr. PRUYN. I second that motion.

The motion was adopted unanimously.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed Mr. DAWES and Mr. WOODWARD a committee to escort Mr. POMEROY to the Speaker's chair.

The committee thereupon waited upon Mr. POMEROY and escorted him to the chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will designate Mr. DAWES, of Massachusetts, to administer the oath of office.

Mr. DAWES accordingly administered the oath.

The SPEAKER-elect, on taking the chair, addressed the House as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

In assuming for the few remaining hours of the session the arduous duties of your Presiding Officer, I can simply thank you for the high compliment which you have conferred. It has been my pleasure for eight years to mingle humbly in the labors of this House; and in retiring, as I expect to do within a brief period forever from all official connection with the American Congress, I carry with me at least this gratification, that in all those years I have never upon this floor received from a member of this House one word of unkindness nor one act of disrespect. The unanimity with which I have been chosen to preside for this brief period is evidence of itself that your choice carries with it no political significance. I can most cheerfully forego all the power and all the influence that attaches to the position of Speaker of the House; but there is a significance beyond that which a man must be differently constituted from myself if he can ever forget, and which arises from the kind personal consideration which is involved in my unanimous election to this most honorable position. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODWARD. I move that an engrossed copy of the resolution adopted by the House upon the retirement of Speaker COLFAX be signed by the officers of the House and communicated to our late Speaker.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate informing that body that the House has elected Hon. THEODORE M. POMEROY, one of the Representatives from the State of New York, Speaker, in the place of Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, resigned.

Mr. DAWES also offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed on the part of the House to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the House has elected Hon. THEODORE M. POMEROY, one of the Representatives from the State of New York, Speaker, in the place of Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, resigned.

The SPEAKER appointed as the committee to wait on the President Messrs. HULBURD, CULLOM, and WOODWARD.

MOUNT VERNON ASSOCIATION.

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a privileged question. I move that a message be sent to the Senate requesting a copy of Senate bill No. 588, for the relief of the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association. The bill passed the Senate without a division on the 9th of July last. It was referred in the House to the Committee on Appropriations, and it cannot now be found either in the committee-room, the Clerk's office, or anywhere. I am informed that the bill has passed among the private papers of the late Thaddeus Stevens, who was chairman of the committee at the time.

No objection being made, it was ordered accordingly.

RECONSTRUCTION—GEORGIA.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on Reconstruction, submitted a reply of Governor Bullock, of Georgia, in reply to Hon. NELSON TIFT; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS ON SHAWNEE LANDS.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for present action a joint resolution for the relief of settlers upon the absentee Shawnee lands in Kansas.

Mr. SPALDING. I demand the regular order.

SURGICAL HISTORY OF THE REBELLION.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business pending at the adjournment last evening, being the joint resolution (S. No. 217) for printing the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion.

The previous question had been seconded and the main question ordered, and tellers had been ordered on the passage of the resolution.

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. GARFIELD and SCOTFIELD as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 92, noes 22.

Mr. SCOTFIELD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. SCOTFIELD demanded tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were refused.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BROOKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 111, nays 44, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Axtell, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cake, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Clift, Coburn, Corley, Cornell, Cullom, Dixon, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eila, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Goss, Gove, Griswold, Grover, Harding, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Hulburd, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kellogg, Ketcham, Koontz, Lash, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, McCormick, McKee, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Newsam, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Plants, Poland, Price, Prince, Pruyn, Randall, Baum, Robertson, Root, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Smith, Spaulding, Stokes, Stover, Taber, Taffe, Thomas, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—111.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Benjamin, Brooks, Cary Cook, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Goldaday, Haight, Hawkins, Holman, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Thomas L. Jones, Kelsey, Kerr, Knott, Ludin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loughridge, McCarthy, Ross, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Starkweather, Stone, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aiken, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Woodward, and Young—44.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Bowen, Boyden, Boyer, Brewster, Burr, Callis, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Colfax, Covode, Dawes, Dehano, Deweese, Dickey, Eekley, Edwards, James T. Elliott, French, Gravely, Halsey, Hamilton, Haughey, Asahel V. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Kitchen, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, Mercur, Morrill, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Nunn, Pile, Polley, Robinson, Selye, Shanks, Stevens, Stewart, Sypher, Taylor, Tift, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Burt Van Horn, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—67.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADMISSIONS TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a point of order. I ask that the Doorkeeper shall enforce the rule and prevent the influx of persons who are not entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there are many persons on the floor now who are not members of the House, but who are privileged under the rules.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would inquire whether gentlemen elected to the Forty-First Congress are entitled to be on the floor? I take it that the rule does not cover them. I hope they will not be excluded.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Members-elect to the Forty-First Congress are entitled to the privileges of the floor. But all persons not privileged ought to be excluded, for if one is admitted others press in and the House gets full.

The SPEAKER. Members-elect of the Forty-First Congress are entitled to the privileges of the floor under the usage of the House. The doorkeepers will exclude all persons who have no right to admission.

NAVAL CONTRACTORS, ETC.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask leave of the House to report three or four bills from the Committee of Claims which they have passed upon and instructed me to report to the House. The committee has not been called since the holidays, and although these are private bills they nevertheless do in some sense touch the integrity of the nation. If the Government intends to keep faith with its own citizens these bills ought to be passed.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I insist on the regular order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then, I move to suspend the rules, because I think no order more regular than the one I propose.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope the rules will be suspended.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to report first the joint resolution of the Senate No. 100, for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of reporting it and some other bills.

The question was taken; and (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

ELECTION FRAUDS IN NEW YORK.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution, on which he called the previous question:

Resolved, That there be printed two thousand copies of the majority and minority reports, with the testimony, of the committee, on the alleged frauds committed at the late presidential election in the State of New York, and ten thousand copies of the same reports without the testimony.

The question was upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 72, noes 50.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question was, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 105, nays 47, not voting 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Blair, Boutwell, Boyden, Bromwell, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Calkins, Callis, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Deweese, Dixon, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Ferris, Ferry, Fields, Goss, Gove, Griswold, Halsey, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Hunter, Jencks, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koontz, Ladin, Lash, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Maynard, McCarthy, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, Newsham, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pierce, Plants, Poland, Raun, Robertson, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stover, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Auken, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, and John T. Wilson—105.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Baker, Barnes, Beck, Benjamin, Brooks, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Harding, Holman, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, Marshall, McCormick, McCullough, McKee, Morrissey, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Orth, Pruyn, Randall, Ross, Scofield, Stigraeves, Stone, Taber, John Trimble, Van Trump, and Young—47.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Barnum, Blaine, Boles, Bowen, Boyer, Buckland, Roderick R. Butler, Clift, Colfax, Corley, Corvode, Dawes, Delano, Dickey, Edwards, Eggleston, French, Garfield, Gravely, Hamilton, Haughey, Hawkins, Heaton, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Kelley, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Loughbridge, Mallory, Marvin, Mercer, Mungen, Norris, Nunn, Pettis, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Polsley, Price, Prince, Robinson, Roots, Sawyer, Schenck, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sypher, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Vidal, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—70.

So the main question was ordered.

The question was upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BROOKS. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 112, nays 52, not voting 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Bailey, Beaman, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Blair, Boutwell, Boyden, Bromwell, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Calkins, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Cornell, Corvode, Dawes, Deweese, Dickey, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Edwards, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Ferry, Fields, French, Goss, Gove, Griswold, Hawkins, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Jencks, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koontz, Ladin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Mallory, Maynard, McCarthy, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, Newsham, Norris, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pile, Plants, Poland, Price, Raun, Robertson, Roots, Sawyer, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stover, Sypher, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, John T. Wilson, and Windom—112.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Baker, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Benjamin, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Harding, Holman, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, Marshall, McCormick, McCullough, McKee, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Orth, Phelps, Pruyn, Randall, Ross, Scofield, Stigraeves, Stone, Taber, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Wood, and Young—52.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Blaine, Boles, Bowen, Buckland, Colfax, Cullom, Delano, Dockery, Dodge, Eggleston, Ferris, Garfield, Gravely, Halsey, Hamilton, Haughey, Heaton, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Kelley, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Marvin, Nunn, Pettis, Pierce, Pike, Polsley, Prince, Robinson, Schenck, Selye, Shanks, Starkweather, Thomas, John Trimble, Van Auken, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Woodward—58.

So the resolution was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1570) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes.

UNIFICATION OF COINAGE.

Mr. LAFLIN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to offer the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That there be printed five thousand copies of the letter of E. B. Elliott, esq., upon the subject of the unification of the coinage of the world, for the use of the House, and one thousand copies for the Treasury Department.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think we had better reduce the number from five thousand to one thousand. The subject of the unification of the coinage of the world interests only a few persons.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFLIN] has demanded the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. BARNES. Would it be in order to move to increase the number?

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order pending the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

On ordering the main question there were—ayes forty, noes not counted.

Mr. BROOKS. We have done printing enough this session; it is time to stop. It is too late at this period of the session to order additional printing. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed House bill of the following title, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 1911) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes.

REPORT ON COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

Mr. LAFLIN. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House five hundred extra copies of the report on commercial relations.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON MINERAL RESOURCES.

Mr. LAFLIN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That there be printed fifteen thousand copies of the report of R. W. Raymond, special commissioner of mining statistics, on mines and mining in the States and Territories west of the Rocky mountains; fourteen thousand for the use of the House and one thousand for the Treasury Department; and the Congressional Printer is hereby authorized to pay for the cuts illustrating this report upon the presentation of the proper vouchers not exceeding the sum of $175.

The previous question was not seconded; there being—ayes 33, noes 80.

Mr. ARNELL. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. LAFLIN. I wish to say to the House—

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a point of order, that the motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNELL,] that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. ARNELL. I withdraw the motion in order that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFLIN] may explain the resolution.

Mr. LAFLIN. Mr. Speaker, this resolution provides for the printing of the report of Mr. Raymond upon the mineral resources of the country. Mr. Raymond was appointed to perform the duties formerly performed by J. Ross Browne. This report embodies a vast amount of interesting information touching the mineral wealth of the United States and the manner in which that wealth is being developed. I am satisfied that if the House understood the nature of this report no man who desires anything printed would object to its printing.

Mr. ARNELL. I desire to ask whether the report of J. Ross Browne does not cover this entire question of the mineral resources of the United States.

Mr. LAFLIN. I will say this is one half of the number of the report of J. Ross Browne which was ordered to be printed.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPALDING. If there be no objection I ask that the amendments of the Senate to the deficiency appropriation bill be taken up and non-concurred in, so that they may go to a committee of conference.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask that the amendments be read. I wish to know what amendments have been put upon an appropriation bill before they are referred to a committee of conference.

Mr. SPALDING. I withdraw the motion, and leave the responsibility with the gentleman from Illinois of retarding the public business.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not wish to vote on an appropriation bill and on amendments of which I know nothing. I want to know what I am about.

Mr. LAFLIN. I will yield for two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. PILE. I certainly should not favor the printing of anything which would needlessly add to the enormous expenses of that department during the present Congress; but the withholding from the people of this kind of information in regard to our mineral resources is poor economy. The best thing we can do, in my judgment, is in every way to develop that section of our country. It will increase our ability to pay the public debt. I am sure if members knew the contents of this report they would not object to its being printed. They are of the utmost importance in view of the development of our mineral resources. I will move that the number be ten thousand instead of fifteen thousand.

Mr. LAFLIN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PILE. Ten or fifteen thousand ought to be printed. I am certain that there can be no more important information given the country than is given by this report.

Mr. LAFLIN. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana, chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word on this proposition. I have seen some of the advance sheets of this report and can cordially commend it. I have paid some attention to the question of our mineral lands and our laws relative to them, and I will say that I regard this as an exceedingly proper document to be printed. It discusses our mining laws and makes some valuable suggestions in reference to their amendment. Bearing as it does directly upon the legislative duties which lie before us in the coming Congress, I hope it will be printed, and in the largest number proposed. Mr. Raymond is a gentleman of high character, of scientific attainments, and has made the subject of mining a specialty; and there is no subject about which members of this body more greatly need correct information, and which, at the same time, more directly affects the question of our financial prosperity.

Mr. LAFLIN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MULLINS. Mr. Speaker, two minutes will scarcely give me an opportunity to express the ideas I should like to advance here. I have not given the attention to our mineral resources that others have, but I have given enough attention to them to have impressed upon my mind the magnitude of the interests involved in their proper development. For that purpose this printing is necessary. It concerns the opening up of our hidden wealth, which is now attracting the attention of people of every land. This geologist goes out as a pioneer and points out where are hidden mineral wealth, so that the labor which emigrates there may at once go to work to add to our national resources. His report ought to be published. It is the best information we can give to our people on that subject.

Mr. LAFLIN. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was disagreed to.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDEX FOR PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. LAFLIN. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That an index to the executive documents from the Twenty-Sixth to and including the Fortieth Congress and an index to the reports of committees for the same period, prepared under the direction of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, be printed for the use of the House and bound each in a separate volume.

This resolution explains itself. It provides for the printing of an index to the reports of committees in this House from the time when the former index ceased. Unless there is objection to the resolution, or some one wishes to make an inquiry, I demand the previous question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. How much is this to cost?

Mr. LAFLIN. It will constitute two volumes of about three hundred pages each.

Mr. HARDING. I ask whether there is any copyright attached to the work? Has the Clerk the copyright, and if so, will we be compelled to pay for it?

Mr. LAFLIN. No, sir. I do not understand that there is any copyright at all.

Mr. MILLER. Is this index absolutely necessary?

Mr. LAFLIN. Certainly; it is for the convenience of members.

Mr. GARFIELD. How many years does it cover?

Mr. LAFLIN. From the beginning of the Government to the present time.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to say a single word. We have a vast amount of valuable material in the form of public documents that are now almost entirely worthless from the want of an index. I have been in favor of so amending our copyright law, whenever the time comes that we can get at it, so that no person shall have a copyright whose book does not contain an analytical index. And I wish we might pass a law that no book shall ever again be printed by the House or by its authority of more than thirty pages without an exhaustive alphabetical index. I agree that this is an exceedingly valuable work, and as part of my remarks I will read an extract from a letter on the subject by the venerable Horace Binney:

"So essential did I consider an index to be to every book that I proposed to deprive an author who publishes a book without an index of the privilege of copyright, and moreover to subject him for this offense to a pecuniary penalty. If I had my own way in the modification of the copyright law I think I would make the duration of the privilege depend materially on its having such a directory—an index."

Mr. LAFLIN. I yield two minutes; one minute to the member from Massachusetts.

Mr. BANKS. This index embraces all the reports that have been made to the two Houses, including executive documents from the foundation of the Government. It has not cost up to this time one dollar. The Clerk is entitled to the credit of having performed his duty under a resolution I introduced without expense to the Government. If these two volumes are printed I think it will not cost more than fifteen hundred or two thousand dollars for a sufficient number to satisfy all the wants of the Government. The copyright does not belong to the Clerk but to the Government. Nobody can have an interest in it except the Government.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask if this refers to the Globe reports?

Mr. BANKS. No, sir; but to the reports made to the House, and the public documents.

Mr. LAFLIN. I yield a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will say, if it will not prejudice the resolution, that I am decidedly in favor of it. I was afraid to state it lest it would endanger its passage.

Mr. LAFLIN. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT REMARKS.

Mr. CORNELL obtained leave to print in the Globe some remarks on the resumption of specie payments. [See Appendix.]

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. LAFLIN. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That one thousand copies of the report of the committee relative to Prince Edward Island be printed for the use of the House.

I yield one minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I merely desire to say that this is a motion to print this report to be sent to Prince Edward Island in return for the report of the proceedings that was printed there.

Mr. PIKE. I would inquire whether the report advocates reciprocity?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It does not. It advocates no reciprocity, either by legislation or by treaty.

Mr. PIKE. Somebody has been advocating reciprocity, and I cannot find out who.

Mr. LAFLIN. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. LAFLIN. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House two thousand extra copies of the testimony of officers of the Army taken before the Committee on Military Affairs, and the report of the committee accompanying the same.

I yield three minutes to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to explain the nature of the resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. In this report, which has already been ordered to be printed, and of which two thousand extra copies are called for by this resolution, there is a complete statement of the distribution of the Army, the number of civil employés in each staff department and in the War Department generally, an exhibition also of the number of enlisted men detailed on extra duty, with the monthly pay of each, and suggestions and facts drawn out by the examination of twelve or thirteen leading officers of the Army in regard to its present organization, together with suggestions as to how it may be reduced and its expenditures greatly lessened. We have not time to go into legislation upon that subject this session, but the report and the testimony containing all these facts concerning the present status of the Army will be most valuable as the basis of future legislation. What is asked for in this resolution is simply the printing of a sufficient number of copies that each member may send five or six, or perhaps ten copies at the outside, to such leading officers of the Army or others as may desire to make further suggestions before legislation in the next Congress may be called for. I know of no reason why this should not be done, and I presume there will be no objection to it.

Mr. LAFLIN. I yield for two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. We have a report from the Secretary of War, a report from the General of the Army, a report from the Adjutant General of the Army, and reports from the heads of the different bureaus connected with the Army. Besides that we have the report of the very able chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I cannot see the necessity of printing the testimony taken before the committee.

While I am up I particularly desire to enter my protest against this practice of here in the closing hours of the session precipitating upon the House all these reports from the Committee on Printing for printing documents about which we can have no consideration, no deliberation, and no discussion.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say to my friend from Illinois that this document has been ordered to be printed, and it is only a question whether we shall have these extra copies for use by members of the House. I desire to say further that if the coming Congress wishes to go into a thorough and careful reduction of the Army and its expenditures there is no document, there is no report, and, so far as I know, there never has been a document or a report that in its statistical information and in its carefully-prepared statements from persons to be relied upon as knowing all they talk about, will at all compare in value with this document. I do not say this because the Committee on Military Affairs had charge of the matter, but in consequence of the distinguished official sources from which these statements come.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. There has already been one copy printed for each member of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say to the gentleman that there are facts contained in this report which are not to be found in other documents. For instance, we find by the testimony that there are to-day fifteen thousand persons employed in the quartermaster's department alone, at a pay of nearly half a million dollars a month, and of that number more than ten thousand are civilians, and a little over four thousand are soldiers and enlisted men detailed on extra duty.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have seen the same statement in all the papers of the country.

Mr. LAFLIN. I move the previous question.

The question was put on seconding the previous question, and there were—ayes 46, noes 50; no quorum voting.

Mr. LAFLIN called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LAFLIN and Mr. SCOFIELD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 53.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question was, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 61, noes 55.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. GARFIELD called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes sixty-four noes not counted.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. LAFLIN. I move to reconsider the various votes disposing of the resolutions from the Committee on Printing; and I also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER.

Mr. HULBURD, on behalf of the committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States, and to inform him of the resignation of Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, and the election of Hon. THEODORE M. POMEROY as Speaker of this House for the remainder of the Fortieth Congress, reported that the committee had performed that duty.

The SPEAKER. The report will be entered upon the Journal.

BUSINESS FROM COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask unanimous consent of the House for permission to make sundry reports from the Committee on Accounts. That committee has not been called this session, and they have had referred to them several important matters which require action by the House.

Mr. HIGBY. How long will it take?

Mr. BROOMALL. Half an hour, perhaps.

Mr. ECKLEY. I object. I desire to say that I am on the Committee on Accounts, and I know nothing about this report.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to suspend the rules in order to allow me to make reports at this time from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. ECKLEY. On that motion I ask for tellers.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers; and there were fifteen in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one fifth of a quorum) tellers were not ordered.

The question was taken upon suspending the rules; and upon a division there were—ayes 68, noes 40.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

CONTINGENT FUND OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BROOMALL. I now call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House recommitted to the Committee on Accounts a report presented on Saturday last.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the report?

Mr. BROOMALL. It is report No. 36, of this session, of the Committee on Accounts, who were directed by resolution of July 15, 1868, to investigate the disbursement of the contingent fund of the House for the years 1867 and 1868, with power to send for persons and papers, when the same can be done without expense to the Government.

I do not desire to have this report read at length unless members desire to hear it read. It refers to certain resolutions, &c., which I propose to offer one at a time. The report has been printed and laid upon the tables of members.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope we shall be permitted to hear from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ECKLEY] on this subject. He is a member of the Committee on Accounts, and has just made a very remarkable statement here.

Mr. BROOMALL. I will yield to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. ECKLEY,] the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ECKLEY. A report has been laid upon our tables that has been made without my knowledge as a member of the Committee on Accounts. I was in the committee, and disagreed to a report that was submitted. But that report was afterward submitted to the House late at night, as I understood, when there were but few members here. It purports to be a report from the Committee on Accounts. I did not agree to the report because it did not contain matters which I thought had been referred to the Committee on Accounts, and because it contained statements of facts which I knew to be not true.

Mr. BROOMALL. All I can say is that I was directed by the majority of the committee to make this report. I know my colleague on the committee dissented from the report of the committee. I have no kind of objection to his making a minority report if he desires to do so.

Mr. ECKLEY. I would inquire of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCULLOUGH] ever concurred in that report?

Mr. BROOMALL. The gentleman from Maryland was not one of those assenting to the report, although I believe he has no particular objection to it.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. The first I knew of this report was on Saturday morning last. When the chairman read the report to the committee I observed it contained statements of facts of which I then knew nothing, and which I have reason now to believe are not stated as they should be.

On Saturday morning last I asked the chairman of the committee [Mr. BROOMALL] not to submit that report to the House until I had had an opportunity to investigate the facts, for I desired to join in the report of the majority of the committee if I could do so. There are certain allegations in that report, and one in particular, in regard to which I asked the chairman where he got his information, and he could not tell me. It is alleged in the report that certain employes of the Government on the pay-roll of the House were employed in the committee-room of the Republican party during the last presidential election. It is also alleged that certain employes were taken from the executive department of the Government and employed by the Democratic party. I asked the chairman for the evidence of that. He could not give it to me. He said that was the general report. I then asked him not to make that report until I could have an opportunity of investigating it. He promised me to do so. The first thing I knew was that this report was presented to the House late on Saturday night—a report professing to come from the committee, not from a majority of the committee. I told him then that I had no time to prepare a minority report at the heel of the session, and asked him that before he made the report I might have an opportunity to investigate the facts.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, I had not the slightest idea of being discourteous toward my colleague on the committee, [Mr. McCULLOUGH.] He is certainly mistaken as to the position in which this matter stands before the House. I did not make a report on Saturday night. I presented the report of the majority of the committee and asked that it be recom-mitted and ordered to be printed. I notified my colleague that before the close of the session, probably on the last legislative day, I would call it up, giving him an opportunity to be present.

With respect to the question he asks about the authority of the majority of the committee to say that the political parties obtained assistance from the legislative and executive departments for the distribution of their documents, I can only say that I know the fact of my own personal knowledge.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. That is what you did not say when I asked you.

Mr. BROOMALL. I know further that the report is a little too lenient toward the gentleman's own party, because one man who was obtained from the legislative department for the political service of his party is not mentioned in the report because the fact was not known to the majority of the committee at the time. The committee do not blame anybody for this. They simply state the fact. It was the most natural thing in the world that the surplus time of the employes of the House should be devoted to the dissemination of the political principles of the political parties; and I do not know that it has ever been a matter of complaint. As it may possibly have increased the contingent expenses of the Government, it was so far as it did so wrong; but so far as it merely employed the spare time of those who had to be retained during the recess there was no harm in it.

I say now that the majority of the committee, to wit, three members, are now present and make this report. It is not the report of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ECKLEY] or of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. McCULLOUGH,] my colleagues on the committee; but I think the gentleman from Maryland will say, in fairness to the majority, that he does not materially dissent from any part of their report. I yield to him for a moment.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. As I stated before, I know nothing about the facts contained in this report, and that is what I complain of. I will, however, state again that when the gentleman made the allegation that certain employes had been in the employ of the Democratic party during the last presidential election while they were receiving pay from the Government I asked him for the evidence of that fact, and he told me he did not know where it was. Now, if he has the evidence, which he could not give to me on last Saturday morning, I would like him to state it. What I complain of is that this report was made without giving me an opportunity to investigate the truth or falsity of the statements made. The gentleman says he has not made this report.

Mr. BROOMALL. Not until just now.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Why, the report as printed begins: "Mr. BROOMALL, from the Committee on Accounts, made the following report."

Mr. BROOMALL. To be recommitted.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. That report was made on Saturday last. It was printed and goes to the country as printed, and what I complain of is that it has been made without giving us, the minority of the committee, an opportunity to investigate the matter, and when we now have no time to make an investigation for the purpose of preparing a minority report.

Mr. BROOMALL. I must resume the floor, because otherwise too much time will be occupied with this matter. I desire to yield one moment to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNELL,] that he may state whether or not this is the report of the committee.

Mr. ARNELL. Mr. Speaker, this report was certainly made from the Committee on Accounts. I, as one of the members of that committee, gave my assent to it. It is certainly my report and the report of the majority of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. BROOMALL. I now yield to my other colleague on the committee, from New York.

Mr. FIELDS. I have only to say that this report was endorsed by a majority of the Committee on Accounts.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 596) granting a pension to Mary A. Davis, widow of William P. Davis, a private in the — regiment of Indiana volunteers in the war of 1861; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 468) authorizing the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, to change its name to the Kansas Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the same committee, also reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 167) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon-road from the navigable waters of Coos bay to Roseburg, in said State;

An act (S. No. 228) for the further security of equal rights in the District of Columbia;

An act (S. No. 264) for the relief of Henry C. Noyes;

An act (S. No. 584) relating to the time for finding indictments in the courts of the United States in the late rebel States;

An act (S. No. 612) relating to the proof of wills in the District of Columbia;

An act (S. No. 661) for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel John W. Davidson, of the United States Army;

An act (S. No. 665) respecting the organization of militia in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas;

An act (S. No. 679) to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of said State;"

An act (S. No. 705) further to provide for giving effect to the treaty stipulations between this and foreign Governments;

An act (S. No. 711) relating to the Metropolitan Railroad Company;

An act (S. No. 712) to define the fees of recorder of deeds, and to provide for the appointment of warden of the jail in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 722) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," by extending certain penalties to accessories;

An act (S. No. 753) to provide for the execution of judgments in capital cases;

An act (S. No. 760) for the relief of Rev. D. Hillhouse Buel;

An act (S. No. 781) for the relief of Alpheus C. Gallahue;

An act (S. No. 810) to regulate elections in Washington and Idaho Territories;

An act (S. No. 836) for the relief of Celestra P. Hartt;

An act (S. No. 844) for the relief of Captain Charles Hunter, United States Navy;

An act (S. No. 862) amendatory of the act providing for the sale of the arsenal grounds at St. Louis and Liberty, Missouri, and for other purposes, approved July 25, 1868;

An act (S. No. 891) for the relief of George Fowler and the estate of De Grasse Fowler, deceased, or their assigns; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 200) reappointing Louis Agassiz a regent of the Smithsonian Institution.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. BROOMALL. I yield the floor for a moment to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to take up from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the deficiency appropriation bill, for the purpose of moving to non-concur in the same and ask for a conference.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask for the reading of the amendments.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. BROOMALL. I cannot yield for that.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, announced that that body had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 217) for printing the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion.

The message further announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 178) tendering sympathy to the people of Spain.

FURNITURE OF THE CAPITOL.

Mr. BROOMALL. I report from the Committee on Accounts, the five members of the committee concurring in the same, the following resolution:

Resolved, That it shall be the duty of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to examine from time to time the furniture and carpeting of the Hall, committee-rooms, corridors, and other apartments under the control of the House of Representatives, and to direct the Clerk by resolution to furnish and refurnish the same whenever it shall be necessary; and no such furnishing or refurnishing, except ordinary repairs not exceeding $100 in any one room or apartment in any single year, shall be done by the Clerk without such resolution. All accounts for furnishing and refurnishing made under the direction of this resolution, when presented to the Committee of Accounts for approval, shall be accompanied by a copy of the resolution directing the same.

According to the practice heretofore there has been no action required either of the House or of any committee for the purpose of authorizing the Clerk to refurnish the committee-rooms and Hall of the House. It has been felt for a long time to be a practice liable to great abuse. The present Clerk has called the attention of our committee to the matter. What the committee propose is this: not as heretofore to let the Clerk take the initiative in the absence of Congress in repairing and refurnishing the Hall and the committee-rooms, but to require the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to examine every case where it is said repairs and refurnishing are required, and to pass a resolution, if the committee believe it necessary, requiring the Clerk to have it done, and that that resolution shall accompany the vouchers to the Committee on Accounts for approval. This will bring the matter under the direction of two committees, one in advance and the other afterward, instead of only a single one as now. At present the only check upon the Clerk is the Committee on Accounts in the after approval, when it is too late to make objection without involving the committee and the Clerk is a great deal of trouble. This will obviate all that difficulty. I have no doubt the five members of the committee will aid in passing this resolution. I yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I think something of this kind is very proper and necessary. As a member of the Committee on Accounts I have been called upon on several occasions to approve bills which I had great doubt about. I understand that the Clerk of the House is made the agent of the House and that he has power, without first obtaining the sanction of the House, to make these purchases. In pursuance of that power he has made contracts and has paid bills, and the question which came before the Committee on Accounts was whether we ought to pass bills after the Clerk had contracted the debt and paid the money. Believing that he was the agent of Congress to make these contracts I believed it would be acting in bad faith not to sanction the bills which he had paid, and therefore I gave my consent to this resolution.

There has been, however, some inconsistency in this matter. The other day an account was passed giving to one contestant for a seat in this House, Mr. Switzer, of Missouri, $5,000. On the same day, I believe, when that resolution passed another resolution was passed giving to John D. Young, of Kentucky, $2,509. The Committee on Accounts passed the $5,000 and refused to give John D. Young the $2,509, and based their action upon the fact that the Clerk had paid the $5,000.

We want some legislation upon this subject. No money can be drawn from the contingent fund of the House without the approval of the Committee on Accounts; but when that power was conferred on the Committee on Accounts by Congress, Congress never had an idea that the Committee on Accounts would refuse to sanction the payment of money which had been voted by a resolution of the House. I take the ground that when the House adopts a resolution of that kind appropriating money it is the duty of the Committee on Accounts to pass the account. I repeat that I think some legislation, such as is indicated in that resolution, ought to be passed.

Mr. ECKLEY. I rise to a question of order. I make the point of order that this resolution is no part of the report of the committee. The report does not conclude by recommending its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion to reconsider. That question of order does not arise until the motion to reconsider is disposed of.

Mr. ECKLEY. Then the resolution is not before the House?

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not before the House.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to have this matter understood by the House before the motion to reconsider is put; and for that reason I send up a joint resolution in relation to the pay of the Sergeant-at-Arms and ask to have it read for information, and then I will explain it.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that from and after its passage the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, in lieu of all fees and mileage for summoning and procuring the attendance of witnesses before the committees of the House and the attendance of members upon a call of the House, shall be reimbursed the actual and necessary expenses incurred in rendering the service, to be allowed by the Committee on Accounts and paid by the Clerk upon the presentation of vouchers sworn to by the persons performing the service and the certificate of the committee directing the services to be performed, or by the Clerk when the services are performed by the direction of the House.

Mr. DRIGGS. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman has moved to suspend the rules in order to make a report.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to reconsider the vote by which the report was recommended.

Mr. DRIGGS. Well, pending that motion, he offers a series of resolutions and proceeds to discuss them preliminarily to the vote being taken on the motion to reconsider. I submit that that is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has a right to have the resolution read as a part of his remarks on the motion to reconsider, which is debatable.

Mr. BROOMALL. It will be obvious that that resolution points directly to a way of reforming a special abuse.

Mr. DRIGGS. I am in favor of the resolution.

Mr. BROOMALL. According to the practice as it now is, and according to the law, the Sergeant-at-Arms is allowed ten cents per mile circular for summoning a witness from any point in the United States. To get a witness from New York by this process costs the Government about fifty dollars. To get one from San Francisco costs the Government $1,360. Now, since the law was passed allowing the Sergeant-at-Arms mileage, the telegraph has been established, reaching every part of the country, and the mail service has been greatly perfected. By these means, and by a judicious use of them, it will be rendered unnecessary in almost all cases to summon witnesses at all. The object of this resolution is to cut off that expenditure, and to induce the committees and the House to resort to the other means of procuring the attendance of witnesses which I have indicated. A willing witness will come upon a telegraphic dispatch. An unwilling one can be summoned for a very small sum by sending subpoenas by mail to some special deputy in his neighborhood. I should think at least $1,300 could be saved in this way on each witness from San Francisco.

Let me say that what I say now is the result of some experience upon investigating committees. And the practice which I have indicated as that which should be established by law has been the practice of investigating committees upon which I have been, and it has worked well. And I may say now that the Sergeant-at-Arms has himself been instrumental in pointing out to the committee this leak in the contingent fund of the House. I would not have made this statement yesterday, because it would have been improper to do so. But the events which have since transpired make it proper that I should do this justice to our Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. BROOMALL. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] has had large experience on this Committee on Accounts. Before he retires from Congress I think he would do the country a service if he would perfect and present along with his report a bill to remedy some of the defects he has pointed out. I would inquire if he has drafted a bill providing for the service of process by telegraph or mail? And would it not be well to provide means for the appointment of agents in different parts of the country to take depositions for the committees of Congress?

Mr. BROOMALL. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] I will state that it was the intention of the Committee on Accounts, at the commencement of the present Congress, to prepare a bill and report it to the House embodying a series of reforms in this direction. But a joint committee was appointed for the purpose of reorganizing the official service of both Houses, and this matter with others was referred to them. No report has been made from that committee, and the Committee on Accounts has not had time since it was ascertained that the other committee would not report to prepare a bill of the kind.

I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] for his compliment to the Committee on Accounts; and I only trust the reforms began by the present Committee on Accounts will be carried out by subsequent committees. I have no interest in this matter other than that of a citizen of the United States, for my period of enlistment will expire when the Speaker's hammer falls at noon to-morrow.

I have indicated the kinds of resolutions referred to in the report, and I now ask the House to reconsider the vote by which the report was recommitted, in order that I may bring these resolutions before the House. I have referred to two of them; there are two others to refer to which I will not now take the time of the House. I now call the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion to recommit.

Mr. BROOMALL. I now withdraw the motion to recommit.

FURNISHING COMMITTEE-ROOMS, ETC.

Mr. BROOMALL. I report from the Committee on Accounts the resolution I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it shall be the duty of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to examine from time to time the furniture and carpeting of the Hall, committee-rooms, corridors, and other apartments under the control of the House of Representatives, and to direct the Clerk by resolution to furnish or refurnish the same whenever it shall be necessary, and no such furnishing or refurnishing, except ordinary repairs, not exceeding $100 to any one room or apartment in any single year, shall be done by the Clerk without such resolution. All accounts for furnishing or refurnishing made under the direction of this resolution when presented to the Committee on Accounts for approval, shall be accompanied by a copy of the resolution directing the same.

Mr. BROOMALL. I call the previous question on this resolution, as it has been discussed sufficiently already.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

FEES OF SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. BROOMALL, from the Committee on Accounts, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 473) relating to the fees of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that from and after the passage of this joint resolution the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, in lieu of the fees and mileage for summoning and procuring the attendance of witnesses before committees of the House, and the attendance of members upon a call of the House, shall be reimbursed the actual and necessary expenses incurred in rendering the service, to be allowed by the Committee on Accounts, and paid by the Clerk upon the presentation of vouchers sworn to by the person or persons performing the service, and certified by the committee directing the service or by the Clerk of the House of Representatives when the services are performed by order of the House.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, I believe that is understood. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BROOMALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. BROOMALL. The Committee on Accounts have directed me to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the clerks of the several committees of the House of Representatives be paid out of the contingent fund of the House each a sum sufficient to make his pay during the Fortieth Congress, with what he has already received, equal to six dollars per diem for all the time actually and necessarily employed in his official duties under the direction of his committee: Provided, That the same be ascertained and assessed by the Committee on Accounts of the Fortieth Congress and reported to the House.

Mr. Speaker, as the House is impatient I will not discuss this resolution, unless some gentleman desires an explanation.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I wish to say a word on this question. I am opposed to this resolution, and I will state my reasons. The Committee on Accounts, in carrying out the instructions of the resolution of the House referring this subject to them, found it necessary to take the testimony of the committee clerks; and I say to the chairman of the committee that I thought that testimony should have been reported to the House. That testimony, which the chairman has not seen fit to report, would show that several committee clerks have never performed one hour's actual service during the session. I think I am entirely within bounds when I say this. Now, this resolution provides that all these clerks shall be paid six dollars per diem while they are actually and necessarily engaged in the duties of their committees, although some of these clerks stated before the committee, as the chairman knows, that while they performed no duties they were present at the meetings of the committee; and this will be the argument with which they will go before the proper disbursing officer. In this way committee clerks who have never performed an hour's labor will get this six dollars per day, as much as will be received by other clerks who, as the testimony would show if it were reported to the House, have performed very laborious duties.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCULLOUGH] a question. He has stated to the House that several committees have clerks who have never performed, during the entire Congress, one hour's service. I wish him to state for the information of the House what committees those are.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I do not know. If I had the testimony here I could inform the gentleman.

Mr. BROOMALL. I have the testimony here if it is considered desirable that it should be read.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. One of those committees is the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BROOMALL. No; I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. PIKE. The gentleman is decidedly mistaken about that.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Let the chairman of the committee give the country the benefit of a statement as to which of these clerks have not performed any service at all.

Mr. BROOMALL. I remember but one. I do not know that I ought to name the committee. The House knows perfectly well which of the committees are actually performing labor and which are merely ornamental committees.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I can name one of these committees. I am a member of a committee that has its clerk, but the committee has never had a meeting this session except once, when it met jointly with the Senate committee, and the clerk was present. I refer to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I do not know that this is the only committee in the same position with regard to the amount of work.

Mr. MAYNARD. As I understand this resolution—and I wish to know whether I understand its purport correctly—it has been framed with a view to meeting this very condition of things. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCULLOUGH] and his associates upon the committee whether the resolution, if adopted, will be construed as allowing these clerks six dollars a day at all events from the beginning of this Congress or during the days when their committees may have been in session, or whether it contemplates leaving it with the Committee on Accounts to restrict its benefits to those clerks who, as the testimony shows, have rendered service, while this compensation shall be withheld from those whom the testimony shows to have rendered no service? It seems to me this is a very important matter to be understood before we act on the resolution.

Mr. BROOMALL. Of course it is proposed to allow this pay only to those who have rendered service. The committee have here the testimony on which, in the course of two hours, they would be able to report to the House what would be equitable among all these clerks.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call the gentleman to order. The gentleman from Maryland yielded to the gentleman from Tennessee, and not to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BROOMALL. I will finish in a sentence. The resolution pays these clerks six dollars a day. In the Senate committee clerks are paid $7 20 a day all round. The evidence is all there, but the Committee on Accounts will need it if this resolution passes, as least for a few hours, as it is contemplated only to pay those who have done labor, and not those who have done no labor. The gentleman from Tennessee has asked a very proper question. You will notice by the resolution there is a proviso that the present Committee on Accounts shall designate and report to the present House, otherwise the resolution would go for nothing. That was considered necessary because the present committee have the knowledge which would require a great deal of time to acquire.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WOOD. I am satisfied from my experience in this House that the matter of the employment of clerks and paying them liberally is one which has become a great abuse of the Treasury. There are but few committees, one or two, at the utmost three committees of this House which absolutely require clerks. The ordinary committees have no duties which they are not able to perform themselves without any such assistance as this.

The gentleman from Tennessee asked the gentleman from Maryland to state where a clerk who was unnecessary was paid. I have the honor to be the member of a committee where the clerk distinctly declared that he would not accept the position if there was anything to do.

Mr. MAYNARD. What committee is that?

Mr. WOOD. They are in the main correspondents of Republican newspapers, who avail themselves of the advantages of their positions as clerks of committees to come upon this floor, and, in some instances, to lobby for schemes to rob the Treasury, and who employ their leisure moments to write scurrilous articles against members of Congress whom they do not like. I am opposed to the employment of clerks for committees unless they are necessary; and where they are necessary I am in favor of paying them liberally, but with the provision they shall attend to their duties as clerks and nothing else.

Mr. BROOMALL. I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WINDOW. Mr. Speaker, I have no interest hereafter whether the Committee on Indian Affairs has a clerk or not; but I am informed that the gentleman from Pennsylvania stated that the clerk of that committee had nothing to do.

Mr. SCOFIELD. No, sir; I did not say any such thing. I said that that committee had never met but once this session, and that was with the Senate committee.

Mr. WINDOW. It is true; and it has been because the committee has not been and could not be called during this session. If the gentleman had been more prompt at the last session he would have known more of its business than he seems to have done.

Mr. SCOFIELD. In reply to that reflection upon me I wish to say that during the last winter I think I was present at every meeting of the committee when a quorum could be obtained. The chairman himself was absent a part of the time, but I will say that it was on account of sickness in his family. I was myself always present, but we never had anything to do.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. The object of this resolution is, as I understand it, to equalize the pay of these clerks according to the services they have performed. If that be the object of the resolution I do not think it will accomplish the purpose. I was present when one of these committee clerks gave his testimony, and he stated that he had never made an entry.

Now, I say if a committee employs a man as a clerk and keeps him here at expense he ought to be paid. The fault is in having the clerks at all where they are not required. This resolution, however, does not remedy the evil. It will pay as much to the clerks who have had nothing to do as to those who have been laboring all the session. It will pay those who were needed no more than those who should not have been employed at all. One committee clerk, as the testimony will show, was a lumberman brought from the State of Maine, and he had never made an entry.

Mr. BROOMALL. I can explain that in two or three words. My colleague entirely agrees with me that certain committee clerks are underpaid and certain ones are overpaid. This resolution only contemplates the payment to those who are underpaid enough to make their salaries something like adequate to the service and the payment of nothing to those who do no work. The guard, as I said, is in the fact that the resolution passes for nothing unless it is adjusted by the present Committee on Accounts and reported to the present House. I will say also that the evidence upon which this is to be done is in my hands. It cannot be done by the House, but it can be done in two hours by the committee. They will report the evidence also to the House, if the House desires it.

Mr. PIKE. Allow me one half a minute. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCULLOUGH] says one committee clerk came from Maine. It was an entirely proper State to bring a clerk of a committee from. That he never made an entry is true. I do not believe a single clerk of a committee has ever made an entry. It is no part of their duty to do it. The committee to which the gentleman referred I suppose is the Naval Committee. It has had a constant succession of meetings twice a week for the whole session, with abundance of business before it. It is no part of the business of the committee to say whether it will have a clerk or not. This clerk was assigned by the House. This employment of clerks to committees is a matter that has grown up within a few years. The number of committees has been increased, and in the Senate each committee, I think, has a clerk whether it has anything to do or not. The whole system should be remodeled.

Mr. BROOMALL. I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. In answer to the gentleman from Maine I will state that I merely designated a clerk of a committee as coming from the State of Maine. I did not know what committee it was, but the gentleman has indicated it. Now, I do not know what duties he has had to perform, but that the testimony he himself gave will prove the truth of what I say.

Mr. PIKE. He will always tell the truth I have no doubt.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ECKLEY. I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 54, not voting 85; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Archer, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Benton, Blackburn, Blair, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckley, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Dixon, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Ferriss, Fields, French, Goss, Gove, Grover, Haight, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Richard D. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Woodward—85.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BROOMALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 1873) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870; had agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. HOWE, and Mr. WHYTE.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. 375) to repeal an act approved March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to regulate the disposition of fines, penalties, and forfeitures received under the laws relating to the customs, and for other purposes," and to amend certain acts for the prevention and punishment of frauds upon the revenue, and for the prevention of smuggling, had agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. CHANDLER, Mr. KELLOGG, and Mr. MORGAN.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 1967) to compensate the officers and crew of the United States steamer Kearsarge for the destruction of the rebel piratical vessel Alabama, had agreed to the conference asked for by the House, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. GRIMES, Mr. CONKLING, and Mr. DRAKE.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 1808) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1870, had agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. CONKLING, Mr. RAMSEY, and Mr. DAVIS.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask that the House proceed to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the deficiency bill.

Mr. ARNELL. I object.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to suspend the rules for that purpose.

The question was taken; and two thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the House proceeded to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1911) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have looked over these amendments. Some of them are not very important, but others are. There are a good many of them which are pretty long, and I move to suspend the rules to dispense with the reading of them.

The question was taken; and two thirds voting in the affirmative, the rules were suspended and the reading of the amendments was dispensed with.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate, and that a conference be asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. SCOFIELD,

Mr. LAWRENCE of Ohio, and Mr. ARCHER, managers of the conference on the part of the House.

PAY OF CONTESTANTS.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to call the attention of the House to a matter that has given the Committee on Accounts some trouble. On the 1st of March a resolution was passed by the House authorizing the Clerk of the House, under the sanction of the Committee on Accounts, to pay $2,500 to each of three contestants from the State of Louisiana.

Mr. HIGBY. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know what is the question before the House. I demand the regular order.

Mr. BROOMALL. I am making a statement upon which I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must make the motion to suspend the rules first.

Mr. BROOMALL. I wish to state what I desire to suspend the rules for.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, if the gentleman desires to hold the floor he must move to suspend the rules.

Mr. BROOMALL. Then I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of rescinding so much of the resolution of March 1, 1869, as allows to J. Willis Menard $2,500 in full for his expenses in the election case from Louisiana, with a view to having the resolution amended so as to allow him $1,500.

A MEMBER. He has got the money already.

Mr. BROOMALL. No, he has not; and I am authorized by Mr. Menard himself to make this proposition.

Mr. SHANKS. I shall object unless the others are put on the same footing.

Mr. BROOMALL. The Committee on Accounts, after witnessing the vote of the House allowing $1,500 to certain contestants, refused—obstinately, if you choose to call it so—to allow $2,500 to the contestants in the Louisiana case. The House could only authorize the Clerk to pay them with the sanction of the Committee on Accounts, and there is no other way of doing it except by a positive law. The question is, whether the House will now accede to my proposition or go to the trouble of passing a joint resolution upon the subject, which would take the matter out of our hands. Upon this state of things being made known to Mr. Menard he said at once that he would accept $1,500 if the resolution was changed to that effect.

Mr. DAWES. I object to debate unless there can be some debate on the other side.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

The question was then taken upon the motion to suspend the rules; and upon a division there were—ayes 96, noes 86.

So (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended.

Mr. BROOMALL. I now submit the resolution I have indicated.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROOMALL. Certainly.

Mr. WOOD. As I understand this case, the House directed that each of these contestants should receive $2,500. That resolution was passed by the House and a motion to reconsider laid upon the table, which we supposed disposed of the question finally. Now, the chairman of the Committee on Accounts [Mr. BROOMALL] makes a report to us that that committee has assumed the authority to propose a resolution in favor of paying these contestants but $1,500 each. Now, I desire to inquire what authority that committee had to change the order of the House?

Mr. BROOMALL. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] is entirely mistaken in his statement of facts. The House did not authorize the Clerk to pay the money at all; but it authorized the Clerk to pay the money—in the language of the act of Congress of the 14th of March, 1864—"with the sanction of the Committee on Accounts." It could only be done with the sanction of that committee. A higher power than the House itself has said that neither the House nor the Senate alone can take anything out of its contingent fund without the sanction of the Committee on Accounts or Contingent Expenses of that body. If the gentleman wants to know why it was that the committee set up its own judgment against the judgment of the House in this particular, the chairman of the Committee on Accounts can only say that the law requires the committee to exercise its judgment; and it never has yet yielded that judgment to anybody. If Congress does not want the committee to exercise its judgment in such cases, then it must repeal the law. In that way only can either House dip its own hands into the contingent fund.

One word more. A very large amount of money has been expended for the pay of persons contesting seats in this House during the present Congress, and a practice has grown up which fully justifies the language of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] when he said that contesting seats in Congress was by far the most profitable business in the country, so far as he knew, for the amount of capital invested. It is time a stop was put to this practice. The abuse is that some one offers a resolution without any inquiry whatever, upon which he calls the previous question, and it is passed without any debate upon it being allowed, by means of party drill or some other kind of drill. Fortunately, however, Congress is above the House of Representatives, and has said that such a resolution is null and void without some examination. This law requires it to receive from the Committee on Accounts. The reason why the Committee on Accounts refused to sanction the payment of $2,500 to each of the parties named in the resolution to which I have referred was this: shortly after that resolution was passed the House had up the cases of other parties from Kentucky and other States. Debate was allowed in those cases, and after the subject was fully discussed by the House it was very evident to the Committee on Accounts that the amount allowed by the House in the latter cases, $1,500 each, was very much too little if that sum was not enough in the former cases.

In the particular case in which the Committee on Accounts refused to sanction the payment of $2,500, the election which gave rise to the contest took place in November last, and the parties to the contest have been here but a single session, and that a short session. In another case, where the contest extended over the entire Congress the Committee on Accounts did sanction the payment of $2,500.

Now, I am satisfied that the other contestant, with whom I have not conversed, will agree to have the same charge made in the resolution with respect to his pay that the Committee on Accounts propose to make in respect to the pay of Mr. Menard. And if any friend of his on this floor will authorize me to do so I will move an amendment to that effect.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROOMALL. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. A few days ago a resolution passed this House directing the Clerk to pay to John D. Young, of Kentucky, the sum of $2,509. I am informed by a gentleman who has examined the record that that resolution was framed in the very same language of resolutions which proposed to pay Mr. Switzler, of Missouri, a contestant, and two of the contestants of the seats of Mr. Brown and Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, the same amount, or perhaps a larger amount in some of the cases. Now, I desire to know why that resolution, couched in the very same language of the resolutions in the other cases to which I have referred, was not allowed by the Committee on Accounts? I would like to know how it is that a creature of this House, a servant of this House, refuses to perform the will of this House?

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, this debate cannot be allowed to run on. The House is getting uneasy. I will only ask the Clerk to read the law upon this subject—a law which binds the House as well as the committee; and I hope gentlemen who want to know how the law stands will listen.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Hereafter no payment shall be made from the contingent fund of either House of Congress unless sanctioned by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate or the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives respectively; and no transfer of balances of appropriation shall be made from one fund to another except by law."

Mr. WOOD. I submit that the law as read does not give the committee any authority to alter the resolution of this House with reference to the amount to be paid.

Mr. BROOMALL. I grant that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] knows more about the laws of the land than the Comptroller at the Treasury Department, who rules that he cannot make payment under this very resolution unless the Committee on Accounts will sanction it. I grant all that. But it makes no difference whether the gentlemen from New York or the Comptroller, who is to pass upon this matter at the Treasury Department, is the wiser lawyer. It happens that the Comptroller is in the position to block the game. He is the man who has to decide these questions. It may be that what I have been laying down as law is not the law of the land; but the Comptroller says it is. There is no appeal from his decision; and these men cannot get their money until either the Committee on Accounts sanction the payment, or until the House and Senate pass a bill appropriating that amount of money to these men.

I have been asked to embrace Mr. Hunt in the same category; and I will if his friends desire it. We ask that the resolution of the House with regard to these men be rescinded so far as to reduce the amount of compensation to $1,500, and then these men can get their money. How long would it take them to get their money if they followed the legal guidance of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Wood?]? But this resolution will give them all they ask; and I trust the House will pass it. I will now yield to my colleague on the committee for one moment.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I took the ground, Mr. Speaker, on that committee when these claims were up that Congress never contemplated a creature of its own should entirely nullify a resolution which it had passed in specific terms. The committee overruled my objection, but I still maintain the same ground. The committee ought to have ordered the payment of the money under the resolution, and not have attempted to ignore entirely the action of the House. Such action on the part of one of the committees of this House was never contemplated by the law of Congress.

I like consistency. The resolution passed paying Switzler $5,000 was indorsed by the committee, and the money was paid at once. The committee has also passed the claim in the case of Mr. Hinds, who was assassinated in Arkansas, for payment up to the end of this Congress, right in the teeth of a positive law on the subject.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (S. R. No. 217) for printing the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion; when the Speaker signed the same.

PAY OF CONTESTANTS—AGAIN.

Mr. BROOMALL. I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky for a question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the whole subject will be laid upon the table if we cannot get rid of it in any other way.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I to ask the chairman of the Committee on Accounts this question, and I hope we shall have a distinct answer to it. I wish to know why the resolution passed by the House to pay John D. Young, which was couched in the same language as the resolutions to pay Switzer, Simms, Smith, and others, which were passed by the Committee on Accounts and referred for payment to the Clerk of the House—I wish to know why that resolution was not passed in the same manner, and payment made to John D. Young?

Mr. HIGBY. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I have the floor.

Mr. HIGBY. What is the question before the House?

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I have the floor by permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HIGBY. I rise to a question of order, and it is that neither the question of the gentleman from Kentucky nor any answer to it is pertinent to the matter now before the House.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I leave the Speaker to determine that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. That is the question, why it is that the resolution to pay John D. Young was not referred for payment to the Clerk of the House by the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. BROOMALL. The gentleman asks me upon what ground the committee bases its action in a case which has no connection with the case now pending. I have no authority to tell outside of the committee what took place in the committee. If he were a member of the committee he would know. On the question of law it may be that the First Comptroller is wrong; but I hold his letter to the Clerk of the House in my hand in which he says he cannot pay that money without the assent of the Committee on Accounts.

Now, as these gentlemen are willing to accept the amount which I have specified, and as the House has already fixed upon $1,500 as an adequate sum under like circumstances, I trust there will be no further objection to the adoption of the resolution. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. This seems to be the question before the House: whether there is a discretion in the Committee on Accounts above and superior to the decision of the House itself; whether when the Committee on Accounts has fixed the sum itself which in its opinion is the proper sum to be expended in any particular manner out of the contingent fund, the law sets up the opinion of the Committee on Accounts above that of the House? That is the question. It is perfectly apparent what that provision of the law was inserted there for. It had reference to a claim submitted to the Committee on Accounts for pay when there was no sum fixed. For instance, when a man has done work for the House it is for the Committee on Accounts to determine whether his charge is or is not too high or more than he ought to be paid. The law intended that the Committee on Accounts should audit and pass upon such claims. Now, is it not within the power of the House to instruct its committee to sanction a particular outlay from the contingent fund?

Mr. BROOMALL. I resume the floor.

Mr. DAWES. Let me have one word more. It is the contingent fund that is at the disposal of the Committee on Accounts, and the House instructs its committees. They are its servants; they are to do what the House says. And now my friend says because in another case the House expresses an opinion that it should be $1,500 they take that as the instruction in this case. The House instructed them in this case as to the sum which it thought proper to pay. I know they have got J. Willis Menard to say he will take this sum. He has been told, probably, that he could not get his money without a bill, and he had better consent to take $1,500 rather than nothing. I know he is willing to do it, but he is willing under duress notwithstanding the House has expressed the opinion that he shall have $2,500.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, I resume the floor. I can only dispose of my friend from Massachusetts in the manner I have disposed of my friend from New York. If he was in the office of the Comptroller who has to pass upon this question for the Clerk, and who dictates the law to him as far as this case is concerned, then his views of the law would be important to this House and to the parties claiming their pay. But unfortunately for him, and for the glory of the country most likely, the gentleman from Massachusetts like the gentleman from New York is not in the position of Comptroller, and the Comptroller has decided without respecting their opinions, if he knows them; and until the gentleman can get a law passed correcting the Comptroller's error his decision will have to stand as the law.

Mr. DAWES. I agree that the Comptroller is right and the Committee on Accounts are wrong. [Laughter.] The committee have no business to set themselves above the law of the House.

Mr. BROOMALL. The House directed the committee to exercise its judgment, not to do it in a particular direction. The House is not omnipotent and it cannot do what the gentleman claims. There is a power above the House of Representatives, and that is the House and Senate combined. The House and Senate have enacted a law which I have read directing the Committee on Accounts to exercise its own judgment and not the judgment of the House, and the Comptroller has said so in the letter which I hold in my hand.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. BROOMALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire, to know, inasmuch as the gentleman says he is not the Comptroller, whether or not the Comptroller did not get this absurd opinion from the practice of the Committee on Accounts? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOMALL. That is a pertinent question.

Mr. LOGAN. I rise to a question of order. I want to know whether in the opinion of the Chair the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not uttering a treasonable sentiment when he says there is a power higher than this House, [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOMALL. It makes no difference whether the law as understood by the committee is correct or not. Every member of the House may disagree with the Comptroller, but that officer is in a position to give a decision, and he has given it.

In answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] as to the Comptroller getting his notion from the Committee on Accounts, I will say that while he might have gone to a worse source for it he did not get it there. But he has decided the question, and having done it I hope this House will accommodate the claimants and the committee also by letting the claimants get the money which the committee believe the House has declared they are entitled to, namely, $1,500. Let me say that I came here as a member with notions of reform, of preventing the extravagant outlay of money. This is in the interest of economy, and if these claimants are willing to save $2,000 to the Government I want to know why my smiling friend from New York on the other side [Mr. Wood] objects. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered—ayes 87, noes 44.

Mr. WOOD and Mr. PIKE moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 107, noes 11.

Mr. WOOD moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, was received, returning to the House in answer to its request a copy of the bill (H. R. No. 508) for the relief of the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association. By unanimous consent the bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LINCOLN MONUMENT ASSOCIATION.

On motion of Mr. CULLOM, by unanimous consent, the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2009) to authorize the Secretary of War to place at the disposal of the Lincoln Monument Association, at Springfield, Illinois, damaged and captured ordnance, was taken from the Speaker's table, and the amendment of the Senate, namely, to strike out the words "and other," was concurred in.

Mr. CULLOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2022) to amend an act entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," approved July 20, 1868; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I wish to say to the House that this bill contains nothing but what the House acted upon last week on the tax bill that was passed. It contains only some essential provisions which ought to become a law at this session. It is very evident that the general tax bill will not be acted upon in the Senate, and the items in this bill should be acted on and become a law as soon as possible. Unless the House wishes further explanation I will move the previous question.

Mr. PILE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a suggestion.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I will yield to the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. PILE. The point to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman is the length of time given by this bill to owners of distilled spirits to withdraw them from bonded warehouses. Under the present law the time expires in April, 1869. This bill proposes to extend the time until April, 1870. Now, I am certain that this will leave open a door for frauds, and that in spite of all the vigilance and care that may be exercised by the officers appointed under the incoming Administration immense frauds will be perpetrated. I see no reason why the time should be extended. It would be better to issue tax-paid stamps, and have this whisky stamped as other whisky is. But to extend the time for withdrawing the whisky from bonded warehouses would, I think, be very unwise.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I will say in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman that the House after full discussion adopted this very measure by a decided vote, and the Committee of Ways and Means did not feel at liberty to report anything contrary to what had been adopted by the House.

Mr. PILE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to move an amendment to strike out that part of the bill, so as to test the sense of the House.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I must decline to yield for that purpose. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Perhaps by a very brief explanation I can give the House a better understanding of the provisions of the bill than could be obtained from hearing it read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the call for the reading for that purpose.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I will then briefly explain the provisions of the bill. Section eight of the act of July 20, 1868, is amended so as to allow a bond to be given for the value of the property in case of a distillery erected before the passage of that act on land leased or mortgaged, or owned by a minor or other person incapable of giving the assent required by that section. Section twenty is amended so that in small distilleries of less capacity than one hundred gallons within twenty-four hours sixty gallons of mash or beer (instead of forty-five gallons) shall represent a bushel of grain. Section fifty-six is amended so as to extend the time for distilled spirits to remain in bonded warehouse until April 20, 1870, on payment of one cent, per gallon for each month after the 2d April, 1869. Section seven is amended so as to provide safeguards for special stamps for the tax on tobacco in packages of one pound or more by requiring the stamps to be numbered and registered and the signature of the collector attached. The other sections provide for stamping tobacco, snuff, and cigars now on hand, on which the duty was paid before the law of July 20, 1868, went into effect, and for repacking the same in accordance with that law.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I cannot yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman allow me to offer an amendment to the portion of this bill relating to the tax on tobacco?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I object to any amendment. I insist upon the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMERCE WITH BRITISH PROVINCES.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That while this House does not admit any right in the executive and treaty-making power of the United States to conclude treaties or conventions with any foreign Government by which import duties shall be mutually regulated, it is however of the opinion, and recommends to the President, that negotiations with the Government of Great Britain should be renewed and pressed if possible to a definite conclusion regarding commercial intercourse and securing to our own citizens the rights claimed by them in the fisheries on the coasts of the British provinces of America, and the free navigation of the St. Lawrence river from its source to the sea.

The question was upon adopting the resolution.

Mr. HARDING. I object to the consideration of this resolution at this time.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] will also state the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means in reference to reciprocity with the British provinces. That is a matter in which the people are very deeply interested.

Mr. SCHENCK. As for myself I am utterly opposed to the whole system of reciprocity.

The SPEAKER. The resolution having been referred to the Committee of the Whole, it is not now before the House, and debate upon it is not now in order.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole. And I make the motion simply for the purpose of having an opportunity of replying to the inquiry of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.]

The resolution which I reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a few moments since commences with a denial of the right of the treaty-making power to make treaties which shall alter the tariff laws of this country; that is a subject exclusively for legislation. It then proceeds to express a desire that the President shall renew and press to a conclusion negotiations in regard to other interests connected with the British provinces, and our relationship to them, to-wit, the claim our citizens make in regard to the fisheries on the coasts of those provinces, and in relation to the free navigation of the St. Lawrence river from its source to the sea.

The gentleman wants to know my opinion in regard to reciprocity. He might perhaps infer it from the tenor of that resolution. I do not believe we ought to enter into any relations of reciprocity with the British provinces, either through negotiations with the imperial Government of Great Britain or by direct treaty with the provinces themselves, if that were possible. I believe the people of the British provinces should be treated like all other foreigners, and made to pay the same duties upon articles they import into our country that other foreigners are required to pay upon similar articles.

I believe also that the effect of the reciprocity treaty which we had a short time ago, and which has been abrogated, and which I am glad to have had the opportunity to vote for giving notice to abrogate, was, while it lasted, simply to give to those British provinces all the advantages of being within the Union without making them bear any of the burdens of this Union. During our late troubles in this country they did not seem to appreciate those advantages, judging from the manner in which they treated the United States of America.

Mr. PIKE. The only reason why I drew out this expression of opinion from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. SCHENCK] was the fact that it has been published in the papers quite extensively that that committee was in favor of a renewal of the reciprocity treaty.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am not authorized to speak for the rest of the members of the committee, but I am not aware of any difference of opinion between any of them and myself on that subject.

Mr. MOORHEAD. If the gentleman desires he can express my opinion in the very language he has used in reference to himself.

Mr. SCHENCK. Having answered the inquiry of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] I now withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. HARDING. I renew the motion to reconsider, and move to lay it on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon House bill No. 1744, to strengthen the public credit and relating to contracts for payment in coin.

APPEALS IN REVENUE CASES.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2023) to repeal the first section of an act relating to appeals to the Supreme Court; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the first section of the act of March 26, 1868, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend the judiciary act,' passed on the 24th of September, 1789," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. SCHENCK. The first section of the act which it is proposed to repeal provides that in questions with reference to the recovery of duties which have been overpaid or wrongfully paid there shall be allowed in every case an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, no matter what the amount in controversy. Prior to the passage of that provision the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court was confined to cases where not less than $2,000 was involved. The effect of the amendment of the law made a short time ago seems to have been that a great number of cases where the duties sought to be recovered amounted to only fifty, one hundred, three hundred, or five hundred dollars have been prevented from being brought to a conclusion at all or from being prosecuted, even where they were meritorious. There has been virtually a denial of justice, because the parties could not afford to take such cases to the Supreme Court.

The Committee of Ways and Means, after hearing representations made upon this subject, were of opinion that if questions of life and death, questions of the greatest moment, may be settled in the circuit courts of the United States, those courts are competent to settle cases of the description I have stated, where the amount involved is less than $2,000.

In addition to that as another reason why the section should be repealed it has been found that if appeals be taken to the Supreme Court in all these cases in which the suitors can afford to appeal the already gorged docket of that court will be clogged beyond all possibility of the cases being heard for several years. The committee therefore propose that the jurisdiction in these cases shall be as it was formerly in the circuit court.

Mr. WOODWARD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] whether the section which he proposes to repeal is not that section to which a year or two ago, when under consideration in this House, an amendment was moved by the honorable gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] and passed, taking by surprise this side of the House?

Mr. SCHENCK. It is the very same. A bill came from the Senate consisting of this one section in reference to appeals to the Supreme Court, extending the jurisdiction of that court in such cases; and to that we added the amendment taking away the jurisdiction of that tribunal in another class of cases.

Mr. WOODWARD. And you now propose to repeal only the first section?

Mr. SCHENCK. The first section.

Mr. WOODWARD. With the leave of the gentleman from Ohio I will move to amend so as to repeal also the second section.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot give way for that purpose; and I can explain, I think, to the satisfaction of the gentleman himself why the action he proposes ought not to be taken. Two years ago we had neither the first nor the second section upon our statute-book. No appeal was allowed to the Supreme Court in cases of habeas corpus; nor was there any appeal in cases involving the payment of duties, &c., where the amount was less than $2,000. Congress in 1867 passed an act allowing appeals to the Supreme Court in cases of habeas corpus. During the last session an act was passed, the first section of which it is now proposed to repeal, that first section allowing appeals to the Supreme Court in these little cases in reference to internal revenue. In adopting that provision we committed, as I think, a mistake. In the second section of the same act the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in habeas corpus cases was taken away. We now propose to repeal the first section, leaving the second section just where it is.

If this bill which I now present should prevail we shall be set back with reference to both these questions just where we were in 1867. The Supreme Court will not have appellate jurisdiction either in cases of habeas corpus or in these little revenue cases. Both classes of questions will be left with the circuit courts, where I think they ought properly to be determined.

Mr. WOODWARD. Whether the act of 1867 ought ever to have been passed ~~and~~ not is not the question; but it having been passed in the interest of the liberties of the citizen and having been repealed at the moment it was about to deliver a citizen in the spirit of the act I think the House would do well to repeal the repealing act.

Mr. SCHENCK. According to the gentleman, then, because one blunder was committed he wants another blunder committed to correct it. I now call for the previous question.

Mr. WOODWARD. Does the gentleman refuse to let me make an amendment?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do. I wish to go back to what the law was before. I am willing to admit that it was a mistake for Congress in 1867 to give that jurisdiction, and I think they did right to repeal it. I think it was a mistake to extend the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to every little revenue case, and I think it is now right to repeal it. Throwing out all party considerations it is better to go back to the condition of things two years ago. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WESTERN UNION EXTENSION TELEGRAPH.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 474) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to admit free of duty a certain submarine cable; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the Western Union Extension Telegraph Company submarine telegraph cable made to form a part of the overland telegraph line to unite the United States with Russia and Great Britain, intended to be laid in the Behring sea, without the payment of customs duty thereon.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, a company was organized called the Western Union Extension Telegraph Company with a view to the construction of a cable for international communication between the United States and Russia and Great Britain by the way of the Aleutian Islands, across Behring straits. They constructed at considerable cost in England, where alone they could get it made, about five hundred miles of submarine cable for this purpose. That cable was brought around to the British territory, and it was there admitted free of duty. The United States also, through the Navy and State Departments, took an interest in the construction of this line. Resolutions were passed in Congress in favor of it, and it was made in some sense a national affair. When the cable arrived, as I have said, it was admitted duty free into the British provinces. In the mean time the success then already ascertained of direct communication across the Atlantic made it manifest that it was not going to be a paying operation. The company failed utterly. They have lost some million and a half of dollars. That cable which was admitted duty free into the British provinces has been brought back and is now lying in a vessel in New York harbor, where it has been since last November, rusting and being spoiled. They will sell it if they can find any market for it. If they cannot for the whole of it they will cut it up and make river cables of it. That is uncertain. In the mean time the cable is useless to them, and will be unless they can land it. The duty of $125,000 will be as much as it will bring.

The committee were not inclined at first to report favorably for this remission of duty, but when they came to look into the history of the whole matter and ascertained the encouragement given to the work by Congress and by the British and Russian Governments, and that national vessels were put at their service; when we ascertained the work was given an international character and the company were now bankrupt, we were satisfied they ought to have permission to land this cable without the payment of customs duty.

The Western Union Telegraph Company, which I understand to be a flourishing company, is not the same as the Western Union Extension Telegraph Company, although many members of the former organization may have an interest in the latter. While the Western Union Telegraph Company operating within this country has proved a success, the extension company for oceanic communication have made an utter failure, and whether they pay a duty or not their cable is abandoned and they will in either case be losers to the amount of millions.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I do not know whether the gentleman in giving the decision of the committee gave it as being unanimous or not. I know very well that I stated to the committee that I was a stockholder in the Western Union Telegraph Company, which was interested in this matter, and also in the extension line for laying a new telegraph wire across the continent, and that I believed they should pay the duty on their wire. I see no reason why, if they have gone into a speculation which does not turn out well, they should fall back upon the Government as an indorser. The telegraph wire was imported and the duty was due to the Government, and I think it should be paid. I for one do not want any remission of duty so far as I am concerned, nor do I think the company, if they have any proper consideration for their character, would demand it. I shall vote against it.

Mr. SCHENCK. As to whether this is a unanimous report of the committee I do not at this moment recollect. I believe, however, it was opposed by one member of the committee because it was supposed to involve some tariff question. Whenever that is the case we all know where to find the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORHEAD.] Not a single strand of the cable from anywhere except the Pennsylvania mines must get in free of duty. But it does not follow necessarily because one or two members of the committee are opposed to it that this is any the less a report of the committee. Sometimes even when the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been opposed to the rest of the committee we have supposed we were right notwithstanding. The application of the telegraph company is just of the character I have spoken of. It is made through its organization. They all united in it. I have spoken also of the fact that at first blush the committee were inclined to vote against the application, but, as is often the case, upon a thorough investigation of the whole matter, including some things to which the gentleman did not turn his attention, although he may have been a stockholder, we became satisfied that it was so far of a national character as to make it proper that we should interfere, as Russia and Great Britain have done, in order to relieve the company. I hold in my hand the action of both those Governments in the matter as well as the action of our own. I will read a portion of the letter of Mr. Seward in regard to the action of our own Government. But before I do so it is proper for me to remark that while the company was in a flourishing condition it did not have so much need that we should forbear to lay our hands upon it to the entire destruction of all its interest as it has now when the company is utterly bankrupt.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Not bankrupt by any means.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is confounding the Western Union Telegraph Company, which is one thing engaged in telegraph communication in the United States, with the Western Union Extension Company which is confined to communication between the United States and Great Britain and Russia by the way of Behring strait, which is a totally different thing.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I would like to inform the gentleman that they are one thing by two names. One stands good, the other has lost money, and now they want to shake off the loss and take the profits. I understand it perfectly. I am on both sides of the question.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is not an unusual thing. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORHEAD. That is, I own stock in both these companies.

Mr. SCHENCK. The Secretary of State, in writing on this subject, in which I have not the slightest interest as a legislator, says:

"But in another sense it is entitled to be regarded as an enterprise of the Government of the United States. During all the time that Mr. Collins has been engaged in maturing and developing it and presenting it to the consideration of Russia and Great Britain he has been acting under the instructions and with the approbation of the Department of State, and a knowledge of that fact has not been withheld from Congress." * * * "What Mr. Collins asks of Congress is a grant of the right of way across the public lands, with the right to take therefrom the materials necessary for constructing the line; the use of a national vessel, suitably officered and equipped, to make surveys and soundings along the northern Pacific coast beyond the limits of the United States and to aid in prosecuting the work; and finally a stipulated compensation for Government use of the line when it shall be constructed.

"If the views I have submitted are just this demand for patronage is neither unnecessary nor unreasonable. We could not withhold it without showing a want of appreciation of the liberality and friendship which have been manifested toward the United States by Russia and Great Britain in the proceedings they have adopted toward the same enterprise. I do not know any one object lying within the scope of our foreign relations more important than the preservation of peace and friendship with those two great and enlightened Powers, nor can I conceive of any one measure of national policy that would more effectually tend to secure that great object than the construction of the proposed intercontinental telegraph."

It was upon that communication from the State Department that Congress acted. Congress did pass a resolution and did give the use of a vessel and did foster and encourage this company to go on with their enterprise; and all that is claimed now is that as the United States was one of the three Governments which led them into an enterprise that proved an entire failure they shall not now take away from them what little remnant they have toward the payment of their debts, but which will be totally insufficient for the discharge of even a moiety of those debts. I move the previous question.

The question was put on seconding the previous question; and there were—ayes 59, noes 40; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SCHENCK and Mr. ROSS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 34.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SCHENCK moved the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. STEWART called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 62, not voting 91; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Blair, Boyden, Brooks, Buckley, Burr, Callis, Cary, Chanler, Keader W. Clarke, Clift, Corley, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Dockery, Donnelly, Eggleston, Garfield, Getz, Golladay, Goss, Griswold, Grover, Haight, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Woodward—91.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I call for a division on the latter motion.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the motion.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate insisted upon its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to House bill No. 1911, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes; had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses; and had appointed Mr. HOWE, Mr. CRAGIN, and Mr. NYE, the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2009) to authorize the Secretary of War to place at the disposal of the National Lincoln Monument Association, at Springfield, Illinois, damaged and captured ordnance.

NATIONAL ASYLUM FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. GARFIELD. A vacancy has occurred in the board of managers of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, by the resignation of Governor Oglesby, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution to provide for filling that vacancy.

No objection was made.

Accordingly a joint resolution (H. R. No. 475) to fill a vacancy in the board of managers for the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, was introduced and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that Thomas O. Osborn, of Illinois, shall be appointed a manager of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Hon. Richard J. Oglesby, of said State, for the remainder of his unexpired term.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC CREDIT—GOLD CONTRACTS.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 1744, to strengthen the public credit, and relating to contracts for the payment of coin, made the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the bill (H. R. 1744) to strengthen the public credit, and relating to contracts for the payment of coin, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

They recommend that the House recede from its disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: insert, in lieu of the words stricken out, the words "obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing."

They recommend that the House recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: insert, in lieu of the words stricken out, the words "but none of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin. And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin."

They recommend that the Senate recede from their third and fourth amendments to the bill of the House.

JOHN SHERMAN,
GEORGE H. WILLIAMS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

ROBERT C. SCHENCK,
WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The bill as agreed upon by the committee of conference is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver; but none of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin. And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin, and the consideration of which may be a loan of coin, or a sale of property, or the rendering of labor or service of any kind, the price of which as carried into the contract may have been adjusted on the basis of the coin value thereof at the time of such sale, or of the rendering of such service or labor, shall be legal and valid, and may be enforced according to its terms; and on the trial of a suit brought for the enforcement of any such contract proof of the real consideration may be given.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know but the reading of the report of the committee of conference has made this matter plain to every gentleman here. But I will make a brief explanation of the conclusions to which the committee of conference have arrived. The Senate struck out the words "interest-bearing" before the words "obligation," in the first section; so as to leave it to pledge the faith of the United States to "the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States," except in cases where it was otherwise expressly provided by law. It was thought that this might extend even to warrants from the Treasury on contracts, or certificates for pensions, going beyond what was intended. The object was to pledge the faith of the country, not only to the payment of its interest-bearing obligations in the shape of bonds, but also to the payment of the non-interest bearing obligations in the shape of greenbacks, or "United States notes," as they are termed by law.

To make that matter clear, therefore, instead of striking out the words "interest-bearing" it is changed to read:

The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

The Senate had also struck out the following proviso in the first section as it passed the House:

Provided, however, That before any of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall mature or be paid before maturity the obligations not bearing interest, known as United States notes, shall be made convertible into coin at the option of the holder.

For a long time the Senate would not agree to anything to take the place of that proviso. But it was finally agreed by the committee of conference to insert in the place of the proviso stricken out the following:

But none of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder.

That is, the bonds of the United States are not to be paid before maturity, while the note-holders are to be kept without their redemption, unless the note-holders are able at the same time to convert their notes into coin. But inasmuch as this might raise the price of bonds to a high figure and be for the benefit of the bondholders, then they proceed to put in further language so as to keep the bonds from going up out of proportion to the greenbacks, by further providing that if the bonds went above par in gold then they might be paid off, because it was supposed that then we could sell bonds for par at a lower rate of interest. They put in these further words:

Or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin.

Then we go on and give this further pledge:

And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

The other amendments made by the Senate are receded from by the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, as I voted against this bill when it was originally on its passage through this House, and as I propose to vote now in favor of adopting this conference report, I desire to say that in my vote to-day in favor of the proposition I am guided largely by the fact that the amendments adopted by the committee of conference contain substantially some of the provisions of an amendment which I endeavored to have ingrafted on the bill upon its passage here, the adoption of which would have secured my support for the bill. The provisions of the first section of the bill with the amendment recommended for adoption substantially pledge us to the payment of our Government bonds in coin or its equivalent when we shall have resumed specie payments by operation of law. That, sir, was the spirit of the amendment which I desired to offer originally, but which was cut off by the operation of the previous question. I have never doubted that the bonds were to be and ought to be paid dollar for dollar in coin or its equivalent, but not, sir, while gold is at a large premium in the market.

This bill as explained by the gentleman in charge of it has this effect, while it pledges the United States to the earliest practicable resumption of specie payments; and in this respect it also meets my hearty approval, for that I regard as the great solution of our financial problem.

I do not say, Mr. Speaker, that I am entirely satisfied with the terms of this bill. It does not, in my opinion, go far enough in the right direction, but so far as it does go it recognizes very distinctly that the resumption of specie payments, or in other words the compatibility or redemption of our greenbacks, is to precede the payment of our Government bonds, or go hand in hand with it precluding the policy of borrowing gold at a heavy premium to meet those obligations.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to ask my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] whether any substantial change has been made in the second section of the bill relating to gold contracts?

Mr. SCHENCK. None whatever; it stands just as it passed the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am very glad to learn that that section is retained. I cannot better express my approval of this bill than by stating the fact that I introduced this provision into this House as a separate bill more than a year ago and have earnestly urged its passage.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I hold in my hand a resolution to which I hope my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] will assent. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the pending bill be recommitted to the committee of conference with instructions to strike out all of section two except so much as legalizes coin contracts on a coin consideration.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot agree to that because it is not in order, and if it were in order I would not agree to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, I was a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, which prepared this bill, and also of the committee of conference which has just acted on and reported it. I concede that my objections to the bill are radical. I am opposed to the whole policy of legislation of which this is a part. Our system of finance is at present but pieces of patchwork thrown hastily together; in other words, it is no system at all. It is a series of disjointed acts of legislation thrown together from time to time during the emergency of the war, without regard to any particular financial principle. This bill will but add another scrap to that patchwork of which we have already too much.

This bill, in my judgment, looks to speedy resumption, for which the country is not at all prepared. Resumption looks to contraction, because in my judgment contraction must precede resumption. The effect of this measure, if it should become a law, will certainly be to contract the currency and carry us rapidly in the direction of resumption, for which I believe the business interests of the country are, I repeat, in no wise prepared at the present time.

Then, again, sir, a large number of us upon this side of the House, and I think quite a number upon the other side, believe that as to much the largest number of the bonds now outstanding the Government has the right to redeem them after five years in United States notes, or greenbacks, as they are usually termed. There are others who do not concede that we have absolutely this right, but say that the matter is at least involved in great doubt. The fact that a doubt exists in regard to this matter will give us a great leverage in any funding system which may hereafter be adopted, or in any general system looking to the reduction of the interest on the public debt.

Now, this bill proposes to surrender unconditionally, and, in my judgment, without any consideration to the great mass of the people, the right of the Government to redeem these bonds in legal-tender notes, thus pledging in advance of our general system of finance to the payment in coin of all the obligations of the Government, including the five-twenty bonds, which are not expressly declared to be payable in currency.

In my judgment the bill can be considered nothing else than a measure for the benefit of our bondholders and creditors, without any adequate consideration accruing to the Government. I think such a measure is not proper at this time, for we are not prepared on either side of the House to adopt any new system of finance, decidedly not in the expiring moments of this Congress. A new Congress is about to convene. Let that body, if it deems it wise, take this whole question into consideration and adopt some system which shall look to the refunding of our public debt. Some kind of funding scheme seems to be in contemplation by the party in power, which is faintly foreshadowed by this bill, and for which it is evidently intended to prepare the way. I am not prepared to vote for any funding scheme at present. I do not think the country is prepared for that either. Let us cease tinkering with the finances any further, at all events until we are prepared to bring order out of the general chaos and to complete the whole work. No one pretends that we are prepared for that now.

Another objection I have to this bill, as amended by this conference report, is that it restricts us from redeeming our outstanding bonds even in coin before maturity except upon certain contingencies which may not happen. Sir, this right to redeem our bonds at pleasure at early and between stated periods is of great value to us in further negotiations with our creditors. This right, or supposed right, of redeeming them in non-interest-bearing legal-tender notes is of still greater value to us in this respect. These important rights of redemption ought not to be lightly surrendered. Neither good faith nor sound policy require it.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask the gentleman what he considers the Government is obligated to pay the "greenbacks" in?

Mr. NIBLACK. When we get the money it is time enough to talk about paying our bonds and the "greenbacks." It is sufficient for me to know that "greenbacks" pass currently; that they pay our debts and pass as money, and may be circulated indefinitely until the Government finds itself in condition to redeem them. When we are in condition to redeem them it will be time enough to ask how they shall be paid.

Mr. HIGBY. Is all our circulating paper redeemable in gold? Would it not be according to good faith to redeem them in gold?

Mr. NIBLACK. It is no time now to settle this great question of how the public debt shall be paid or to discuss the finances of the country. I shall close by repeating that this is an unconditional surrender of the rights of the Government without anything accruing to the Government for that surrender.

Mr. HIGBY. I do not want to hurry payment more than the gentleman does; but I refer to when it is paid.

Mr. RANDALL. It is time enough to say that when we are ready to pay.

Mr. HIGBY. We have had a great deal said on the subject by Democrats.

Mr. NIBLACK. Whatever the laws are I am willing to abide by them. Believing this is in the interest of the creditors of the Government and not in the interest of the Government or the people of the United States, I declined to sign the report of the committee of conference and shall refuse to vote for it.

Mr. SHANKS. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the gentleman for two minutes.

Mr. SHANKS. I wish to call the attention of the House to what I think is a very grave inconsistency in the first section of this bill. It sets out by declaring that the bill passed some time ago for the issue of five-twenty bonds is to be construed in a certain way; that is, that they are payable in gold. Then it has a proviso putting that in abeyance until a certain contingency takes place. A bill passed some five years ago is brought in, and that is to be held in abeyance until a certain other thing takes place, and that other thing is the redemption of "greenbacks" in gold. That is a serious inconvenience. As it declares that to be the case on its face which is not so, that the notes were payable in gold in the first instance, it places the debtor in the hands of the creditor. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I now yield for three minutes to my colleague.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I was very sorry that illness prevented me from being here when this bill passed the House, and I am glad to have an opportunity now to say a word in its favor. I will refer first to the argument of the gentleman from Indiana, who says his chief objection is to the first section.

Mr. SHANKS. I had only two minutes and could not state in that time all my objections to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I refer to the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. NIBLACK.] He bases his opposition to the first section of the bill on this, that it is a surrender of our power over the subject in the future when we come to some system of funding the public debt. The only power we surrender is the power to threaten repudiation. That, sir, is the surrender in this bill; and if any gentleman here is unwilling to surrender that power I have no sympathy with his sentiment on that subject.

Mr. NIBLACK rose.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have only three minutes and I cannot yield.

Now, sir, I favor the first section of the bill because it declares plainly what the law is. I affirm again what I have often declared in this Hall, that the law does now require the payment of these bonds in gold. I hope I may without impropriety refer to the fact that during the last session I proved from the record in this House, and in the presence of the author of the law by which these bonds were authorized, that five distinct times in his speech, which immediately preceded the passage of the law, he declared the five-twenty bonds were payable, principal and interest, in gold; and that every member who spoke on the subject took the same ground. That law was passed with that declaration uncontradicted, and it went into effect stamped with that declaration by both Houses of Congress. That speech, made on the eve of the presidential campaign, was widely circulated throughout the country as a campaign document, and those who held the contrary were repeatedly challenged to refute its statements. I affirm that its correctness was not successfully denied. Not only Congress so understand and declare, but every Secretary of the Treasury from that day to this has declared that these bonds are payable in gold. The authorized agents of the Government sold them and the people bought them with this understanding.

The Government thus bound itself by every obligation of honor and good faith, and it was not until one year after the passage of the law that any man in Congress raised even a doubt on the subject. The doubts since raised were raised mainly for electioneering purposes, and the question was referred to the people for arbitrament at the late presidential election. After the fullest debate ever had on any great question of national politics, in a contest in which the two parties squarely and fairly joined issue on this very point, it was solemnly decided by the great majority which elected General Grant that repudiators should be repudiated and that the faith of the nation should be preserved inviolate.

We are therefore bound by the pledged faith of the nation, by the spirit and meaning of the law, and finally by the voice of the people themselves to resolve all doubts and settle the credit of the United States by this explicit declaration of the national will. The action of the House on this bill has already been hailed throughout the world as the dawn of better days for the finances of the nation, and every market has shown a wonderful improvement of our credit. We could this day refund our debt on terms more advantageous to the Government by $120,000,000 than we could have done the day before the passage of this bill by the House. Make it a law and a still greater improvement will result. I can in no way better indicate my views of propriety of passing the second section of this bill than by reminding the House that I introduced this proposition in a separate bill on the 10th of February, 1868, and its passage has been more generally demanded by the people and press of the country than any other financial measure before Congress.

The principle involved in this section is simply this: to make it possible for gold to come into this country and to remain here. Gold and silver are lawful money of the United States, and yet the opponents of this section would have us make it unlawful for a citizen to make and enforce contracts which he may hereafter make to pay gold when he has received gold or its equivalent as the consideration of his contract. The very statement of this doctrine ought to be its sufficient refutation. But the minds of gentlemen are vexed with the fear that this section will be an engine of oppression in the hands of creditors. If any new safeguards can be devised that are not already in this section I know not what they are.

Whenever this law is carried out in its letter and spirit no injustice can possibly result. The whole power of the law is in the hands of the creditor, and he alone is supposed to be in danger of suffering wrong. In the moment that remains to me I can do no more than to indicate the grounds on which the justice of this measure rests. It is a great and important step towards specie payments, because it removes the unwise and oppressive decree which almost expatriates American gold and silver from the country. It will not only allow our own coin to stay at home, but it will permit foreign coin to flow hither from Europe. More than seventy million dollars of our gold are going abroad every year, in excess of what comes to us, and at the same time in eight kingdoms of Europe there are nearly five hundred million dollars of idle gold ready to be invested at less than three per cent. interest. In the Bank of England and the Bank of France there has been for more than a year an average of more than three hundred million of bullion, and most of that time the bank rate of interest has been less than two per cent. Who can doubt that much of this gold would find its way here if it can be invested without committing the fortunes of its owners to the uncertain chances of inconvertible paper money. But the passage of this bill will enable citizens to transact their business on a fixed and certain basis. It will give stability and confidence to trade and pave the way for specie payments. The Supreme Court have in fact decided that this is now the law, but let us put it on the statute-book as a notice to the people and to prevent unnecessary litigation.

Mr. PRUYN. The gentleman speaks of that statement about Mr. Stevens not being denied. Mr. Stevens denied it on this floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I felt constrained when this bill was before the House to vote against it, and especially against its second section. I feel now that it is a duty I owe to myself and my constituents to present some explanation of the vote I am about to give against the conference report.

I believe, as has been said by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] that the passage of the second section of this bill will place the debtor class of the country entirely at the mercy of the creditor class and will result in wide-spread injustice and injury to the country. I believe it to be a bill altogether in the interest of the creditor class. Their wealth, intelligence, and position will always insure that they will be protected in the work of legislation.

I represent here a new community, composed mainly of farmers, who, while producing large crops of grain, are to a considerable extent, from their very enterprise and energy, a debtor class. Now, sir, whenever any one of these men finds his debt, perhaps a mortgage on his homestead, falling due, and in consequence of the low price of grain or the general derangement of the finances of the country, he cannot pay it, and has to ask for a renewal of his note, he will find himself completely at the mercy of his creditor, who under this section will have the right to compel him to agree to pay the debt in gold as a condition of the extension given him. It is true the bill provides that the value of the work or service or consideration of the debt is to be estimated on a gold basis, but the creditor will make the estimate.

When debts thus contracted fall due the debtor will have to draw on New York for the gold he has agreed to pay or pay the money-lender the difference between gold and greenbacks. In this way this provision will produce a widespread demand for gold; this will necessarily increase the value of gold, or in other words the margin of difference between gold and greenbacks, and postpone still further the resumption of specie payments. If we would equalize the values of gold and greenbacks we must do nothing to increase the demand for gold in the country. Such a bill as this, Mr. Speaker, will weigh heavily upon the debtor class of the country, and may be used as an instrument of great wrong and injustice, and therefore for one I cannot vote to sustain this conference report. The capitalists of the country are no worse than other men, but we should not tempt them by opportunities to drive a hard bargain with their debtors. I disapprove of the whole policy. It is an attempt to compel some of our citizens to resume specie payments at a time when the Government itself with all its vast resources is not able to do so. It proposes to establish two kinds of currency and two kinds of commercial transactions in our country. If the legal tenders are good they ought to be good for all citizens; if bad they must be bad for all. The Government has no right to say that if A owes B $1,000 he may pay it in greenbacks worth sixty cents on the dollar; but if C can coerce D into a gold contract C must then pay thirty-two per cent. more than A paid or than the Government itself pays to its creditors. I know it is said that the Supreme Court has decided in favor of the validity of gold contracts, but this decision applies only to gold contracts made before the passage of the legal-tender act. The reasoning of the Chief Justice may go further, but as I understand it the decision does not.

I have other objections to the first section of the bill, but I have not time now to state them.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri three minutes.

Mr. PILE. Mr. Speaker, money has no intrinsic value whether in gold or anything else except as it represents labor. Toil is the only foundation of value in civilized society. A dollar embracing so many grains' weight of gold or silver is worth a bushel of wheat, or less simply when it represents more or less labor than is necessary to produce it. These metals are the convenient mediums which civilized nations have adopted to represent toil in the commercial exchanges of the world. This whole talk of paying the debt of the Government represented by either bonds or greenbacks in anything but such representative of labor is simply no payment at all, and a proposition to pay the bonds in greenbacks leaves still open the question as to what we will pay the greenbacks in. The whole theory of all who have advocated this so-called payment is to me very much like making people rich by legislating money out of one pocket into the other. Gentlemen propose to pay the bonds in greenbacks, and then I suppose they would turn around and pay the greenbacks in bonds. It only results in the interchange of the two, putting paper in the shape of bonds into one pocket and then taking it out and putting it into the other in the form of greenbacks.

Now, sir, that part of the bill relating to gold contracts only affirms the doctrine recently announced by the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court has already decided in a recent case that contracts payable in gold by their terms are payable in coin; so that the effect of that decision will be the same as this law will make it. I am decidedly in favor of this bill as one step toward that durable standard of value—labor represented in coin—so desirable and so necessary to permanent financial prosperity.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MAYNARD. When this bill was before the House recently gentlemen may remember that I voted for the first section and against the second. By virtue of the recent decision of the Supreme Court the second section becomes a simple nullity, so that the argument of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] is without force, and therefore no good can result from throwing obstacles in the way of the passage of this bill, while much good may result from asserting what we believe to be the contract between the Government and its creditors. I think we had better take the report as it comes to us, and settle the question for all time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now yield for one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MILLER.]

Mr. MILLER. I am sorry the committee of conference could not agree to strike out the second section of the bill, for I fear that it will lead to a great deal of wrong. It provides that all contracts made payable in gold can be enforced. I admit that where a contract is made and the party gives value in gold that would be right enough; but according to the provisions of this bill every agreement that is entered into where they agree to pay gold will be enforced unless the party injured can prove that he did not receive gold value for the obligation signed payable in gold. And I would ask how it is to be proven, for the person obtaining such obligation no doubt would take care that there were no witnesses present, and the party injured could not be a witness except in the United States courts, where we have a statute allowing either party to be a witness, and so it is in some of the States; but it is not so in Pennsylvania and many others. We have seen great injustice done by shrewd creditors inserting exemption clauses in obligations by means of which many poor men and their families have been deprived of all the property they possessed, not even leaving a bed to lie on. I do not, Mr. Speaker, think we ought to embrace in this bill anything that might be construed to take advantage of an unfortunate debtor. As to the first section, I am decidedly in favor of it, except as to the proviso, but that is much better now than it was when it before passed this House. The substance of the first section is what the majority of the American people decided in relation to our Government bonds at the last presidential election. If, however, this second section should not be stricken out I will be constrained to vote for the bill, as the first section is of too much importance to be defeated.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield for three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I know nothing which can add to the force of this bill more than the way in which it is being discussed in this House. It was started out as "a bill to strengthen the credit of the United States," something like a "poor man's plaster" to be put upon the credit of the United States to strengthen it, as if the credit of this great country needed strengthening from anybody. Its title was cut off in the Senate, so that now it is only "a bill relating to the public debt," and then it was sent back here. It proposed when it started to say that it was the law and contract that the United States bonds should be paid in gold provided the notes were paid in gold; that is to say that it was the law that the bonds should be paid in coin when the notes were convertible into coin, and if the notes were not convertible into coin, then it was not the law that the bonds should be paid in coin. That having been struck out, we have now got a hocus-pocus in there which says that at some time when the debt is due it shall be paid in gold, provided we have got gold to pay it. The whole of this thing is simply a stock-jobbing, bill-broking, banking, gold speculative concern, and banks have made ten and fifteen millions out of this discussion and the pendency of this bill. While I do not mean to say that the gentlemen who have brought this forward intended that by any means, I state what the country knows and the House knows is the effect of this bill, and has been and will be the only effect.

Now, I have extended time of a minute and a half left to deal with the great legal and constitutional questions involved in the second section. The second section will convert every merchant and every man who makes a contract into a gold gambler. Let me give you an illustration. I want to buy a thousand pieces of cassimere. I go to a man who has them to sell and he offers to sell them at so much in gold and so much in paper. I make a contract with him for the gold price, and from that hour I am a speculator in the gold market to see in which way I can fulfill my contract with most profit. If gold goes up he buys to save himself; if it falls he endeavors to protect himself by hedging his past purchase.

Again, every debtor will be in the power of his creditor, for he cannot prove what the consideration of his debt was. Every bank can sell its bank notes to its customers and take their obligations to pay in gold.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. LOGAN. I have known that a bill may be attacked in various ways. And I know that sarcasm, and the manner in which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] deals with this bill, is a very great weapon in the hands of a person of ability. But such a weapon might be applied to the theory of the gentleman as well as to this bill.

This proposition is a plain and simple proposition. What is it? It is this: whether or not the United States of America shall pledge itself before the world that our indebtedness, both greenbacks and interest-bearing obligations, shall be paid in money, in that which is recognized as money by the nations of the earth? That is the proposition—neither more nor less.

This bill is not materially changed under the report of the committee of conference from what it was when it came from the Committee of Ways and Means of this House, and when two thirds of the House voted for it.

Now, what is the proposition of the gentleman who opposes this bill? It is that our greenbacks and our bonds shall not be paid in gold, for that is the converse of the proposition that they shall be paid in gold. Now, what does that mean? It means that I shall pay a debt that is due to-day by giving my note; that is all. It is something like the proposition of the Irishmen when called upon to pay a debt. A man came to him and said: "You owe me $100." "Yes," said the Irishman. "You must pay it now or give me your note at ten per cent. interest for three years." "Well," said the Irishman, "I will give you a note to be due at no particular time, and bearing no particular interest at all." [Laughter.] That is all there is in the opposition to this bill, this theory of paying a bond with a greenback, and then redeeming the greenback with another greenback or another bond.

Now, in reference to those gold contracts; the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] said that this would place the debtor in the power of the creditor. Now, I have never advocated this gold contract part of the bill. But in answer to the gentleman, I will say that he mistakes the character of this bill; he has got hold of some old bill; this bill as it now stands provides that contracts hereafter made and specifically conditioned to be paid in coin, and the consideration of which shall be the loan of coin or property or labor made on a gold coin basis, shall be paid in coin. Now, I see nothing wrong in that. The Supreme Court has said that is the law now. If so there is no harm in putting that declaration in this bill now. We will then all stand on the same basis. If there is no harm in the bill there is no reason why gentlemen should attack a good bill even if they think it unnecessary.

I am in favor of agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, because if you strike out one section of the bill now, the only result will be to defeat the whole proposition.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNES.]

Mr. BARNES. I failed to get the attention of the House or to secure any time to discuss this bill at the time of its original passage, which I desired to do. I am very glad for an opportunity now to say a few words in the limited time allotted to me. I was opposed to the first section of this bill declaring that the five-twentieths and the seven-thirtieths shall be paid in gold, because I know, as every member in this House knows, that when those bonds were issued the takers of them agreed to take the currency of the country in payment when those bonds should become due. But one good comes from the declaration in the bill as it is presented to us. The country needs a definite policy, a declared idea, with reference to what is the judgment of Congress in relation to the currency for the next several years.

Now, is it necessary that the legislative body of the country should declare whether we intend to pay gold in five years or do not intend to pay gold within twenty years? I admire the honesty and candor of gentlemen who in discussing this bill have declared that they do not believe that any system of legislation can force specie payments within the period of ten or fifteen years, for that is virtually what is proposed by this bill. Why, Mr. Speaker, there is not a bond of the United States now issued that will mature earlier than thirteen years hence; and if we were at any rate to pay gold at the maturity of these bonds, why should the declaration be made in reference to the payment of gold at all? But it seems to me that the country will hail with satisfaction the declaration that we are not to continue that species of moonshine legislation which makes to-day declarations which cannot be complied with to-morrow with reference to the enforcement of specie payments. It is in this view only that I regard the first section of this bill as beneficial or desirable.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE.]

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to argue this case at all, but simply to say that the answer to all the objections urged against the bill can be found in any New York paper of the present day. It has been stated that this measure is in the interest of the bankers, of the brokers, of the men who hold the money; but it is a notorious fact that ever since we have initiated legislation upon this subject looking to the declaration that our bonds shall be paid in gold, gold has been going down. If this decline of gold continues at the rate at which it has been going on there will come before a great while a time when we shall be able to resume specie payments. I think therefore that this is the best possible kind of legislation. All these prognostications of evil in the future—all these apprehensions of dark clouds overhanging our financial horizon—are completely dissipated by the simple fact that gold has been going down regularly every hour since this measure was first introduced.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JONES] for a question.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I shall not undertake in the brief time now allowed me to express an opinion on the merits of this bill, for I could not in that time give one satisfactory to myself. I merely desire to propound a question to the gentleman from Ohio. In explaining this bill he has stated that it provides for the redemption in coin of the interest-bearing and non-interest-bearing indebtedness of the Government, including greenbacks, at the earliest possible period. I have been rather inclined to think that that period is in the distant future, and I should be very glad to know whether the gentleman from Ohio in his elaborate calculations and researches has ascertained with any definiteness the period at which that consummation can be reached?

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir; I only hope that it will be very soon, and I think that it will be hastened by the adoption of such bills as this and other wise legislation that may follow. At the same time I believe that the prompt discharge of our national obligations depends upon the proper husbanding of our means and an energetic development of the resources of the country more than on any direct interposition of the legislative power. In my view we cannot command that the sick man shall get well at a particular hour.

I yield one minute to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.]

Mr. PIKE. I voted against the bill the other day upon the ground that it gave an undue preference to the bonded debt of the country, being, as I supposed, in the interest of the holders of the bonds and making no provision for the holders of the notes. This bill remedies that. It provides, as I understand, that we shall come to specie payment on the notes, and that when we arrive at specie payment on the notes we shall then pay the bonds. As to its effect it may have the effect to appreciate greenbacks and it may not. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that when our bonds are selling at 90 and 92 in the London market our greenbacks are no more than they were when our bonds were 75.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois for two minutes.

Mr. BURR. Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the special provisions of the bill of the committee of conference; but I have always been and still am opposed to all legislation which could have the tendency to bind the nation to what it is not already legally bound for in the way of our public indebtedness. We have some bonds outstanding which by their provisions are payable in the lawful money of the nation, which money is to-day known as greenbacks. All legislation which tends to bind the faith of the nation to the payment or redemption of those bonds in gold which were not originally so payable or redeemable adds to the public debt an amount equal to the difference between gold and lawful money. In other words it adds thirty-three and a half per cent. to that indebtedness and thus increases the burdens of taxation, giving rise to speculation and overreaching on the part of creditors as against debtors. It is a measure in favor of the rich man and against the toiling millions. I am opposed to it. Instead of securing the payment of the debt either in coin or greenbacks it is the first movement toward repudiation, and if attempted to be carried out will make the cry "repudiation" popular among the laboring masses of the country.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. BURR. I have this to say: that in the West during the last campaign, which turned in a great measure on financial questions, I never heard a Radical speaker advocating the election of General Grant on the proposition that the public bonds of the Government were to be paid ultimately in coin; and where they did not go squarely in favor—both sides I mean—of the payment in the legal money of the United States they dodged the question and refused to say anything about it. The platform made at Chicago said that they should be paid according to the "letter and spirit" of the contract, while in the pending bill we have nothing about the letter and spirit, but it is in plain old-fashioned terms, which every one understands, requiring the payment in coin or its equivalent. Last fall, when the election was pending, it was nothing but the letter and the spirit of the contract, without defining what that letter and spirit was; but the necessity for deception has gone by; success has been achieved on the "letter and spirit" plan of campaigning; Grant has been elected, and now the cloak is thrown off and labor must pay about eight hundred million dollars for the privilege of having aided in securing the success of the Radical party.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I stated in every speech I made, from the beginning to the end of the campaign, that those bonds were payable in gold.

Mr. SCHENCK. So did I.

Mr. SHANKS. And I said they were paid in greenbacks.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois for one minute.

Mr. BROWELL. I voted against this bill before, but not on account of anything contained in the first section. I was once elected on this very issue of the payment of these bonds in gold. I do not like to use the last minute of the gentleman's time in abusing his bill; but I must say this bill is bad for multifariousness if for nothing else. To say nothing of the confusion which prevails in all of the provisions of the first section of the bill, this second section, as it now stands, puts this Government in the position of issuing legal-tender notes, and while doing nothing to make them of par value, holding them up by law in court and broker's shops as of base value, and familiarizing the public in court proceedings and sheriffs' auctions as money not fit to be esteemed as such even by the Government which issues it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I simply desire to express the hope that I expressed the other day that this bill will pass this House by a decided majority. When the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURR] says he heard nothing in the advocacy of the election of General Grant that had any reference to paying our obligations in gold and silver I suspect the reason of that is that the gentleman only attended Democratic meetings. Now, it is a well-known fact, and I feel justified in announcing it, that General Grant did not hesitate to say that if the Chicago platform took an equivocal position, if the convention hesitated to declare the integrity of the obligation of this Government for the payment of its debt in gold and silver, he would not accept the nomination for the Presidency.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURR. To whom did General Grant make that statement?

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MCCARTHY. I have listened to many speeches on this question of finance and have arrived at this conclusion in my own mind as to what is necessary to bring about a final resumption of specie payments:

1. That we should hold the volume of the currency where it is without diminution.
2. That there should be no accumulation of gold in the Treasury of the United States.
3. That we should strengthen the credit of the Government; and for this purpose I shall vote for this bill as a very important move in that direction.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know whether the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BURR] has gone or not, but I did desire to reply to him when he spoke of this bill as being a poor man's plaster, which would do no good; by saying that the proof of the pudding is in the eating. He sneers at it as a bill to strengthen the public credit. It has already, in the mere prospect of its passage, strengthened the public credit, and it is strengthening it by making the people in this country and abroad believe that we are coming to subscribe to the doctrine that honesty is the best policy.

Now, sir, the gentleman cannot put down a proposition of this kind by sneers and vituperation, by calling it "a swindling brokers' bill." It is an honest bill, and if there be any swindling, repudiation, or playing into the hands of those who make a foot-ball of the credit of the country, it is on the part of those who oppose such an honest recognition of our obligations and who oppose the honest declaration of our party to discharge those obligations. Sir, it is just such speeches as that which the gentleman has made, just such talk about paying in greenbacks, just such demagogical appeals to the soft side, as it is supposed, of the people of the country upon this subject of the payment of the national debt that have cost us millions upon millions. Here we are a powerful nation, a great country, with resources which are the wonder of the world, and yet we cannot go into the market of the world and borrow money as cheaply as one of our States—Massachusetts, for instance, the gentleman's own State. We cannot borrow money as cheaply as the meanest Government of Europe, or almost any South American State. Why? Because we have such talk that people doubt our intention to pay honestly our debts according to the letter and spirit of the contract when they fall due. We could better afford to give such gentlemen $1,000,000 apiece to stay out of Congress than to have them come here and injure our public credit by such language as they use. That is all the question there is about the matter, and that is all I have to say on the subject. I move the previous question.

Mr. SHANKS. I move to lay the report on the table; and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 119, not voting 51; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Baker, Beatty, Beck, Boyer, Bromwell, Burr, Roderick R. Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, Newsham, Norris, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pierce, Pile, Plants, Poland, Price, Prince, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Roots, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Stover, Sypher, Taber, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and the Speaker—119.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Banks, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Cake, Colfax, Cook, Covode, Delano, Dockery, Edwards, Ela, Fox, French, Glossbrenner, Gravelly, Hamilton, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Kelley, Kelsey, Kitchen, Koontz, Loan, Loughbridge, Morrissey, Newcomb, Nunn, Pettis, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Polsley, Selye, Sitgreaves, Stokes, Taffe, Thomas, John Trimble, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—51.

So the House refused to lay the report of the committee of conference on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. KOONTZ stated that he had paired upon this question with Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, who was absent on a committee of conference. Mr. BUTLER would have voted "ay," and he (Mr. KOONTZ) "no."

Mr. ARCHER stated that Mr. PHELPS was absent on a committee of conference.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded, the question recurred upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. BURR called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 118, nays 57, not voting 43; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Brooks, Broomall, Buckley, Cake, Callis, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Van Horn, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, and Windom—43.

So the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. KOONTZ stated that he was paired on this question with Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. BUTLER would have voted "no" and he [Mr. KOONTZ] "ay."

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST ROAD BILL.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 2006, to establish certain post roads. There is no legislation in the amendments, merely the addition of other routes. I ask that the amendments be concurred in.

No objection being made, the amendments were taken from the Speaker's table and concurred in.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1744) to strengthen the public credit, and relating to contracts for the payment of coin.

The hour of half past four p. m. having arrived, the House, pursuant to previous order, took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The hour of half past seven p. m. having arrived, the House resumed its session.

ASSIGNEES IN BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. JENCKES, from the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States, submitted a report in writing upon the subject of the mode of appointing assignees in bankruptcy; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST A MEMBER.

Mr. JENCKES also submitted a report in writing from the select committee on the subject of the allegations of Mr. Brooks, of New York, against Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF CONTESTANTS.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at the present time a joint resolution for the payment of Caleb S. Hunt and J. Willis Menard.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that the sum of $2,500 each shall be paid to Caleb S. Hunt and J. Willis Menard, to defray their expenses as contestants for a seat in the House of Representatives from the State of Louisiana, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the introduction and consideration of this joint resolution at this time?

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] will consent to reduce the amount to $1,500 each, according to the precedent which we have already set.

Mr. WARD. I object to the introduction of this resolution at this time.

Mr. DAWES. Then I move to suspend the rules, in order that I may introduce the resolution and have it agreed to at this time.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. DAWES; and upon a division there were—ayes 44, noes 17; no quorum voting.

Mr. DAWES. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. BANKS. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 57, not voting 110; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Benton, Boyden, Broomall, Cake, Coburn, Cook, Dawes, Donnelly, Eggleston, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferriss, Fields, French, Golladay, Gove, Hawkins, Hunter, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Koontz, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, Maynard, McCormick, McKee, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Mullins, Niblack, Orth, Paine, Poland, Price, Raum, Stevens, Stokes, Taber, Taylor, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Whittemore, James F. Wilson and Wood—55.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Ames, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Baker, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Brooks, Callis, Churchill, Corley, Cornell, Driggs, Eckley, Farnsworth, Goss, Gravely, Haughey, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Jenckes, Johnson, Julian, Ketcham, Kitchen, Knott, Marvin, McCarthy, Merour, Moorhead, Morrissey, Nicholson, Norris, O'Neill, Perham, Peters, Plants, Prince, Robertson, Roots, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Sypher, Thomas, Twichell, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, William B. Washburn, and Windom—57.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnell, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Bowen, Boyer, Bromwell, Buckland, Buckley, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cary, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Colfax, Covode, Cullom, Delano, Dewesse, Dickey, Dixon, Dockery, Dodge, Edwards, Eldridge, James T. Elliott, Ferry, Fox, Garfield, Gotz, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Heaton, Hill, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Asabel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Judd, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kerr, Laffin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Mallory, Marshall, McCullough, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Newsham, Nunn, Pettis, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Polsley, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Selye, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Stewart, Stone, Stover, Taffe, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, Woodward, and Young—110.

So the motion for a call of the House was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. DAWES to suspend the rules.

Mr. WOOD. Is this a joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WOOD. Then it will require the concurrence of the Senate and the approval of the President.

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. WOOD. I doubt very much whether there is time to procure either.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules, there were—ayes 87, noes 31.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 476) for the payment of Caleb S. Hunt and J. Willis Menard was introduced, and read a first and second time.

Mr. DAWES. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL.]

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire only to say that this is the proper way of getting at the matter, by joint resolution, which will have the authority of law. The Committee on Accounts have no objection to this mode of payment, although of course they reserve their individual right as members to vote for or against the measure as they please. Our objection was to the House taking money out of its own contingent fund, and then asking the committee against their own judgment to sanction what had been done.

Mr. DAWES. I yield for five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARD.]

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state the facts in this case as I understand them. Three gentlemen were claimants for a seat in this House from one district in the State of Louisiana. Their cases were submitted to the Committee of Elections, who decided that no one of them was entitled to the seat. The committee rejected the claims of all of them.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to remind the gentleman that one of the contestants came here with the Governor's certificate under the seal of the State.

Mr. WARD. All the claimants were rejected. The question whether these three gentlemen should all be paid after their claims to the seat had been rejected was submitted to this House; and the House upon deliberation has refused to pay them anything. Finally the matter was referred to the Committee on Accounts; and that committee decided to report in favor of paying one of these contestants. These, as I understand, are the facts.

Mr. BENTON. You are altogether mistaken.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman is entirely incorrect.

Mr. WARD. Now, I would like to know upon what principle we are to pay three men who come here demanding a seat and all of whom have been rejected. Is it possible that each one of these gentlemen had such claims to the seat as justified him in making a contest? Is it possible that each of them could have a prima facie right to the seat?

It seems to me we should not be too liberal with the public money. It appears to me we should begin to redeem some of our broken promises to the people. We have pledged ourselves to commence a system of economy and reform; to retrench in every possible way; to stop every leak in the public Treasury. This is what we have promised the people in our platforms, our resolutions, our public speeches and declarations. It is about time that we should begin somewhere, somehow, and in some manner to stop the outrageous public expenditures which are constantly going on here. In this last night of the sessions of the Fortieth Congress let us commence a wholesome reform; let us inaugurate this work of economy. Let us admonish the twenty-five or thirty contestants for seats in the next Congress that if they come here claiming seats they must come here with a reasonable case; that every adventurer in the land shall not, if he can get a few votes in his favor, come here and make a contest, and after being rejected by the House be allowed his expenses as an inducement to all men of the same character and under similar circumstances to do in the future the same thing.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to correct the gentleman from New York in his facts. I have an impression that when he comes to understand the facts I shall have the aid of his powerful voice in support of this measure.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed the Army appropriation bill, with sundry amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move, by unanimous consent, the amendments of the Senate to the Army appropriation bill be non-concurred in, and that the House request a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly; and Mr. GARFIELD, Mr. BEAMAN, and Mr. DONGE, were appointed as managers of said conference on the part of the House.

PAY OF CONTESTANTS—AGAIN.

Mr. DAWES. Let me make a brief statement of facts in this case, and I will then leave the matter to the House. It is true that three gentlemen came here claiming seats, but in all the other facts which the gentleman from New York stated he is mistaken. These three gentlemen contested two seats, one the seat of Mr. Mann and the other two a vacancy, and they were separately and distinctly rejected. The Committee of Elections proposed to pay them and the House of Representatives decided that they should be paid $2,500 each. Now, what is the reason they have not been paid? The resolution was submitted to the Committee on Accounts and the Committee on Accounts undertook to decide for the House where the House had already decided for itself. The Committee on Accounts decided to pay one $2,500, and he has got his pay and is on his way to New Orleans. They took this poor colored man who came here with a certificate of the Governor of the State of Louisiana that he was entitled to a seat here, and they said, notwithstanding the House had decided he should have $2,500, that he should not be treated as well as the white man to whom they gave $2,500. They refused this colored man the $2,500 which the House voted him, and they took Caleb Hunt and served him in the same way.

I propose to submit a motion to the House, whether in their opinion a man who is a black man is to be denied the same rights that are accorded to a white man under the same circumstances; [laughter;] whether when a colored man and a white man are voted $2,500 each that money should be given to the white man and refused to the colored man? [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. WARD. I ask that the gentleman now yield to me.

Mr. HIGBY rose.

Mr. DAWES. I do not yield to anybody. I appeal to the House that they will not be carried away by their prejudices against color and race. [Laughter.] I appeal to them to do justice to the first black man who ever came here with a certificate that he was elected to a seat in this House. I appeal to them not to treat him by one rule and the white man by another. I ask the gentlemen who passed the constitutional amendment to see that this is not done. Mr. Speaker, it is unconstitutional to treat him differently. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARD. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to acquit the Committee on Accounts of acting from any prejudice against color. It is a mistaken view of their duty, Mr. Speaker, that has induced them to commit this extraordinary error, and I desire to acquit my most esteemed friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BROOMALL. The gentleman from Massachusetts knows as well as any member of this House that I make no such distinction between race and color upon which his whole charge has been based. The committee rejected the claims of two men, one a little whiter and the other a little darker than the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Laughter.] One was a Democrat and the other a Republican, and I regret that I am not enabled to say which was the Democrat and which the Republican, but I presume that the one nearest the color of the gentleman from Massachusetts was the Democrat. [Laughter.] I wish to put this matter on its right footing. The gentleman ought to have known when he was making the charge that it was unfair.

Mr. KERR. I want the House to understand that both these gentlemen are Republicans. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOMALL. I do not yield. I do not know that I have anything more to say on the subject. [Laughter.] I desire, Mr. Speaker, that the previous question shall be—

Mr. HIGBY. I rise to a question of order. When the gentleman has said he has nothing more to say he ought to take his seat. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOMALL. I hope the previous question will not be sustained, and if it is not I will make a motion to reduce the amount to $1,500 each; because these two men were engaged in a single contest which began the first of December last, whereas the others had to contest their seats for a period reaching through the entire Congress.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman does not know as much about it as the Committee of Elections.

Mr. BROOMALL. Let me say that I got my information from the chairman of the Committee of Elections. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. You must not trust him too much. [Laughter.] I now yield to my eloquent and economical friend from New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARD. I am greatly obliged to my friend for his complimentary allusion, for I consider it so to be called economical in these spendthrift times. Now, I do not think I misstated the matter to the House. I said that it had not been favorably considered by the House. I did not understand that a reference of the subject to the Committee on Accounts was the passage of a measure in favor of this allowance. I understood the Committee on Accounts reported in favor of one of the contestants and against the other, and it seems to me it is sufficient to pay one of them. I do not know how the matter of color can affect this question. It is with me a question of cash; and I admonish gentlemen that unless they come pretty soon to saving the public money and retrenching the public expenditures, their tax-ridden constituents will come down here and turn them out of these Halls and empty them into the Potomac. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAWES. It is with me a question not of cash, but of justice. I now yield to my emaciated friend from Missouri. [Laughter.]

Mr. STOVER. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. I wish the words of the gentleman from Massachusetts taken down. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Missouri is slandered; he is not an emaciated friend of his. [Laughter.]

Mr. STOVER. Mr. Speaker, when I want the gentleman from Wisconsin to defend me I will call upon him personally. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I am not defending him, but the honor of this House. Of course I could not defend him in that. [Laughter.]

Mr. STOVER. I am sorry the honor of this House has no able champion. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I desire briefly to state my knowledge of the question at issue. Some time near the beginning of this Congress there was an election in Louisiana. Simon Jones was the contestant of Mr. Mann. He was here until within a few days ago, when that case was decided. The sum of $2,500 was awarded him by this House. I understand he got the money. The case is quite different with Mr. Hunt and Mr. Menard. I care not whether Mr. Menard is black or white. The case is here upon its merits, and on those merits let him stand or fall. Neither care I whether Mr. Hunt is a Democrat or anything else. I have not been able to find out what he is. But these are the facts: these men came here some four weeks after the session commenced; they were here only a portion of the time after they came here, one of them at least being at home attending to his business. Now, I protest here in my place against paying them $2,500, when members of this House who were here at least one month before these men came here, and who have worked faithfully during the whole session, day and night, receive only $1,600. I think when this House votes them $1,500 it is all they should expect, and all that in reason and justice can be given to them. Sir, as a member of this House, while gentlemen stand here prating about liberty and justice, I insist that we cannot afford to be benevolent at the expense of our constituents. They sent us here as guardians of their interests and guardians of their honor, and I say that in justice to our constituents we should at last, even at this late hour—at eight o'clock on the last day of the session—put into practice that which we professed before our constituents at home. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAWES. I call the previous question.

Mr. WARD. I move to lay the joint resolution on the table.

Mr. DAWES. If the House will not vote this sum they ought not to vote another dollar to contestants. It would be as much as to say that they will pick out the men whom they will pay as contestants, and say to this man, "You shall be paid;" and to the other, "Go away; we do not like the looks of you."

Mr. WARD. I call for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House refused to lay the joint resolution on the table.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. DAWES moved the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WARD called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DAWES and Mr. WARD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported thirty-six in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 73, nays 72, not voting 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Banks, Beaman, Benton, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Calk, Callis, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Corley, Cornell, Cullum, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, Fessy, French, Garfield, Gove, Gravely, Haughey, Heaton, Hooper, Hopkins, Ingersoll, Jencks, Julian, Kelley, Kellogg, Lakin, Lincoln, Loan, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, Milner, Moorhead, Morrell, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Pierce, Pike, Poland, Prince, Robertson, Roots, Sawyer, Shanks, Starkweather, Stewart, Sypher, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, and Windom—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Baker, Barnes, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Bingham, Brownell, Buckland, Buckley, Burr, Coburn, Cook, Deweese, Eckley, Eldridge, Ferriss, Fields, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Goss, Grover, Haight, Harding, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Longbridge, Lynch, McCormick, McKee, Mercer, Moore, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Pile, Raum, Ross, Scofield, Stevens, Stokes, Stover, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Van Trump, Ward, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—72.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, Bailey, Baldwin, Barnum, Blackburn, Blaine, Boles, Bowen, Boyden, Boyer, Brooks, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cary, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Clift, Colfax, Covode, Delano, Dickey, Dixon, Dockery, Driggs, Edwards, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Hawkins, Higby, Hill, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Alexander H. Jones, Kelsey, Ketcham, Lash, Logan, Marshall, McCullough, Mullins, Myers, Newsham, Nunn, Phelps, Plants, Polsley, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Schenck, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Stone, Taffe, Taylor, Tift, John Trimble, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Young—77.

So the joint resolution was passed.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a privileged question. I submit a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill for the removal of certain disabilities from the persons therein named.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1746) entitled "An act for the removal of certain disabilities from the persons therein named," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows.

That the House of Representatives agree to the amendment of the Senate with the following amendments:

Page 4, line ninety-six, strike out "C. L. Sayre." Line ninety-eight strike out "Samuel R. Rayburn" and insert "Samuel K. Rayburn." Line ninety-nine, strike out "J. G. Harris" and insert "J. K. Harris." Line one hundred and one, strike out "Arthur C. Bran, Marengo county; T. M. Dansby."

W. M. STEWART,

LYMAN TRUMBULL,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. F. FARNSWORTH,

JAMES B. BECK,

B. W. NORRIS,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I move to lay the report of the committee of conference on the table.

Mr. DICKEY. I second that motion.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not now in order. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] asks me to yield to him for a moment for some purpose.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to ask to have taken from the Speaker's table a small pension bill, that I may move an amendment to it that it may go back to the Senate.

Mr. HIGBY. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If there is objection I cannot yield.

Mr. ORTH. I object.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, if the House has listened to the reading of the report they will see that it is the report of the committee of conference upon a bill which passed this House perhaps six weeks ago.

The Senate amended the bill by adding to it a number of names, perhaps a hundred; or rather they adopted a substitute for the bill, embracing the names in the House bill and others also. To most of the names added by the Senate there was no objection; they were regularly and properly recommended by parties well known to the members of the committees of the two Houses and to many of the members of the two Houses. When the amendment of the Senate came to the House it was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction. That committee made up a report, and at first directed me to report their action to the House, which was to agree to a part of the names, to strike out some of them, and to rectify some errors. But subsequently the committee changed the direction which they had given to me, and ordered that I should ask the House to non-concur in the Senate amendment. The House did non-concur, and a committee of conference was appointed. I believe the report of the committee of conference as it now stands embraces the names of only two or three persons, perhaps the name of only one person, to whose relief there was objection, except the general objection on the part of some gentlemen here to relieve anybody.

Mr. DICKEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Not at present. We have stricken out the names of those who appear to the Committee on Reconstruction of the House to be obnoxious and objectionable for any reason. But there is left in the bill the name of one gentleman with regard to whom the Reconstruction Committee was not agreed, though I think the majority of the committee agree that he ought to be relieved. That name is Richard Parker, one of the judges of the State courts of Virginia. The other names that were added in the Senate were nearly all of them added on the recommendations and motions of Senators from the southern States. Those names have been examined by members of the House from the several States where the persons reside; and so far as the committee of conference were advised of any objection at the time of our meeting to any of these names, they have been stricken from the bill. I am advised that objection will be made here to-night to Judge Parker, whose name I have already mentioned. And I desire to ask attention to his case for a few moments.

It appears from the papers, and we have a great many of them in reference to Judge Parker, that he was a judge of a court of the State of Virginia for several years before the rebellion. He continued to hold the office during the war. Immediately upon the organization of the provisional government in Virginia Judge Parker was first appointed by Governor Peirpoint, and afterward unanimously elected, I believe, by the Legislature of the State one of the judges of the State. As a judge of the court he took no new oath upon the secession of Virginia; none was expected of him or required. His politics before the war were those of a Douglas Democrat. It is testified by a great many worthy gentlemen, and among them one whose name will be recognized by all the old members of this House as a gentleman entitled to the fullest credit. I refer to Hon. John S. Millson, formerly a member of this House and a thorough-going Union man, as all the members of this House know who were members before the war.

The objection to Judge Parker arises from a charge made by him to the grand jury in the city of Winchester in 1861. This was soon after the State of Virginia seceded, and when the people of that section, as of most other sections of that State, were running mad upon this question of secession. Judge Parker, upon opening the court at Winchester, Virginia, at the time to which I have referred, charged the grand jury that as the State had seceded and adopted a separate and independent government it would be treason on the part of any of her citizens to give aid, countenance, or support to the enemy, meaning the Government of the United States; that it was the first duty of the citizens of Virginia to give obedience to the laws of that State. He nowhere in that charge, that I can find, upheld the idea of secession; nowhere expressed the opinion that Virginia had done right in seceding. As a lawyer and judge of the State-rights school he charged the jury what he supposed to be the law, and, although I do not wish to raise the question with my brother lawyers upon this floor to be discussed here, what I confess was the law of Virginia at that time.

Virginia being recognized by the United States as having belligerent rights and as an enemy having a de facto government, Judge Parker's charge was strictly and legally correct. That, however, was in 1861. What was Judge Parker's course subsequently? He was constantly under suspicion by the rebels on account of his former opposition to secession; and such was his course that he was at one time arrested and incarcerated by the rebels of Virginia; and his salary was upon a full discussion in the rebel legislature of that State withheld from him, and has not been paid to him to this day, because he was regarded by that rebel legislature as unsound with reference to the rebel cause.

Now, I wish to direct the attention of the House to the testimonials in behalf of Judge Parker. I have here, in the first place, his own petition. Then there is a petition of twenty-three attorneys of the bar of Frederick county, Virginia, asking the removal of the disabilities of Judge Parker under the fourteenth article of the constitutional amendments. I will read that letter:

WINCHESTER, VIRGINIA, December 4, 1863.

The undersigned members of the Winchester bar, having learned that all the judges of this judicial section, at the request of the bar of some of their circuits, have united in an application or memorial to the Congress of the United States to be relieved from the disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, do most earnestly request that you unite in this application and make private considerations of delicacy subservient to the public good.

Very respectfully, yours, &c.,

Hon. RICHARD PARKER, Judge, &c.

This letter is signed, I believe, by all the members of the bar of that county. The name of one man, C. W. Gibbons, was subsequently erased from the petition, and he sends a letter here against the removal of Judge Parker's disability. Another attorney whose name has never been erased from this paper, Thomas S. Hargest, sends to the committee sundry protests against the relief of Judge Parker. I believe that all the protests sent to the committee with reference to this case, with the exception of one or two letters, are in the handwriting of one of these same lawyers who signed this letter urgently requesting Judge Parker to make this application. I will now ask the Clerk to read a letter from Hon. John S. Millson, formerly a member of this House.

NORFOLK, February 6, 1869.

MY DEAR SIR: The interest I feel in the application made to Congress for the removal of the disabilities of Judge Parker, of Winchester, Virginia, will, I hope, excuse me for troubling you with this letter. He is my friend and brother-in-law, and an intimate acquaintance of more than forty years warrants me in assuring you of his excellent personal and judicial character and enables me to speak confidently of his political opinions and course.

Judge Parker was always an earnest, firm, and constant opponent of secession and supporter of the Union. He may have incurred some disabilities, though I have several times labored to convince him that it was only a too sensitive conscience that induced the apprehension that he had. It was indeed hardly possible to live so long under confederate control without some yielding or compliance now and then that might be deemed a technical giving of aid to the enemies of the United States.

I have had many conversations with him since the close of the war. His views and opinions upon the important questions of the day are those of one who knows and feels that governments and laws should be administered not with reference to the prejudices of a past condition of society, but according to the requirements and wants of the existing state of things. If you knew them as well as I do you would be surprised, as I have been, not simply that objection should be made to his application, but that it should come from the quarter from which, according to the newspapers, it has proceeded. I had really supposed that if any such case could pass without opposition it would be his.

Judge Parker is one of the few steadfast opponents of secession now on the bench in Virginia. He has held his office nearly twenty years, so that during the war he simply continued to discharge the duties of his office under the State without any new appointment or qualification. He was one of the first judges whose reappointment because of his thorough Unionism was determined upon by Governor Peirpoint after the close of the war. But he was not at all in favor among those who controlled the fortunes of the confederate government. To them he was always an object of distrust, and I believe that some discriminating legislation was once resorted to with a view to disparage him. He was, on one occasion at least, subjected to arrest and detention.

Of the particular objection urged against Judge Parker I am not informed. As I am sure it cannot refer either to his private or judicial character or conduct, but rests upon some mistaken notion of his political opinions and feelings, I am led to conclude that it proceeds from persons who knew him very slightly or not at all.

I know you will excuse an old congressional associate for thus adding to your Representative cares. But I have thought it due alike to Congress and to Judge Parker to contribute my testimony toward the explanation of his case.

I remain, very respectfully, yours,

JOHN S. MILLSON.

Hon. JOHN F. FARNSWORTH,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. SHANKS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether this is the same Judge Parker before whom John Brown was tried and under whose judgment he was hanged? I think he is the same man. I think I knew him personally in the State of Virginia.

Mr. ELA. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] whether this is the Judge Parker who charged the grand jury?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ELA] had listened to what I have been saying he would not have asked me that question. I suppose that every judge charges the grand jury, if he has one; but I have been speaking of the charge which Judge Parker made at Winchester; and I suppose it is that charge to which the gentleman from New Hampshire refers.

Mr. SHANKS. I hope the gentleman will answer my question whether this is not the Judge Parker who tried and hanged John Brown? I say he is the same man.

Mr. MULLINS. And I have no doubt he would hang the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] to-morrow if he got the chance. [Laughter.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have never heard that Judge Parker was the judge of the court that tried John Brown. I think he was not. I do not recollect who the judge was. My friend from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] says he knows who the judge was. I do not know. I suppose some record will show who was the judge that tried that case. At all events Judge Parker is the judge of the Winchester district. At all events I do not understand that the constitutional amendment disqualifies any one for trying John Brown. If that is so I should like to have gentlemen point it out to me.

Mr. SHANKS rose.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I decline for the present; but I will yield by and by.

Mr. SHANKS. The gentleman has asked a question and I should like to answer it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will now read a letter from General Strother, well known, I suppose, to members of the House not only as a gallant Union soldier, but as a finished writer:

BERKLEY SPRINGS, February 5, 1869.

MY DEAR SIR: I am informed that Judge Richard Parker, of Winchester, is or is about to be removed from the bench of that district on account of disabilities incurred during the late rebellion, &c.

I have not heard of the especial charges urged against Judge Parker in this movement, and therefore cannot consider them, but on general principles I should think it a matter of regret that the public in this crisis should lose the services of so capable and high-toned a gentleman as he has always shown himself to be both in public and private life.

In April or May, 1861, when the spirit and power of the rebellion had full sway in Virginia I heard Judge Parker, in conversation with my father and myself, denounce the secession movement from beginning to end with the most sincere and intelligent indignation. I heard afterward that when the community in which he resided, with all its population and social, political, and legal organizations, had yielded to the control of the confederacy, he had at the solicitation of numerous (then) conservative fellow-citizens consented to hold over and retain the judgeship for the purpose of keeping the office and its influence from falling into the hands of another who might prove a tool of the rebel conspirators.

That this motive was well judged I have good reason to know personally, for when my aged father was seized and carried prisoner to Winchester by rebel partisans it was through Judge Parker's court that he was released and returned to his home and friends. And I have heard of divers others who were protected by the same tribunal from the outrages and oppressions of the active agents of rebellion. Nor have I ever heard during the four years' reign of terror and treason of any judicial or personal act of his which indicated his acquiescence in the assumption of power which dominated that unfortunate section. On the contrary, when in my military capacity I visited and sojourned in Winchester during the late war, Judge Parker's house was always pointed out to me as that of a Union man, living in the most guarded quiet and seclusion. Although personally friendly to him I respected the difficulties of his position and forbore to visit him, lest it might implicate him in more serious trouble with the enemies of our common country, who already regarded him with coldness and who refused to pay the salary due to the judgeship because they considered the incumbent disaffected to their bad cause. Indeed, had it not been for the high esteem in which Judge Parker's personal character was held it is probable he would have been driven northward during the war.

Under these circumstances, while traitors and criminals of all grades are holding up their heads in impunity and even honor in a country which they so lately sought to destroy there would appear to be neither justice nor policy in permitting the iron rule to be brought down upon this upright and good citizen whose opinions were never disloyal, and who in yielding to the pressure of circumstances used his office rather to protect the rights and persons of outraged loyalists than to support the pretensions of treason.

If in your judgment the presentation of this statement might be of any service to Judge Parker I beg that you will place it in the proper hands.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
DAVID H. STROTHER,
Late Brevet Brig. Gen'l, U. S. Vols.;
Late Adj't Gen'l of Virginia.

Hon. P. G. VAN WINKLE,
United States Senator.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken the pains to read this entire letter though long, because it is from the pen of a brave and gallant soldier of the Union Army as well as an intelligent writer for the Union cause, whose name is well known, not only to members of the House but to the country at large; and I do think a testimonial like this from a Virginian "to the manner born," who was true to the flag when it was something to be true, and who is acquainted with Judge Parker and his character. Such a testimonial outweighs the protest of men who have not lived in Virginia more than twelve months.

Here, too, are petitions of citizens of Winchester, Frederick county, Virginia, in favor of removing the political disabilities of Judge Parker. I have also the letter of Mr. Meade, a well-known Union man of Winchester, Virginia, in favor of the same thing. Here is one I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WINCHESTER, VIRGINIA,
February 15, 1869.

DEAR SIR: Having had the honor of your acquaintance heretofore, I take the liberty of addressing to you this certificate of the character of the citizens who have signed the two memorials to Congress asking the removal of the disabilities of Judge Richard Parker, of Virginia.

I certify that the following persons whose names are upon the said memorials are now and were throughout the whole of the war unconditional and uncompromising Union men, namely:

George F. Miller,	Daniel Wright,
Joseph N. Jolliffe,	James H. Barnhart,
George Aulick,	Samuel L. Larew,
Thomas B. Wood,	Henry M. Brent,
S. K. Atwell,	Daniel T. Wood,
Josiah L. Baker,	Abner Hodgson,
Tilman Shumate,	German Smith,
William Busey,	Z. Silvers,
W. L. Trimble,	A. H. Hackney,
A. F. Hyatt,	Peter Hett,
David Robinson,	John W. Sampson,
John F. Smith,	F. S. McKohn,

And I certify that these gentlemen represent the Union property-holders of this county, and are themselves worth not less than half a million dollars, mostly in real estate.

Of the other names upon the memorials, some of them are gentlemen who have come to this country from the North since the close of the war, and the rest have always been quiet citizens; old residents of the county, and men of wealth.

As a property-holder and a resident citizen of this county I hope that the disabilities of Judge Parker will be removed.

I will add that I am a known uncompromising Union man, and that I was the candidate of the Union party in this county for the late convention which formed the constitution in this State under the reconstruction acts.

Very respectfully, yours,

DAVID LUPTON.

Hon. HENRY WILSON, United States Senate.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will state, without reading any more papers, that I have the indorsement of Senators VAN WINKLE and WILLEY and Representative HUBBARD, of West Virginia, and also a letter from Judge Lewis, chairman of the Republican committee of Frederick county. I will not take up time to read them.

Mr. JULIAN. The gentleman from Illinois has read documents or had them read to show this man has been loyal during the war. I ask him to let me condemn Judge Parker out of his own mouth.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have already stated the charge to the grand jury.

Mr. JULIAN. Will the gentleman allow me to have read a brief extract?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I cannot yield.

Mr. MULLINS. Oh, no; he will never yield to have the facts given.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I cannot yield for any garbled extracts from newspapers.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question not connected with this matter at all? I desire to know if the names of George W. Jones, of Tennessee, and Henry S. Foote, of Mississippi, are included.

Mr. MULLINS. Mr. Foote is of Tennessee now.

Mr. LOGAN. Are they included by the committee of conference?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. They were not put in by the committee.

Mr. LOGAN. Are they in the bill?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. They are in the Senate amendment to the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Have these two men ever asked over their own signatures to be relieved of their disabilities?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hold in my hand a letter of Mr. Jones asking Congress to relieve him from disabilities, which I will read.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wanted to know the fact. I understand they do not ask it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will state, so far as Mr. Jones is concerned, I know he did ask it during the last session of Congress.

Mr. LOGAN. How with Mr. Foote?

Mr. NORRIS. The names of the two gentlemen were before the Committee on Reconstruction, and they were not put in. They were put in by the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wanted to know if these two men have petitioned Congress for relief.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will read an extract from the letter of Mr. Jones, so that the matter may stand fairly before the House. Mr. Jones was formerly a member of this House, as old members will recollect. He was not a secessionist in 1861. He writes as follows:

"I see from the proceedings of Congress, as reported, that the removal of disabilities from southern men is again under consideration. I would like to have all disabilities removed from me; not that I ever expect or desire again to hold office, but merely to have the thing done. You know me well and my course as a member of Congress. I never was a secessionist nor a disunionist, but was always and am yet a Democrat, and could not honestly be anything else. I know I love and honor the Constitution and Government of the United States. I am loyal."

[Laughter.]

Mr. SYPHER. Is he not a member of the Ku Klux Klan?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. He then refers to members of Congress who knew him. It is not necessary I should read that part of the letter.

Mr. LOGAN. I make no point on that; but how about Mr. Foote?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will answer in regard to him so far as I know. I do not know that he has petitioned for the removal of his disabilities. His name was put in by the Senate on motion of a Senator. I will say, however, it was not the Senator from Nevada, who had charge of the bill, but another Senator.

Mr. SYPHER. I desire to put the same question relative to M. B. Lasalle.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Some of these names were put in, as in the case of Mr. Jones, by the Senate. The name of the gentleman alluded to by the member from Louisiana I understand was put in on the motion of the Senators from Louisiana.

Mr. SHANKS. I want the gentleman from Illinois to state whether he does or does not know that this man Foote at Andersonville, during the rebellion, gloated over the murders and outrages committed upon Union prisoners by the confederate authorities? He stood there and looked upon them and gave his approval of those personal outrages, black and damnable as they were. Sir, I am opposed to voting for the relief of the man who committed such crimes against the Government and the people.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not know anything of that.

Mr. SHANKS. I do know it; and it has been proven by sworn witnesses time and time again before me, and I have reported it to the House within the last ten days.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If the gentleman from Indiana makes that statement of his own knowledge I am bound to believe it.

Mr. SHANKS. I state it on the sworn testimony of soldiers who suffered in his presence—testimony taken before a committee of this House. I make that statement. I stand here to declare it before the American people. As for this man Parker, I know him personally, and know him to be the judge who tried John Brown.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I decline to yield further.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 528) to carry into effect the decree of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York in the case of the British steamer Labuan, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I now yield for five minutes to my colleague on the Reconstruction Committee from Michigan, [Mr. BEAMAN.]

Mr. BEAMAN. It is utterly impossible for me to make any presentation of this case in five minutes, but I desire, if I can have sufficient time, to present some reasons why, in my judgment, this report of the committee of conference ought not to be agreed to. It is not necessary perhaps at this time to show conclusively that this Judge Parker ought not to be relieved, because everybody understands that at this stage of the session we have not time for deliberation.

My colleague on the Committee on Reconstruction has introduced some letters and papers for the purpose of showing that loyal men are in favor of relieving Judge Parker. I desire to present the statements of loyal men to show that there is at least a doubt whether he ought to be relieved, more especially as the ostensible object of his applying for relief is that he may continue to hold an office which he now occupies. I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the proceedings of a meeting of the Winchester Council of the Union League.

The Clerk read as follows:

At a meeting of the Winchester Council of the Union League of America, held in their chamber, Saturday, January 23, 1869, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas a few disfranchised rebels and others in sympathy with them in the interests of the rebel element of this section of Virginia, and in order to retain among them influence tending to defeat reconstruction in Virginia under the proposed plan, are now vigorously seeking the removal of the political disabilities from Richard Parker, acting Judge of the thirteenth judicial circuit, and who is incapacitated by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States to perform the functions of said office of circuit judge; and whereas said Richard Parker as judge of said circuit did, at the beginning of the war, in June, 1861, prostitute the judicial office to the interest and purpose of the rebellion and from the bench did charge the grand jury of his court to indict all men who were suspected of loyalty to the Union or opposed to the dismemberment thereof, and announced as his well-considered opinion that the State of Virginia had a perfect legal right to secede from the Federal Union, and did thus crush out every sentiment of loyalty and inaugurated a system of judicial proscription not surpassed by any Jeffries of the seventeenth century, as far as was in his power to do so; and whereas the said Richard Parker has not since the war by word declared nor by any act indicated a retraction of said treasonable utterances thus judicially announced, nor has he in any wise, so far as we are informed, changed his mind in regard to the sentiments pronounced in said charge; but on the contrary he did, forgetting the dignity of his office, in a public harangue delivered before the court-house in Winchester in September, 1866, upon his return from the Philadelphia August convention, which he attended as a delegate, denounce the Congress of the United States in unmeasured and bitter terms as a tyrannical usurpation, &c., and did on the same occasion oppose and denounce in advance the reconstruction of the rebel States: Therefore

Resolved, That Richard Parker is not worthy of any congressional clemency, and we hereby express our contempt and indignation at the design of rebels and others in his behalf.

Resolved, That we do hereby in the name of all the loyal citizens of this judicial circuit most respectfully but emphatically protest against the removal of the said Judge Parker's disabilities.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the Reconstruction Committee of the House of Representatives, the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, United States Senate, and Hon. SAMUEL SHELLABARGER, member of Congress.

A. M. CRANE, President.
THOMAS S. HARGEST, Secretary.

Mr. BEAMAN resumed the floor.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I understand that all these gentlemen ask is the poor privilege of holding office and ruling the country they could not destroy. I want to know of the gentleman if he is going to deprive them of that privilege? They cannot wait till another session of Congress, which commences to-morrow.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I resume the floor.

Mr. MULLINS. I want to ask the gentleman something in regard to the persons from my own congressional district who come here with their hands dyed with blood.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will not yield to anybody now.

Mr. MULLINS. Well, we will vote your measure down.

Mr. BEAMAN. I hope the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have not called the previous question yet. I wish to state to the House, in view of the statement made on his responsibility by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] that if it is true that Mr. Foote, of Tennessee, rejoiced over the murder of Union prisoners he ought not to be relieved, and in view of the statement of the gentleman from Indiana I should myself vote against relieving him. But as this is a conference report no name can be stricken out. We have to agree or disagree to the report of the committee. With regard to Mr. Foote I will say that the Reconstruction Committee considered his case and heard nothing of this sort. His name was inserted in the Senate and we heard no objection to it, and therefore we allowed it to remain. I think it the wisest economy of time now to ask for a vote, and I therefore call for the previous question. That will bring the House to a vote whether we will concur in the report or not. Before I do that, however, I will yield to the gentleman from California, [Mr. HIGBY.]

Mr. HIGBY. I know nothing about the conduct of any of these men during the rebellion; I presume it was bad enough. But I suppose the foundation for the recommendation made by the committee in reference to these persons is the conduct of these men since the rebellion, that they have accepted the situation and are very sorry for what they have done.

I cannot say but the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] is right in many of his statements, but I think he is incorrect in regard to Mr. Foote. I am pretty well informed upon reliable authority, and I have been for months past, that Senator Foote had become heartsick of the course he had pursued during the rebellion and has since exhibited a sincere repentance, and that, too, without reference to what is being done here. The information has come to me in that kind of way that I am as well satisfied in reference to his repentance as I can be satisfied about anything upon information produced by any one here.

I rise to say this much, not in vindication of his conduct during the rebellion or since, any further than I have stated. I do not believe he is subject to any severer charges than any others named in this bill. I will say, however, in this connection that I shall not vote for one of them. I had some little personal acquaintance with Senator Foote in my own State previous to the rebellion. But since the rebellion I think he has pursued a course that makes him as deserving of lenity as any one named in the bill.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] for five minutes.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say to the House that I have been on the Committee on Reconstruction and also on the committee of conference. When this bill was first reported to the House it contained altogether the names of men who were Republicans. The Representatives on this floor from the southern States asked that those men be relieved on the ground that it was absolutely necessary to enable them to carry on their State governments there.

When the bill came to be presented to the House I said that while there were no Democrats in the bill still it was believed that there would be other bills reported in which the names of Democrats would be placed, and I therefore asked gentlemen on this side of the House to vote for the bill so that the machinery of the State governments there might be put in operation. They did so, and the bill passed the House and was sent to the Senate. The Senate added a number of other names to the bill. The amendment of the Senate came over here to the House and was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, who made a careful scrutiny of the names. Those names were before the committee for two weeks and no suggestion was made against Mr. Foote, who is a man now seventy-five years of age, and who will be fortunate if he lives until spring.

The name of George W. Jones seemed to be known to all the members of the committee, and no objection was made to him. All the objectionable names that could be found out by the Committee on Reconstruction were stricken out by the committee of conference, except the names of Judge Meridith and Judge Parker. As to Judge Meridith, every man who spoke of him spoke of him as a man of the utmost impartiality, a man who administered the law to all alike, white and black, rich and poor, Democrat or Radical. The conferees on the part of the Senate claimed that his name should remain in the bill. And so with regard to Judge Parker; while it was true that he had delivered a charge in 1861 to which the Senate objected, he had opposed the secession of his State. But after it had seceded, he being a judge of that State and obliged to judge of the laws of the State, said that they were in that position without his help. The Senate insisted upon those two names remaining in the bill. They are the only two names that were objected to by the Reconstruction Committee, as far as I have ever heard, that are retained in the bill. But the Senate were unanimous that they should remain there.

The names of all the others were inserted upon the request of the Representatives of the southern States on the ground that they are now Republicans, and that the removal of their disabilities is absolutely necessary for the proper conduct of the government there.

So far as parties are concerned this side of the House has very little interest in this bill. In the committee the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. NORRIS,] and myself agreed that there was now nothing against any of these judges that required their names to be struck out, though the gentleman from Alabama said he would prefer that they had been omitted, as the bill would then more readily pass the House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I now call the previous question.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I move that the report of the committee of conference be laid on the table, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, if we lay this report on the table does that end the bill?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. SCOFIELD. And then these gentlemen cannot hold office before to-morrow. [Laughter.]

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 62, nays 98, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arnell, Benton, Bromwell, Broomall, Benjamin F. Butler, Cake, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Dickey, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Ferriss, Fields, Griswold, Harding, Higby, Hopkins, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Lash, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Maynard, McKee, Mercur, Moore, Mullins, Newsham, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Price, Raum, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starkweather, Stevens, Stover, Sypher, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Whittemore, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—62.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Ames, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Bingham, Blair, Boyden, Brooks, Buckland, Buckley, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Cliff, Corley, Dawes, Deweese, Dockery, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Ferry, Fox, French, Getz, Golladay, Goss, Gove, Gravely, Grover, Haight, Haughey, Heaton, Hill, Holman, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kelley, Kellogg, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, Knott, Ladin, Loughridge, McCarthy McCormick, Miller, Morrill, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Norris, Peters, Pettis, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Plants, Poland, Prince, Robertson, Robinson, Roots, Ross, Sawyer, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trenchell, Van Aiken, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wood, and Young—98.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Benjamin, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyer, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Colfax, Covode, Delano, Dodge, Driggs, Edwards, Eldridge, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Halsey, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, Moorhead, Myers, Nunn, Perham, Polesky, Pruyn, Randall, Schenck, Stewart, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Woodward—62.

So the report of the committee of conference was not laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had insisted on its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 1803) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, had agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. WILSON, Mr. SPRAGUE, and Mr. CONNESS.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES—AGAIN.

The question recurred upon the demand of Mr. FARNSWORTH for the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will say to the House that in view of what has been said about Mr. Foote I do not expect the House to agree to this report. I shall not object to a non-concurrence with the view of sending the matter to another committee of conference.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to move to postpone the further consideration of this bill till ten o'clock to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. It would not be while the demand for the previous question is pending.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I give notice that if the previous question be not seconded I will make that motion.

Mr. ARNELL. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know whether it is in order now to move to postpone this bill indefinitely?

The SPEAKER. That motion would not be in order pending the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; there being—ayes ninety-seven, noes not counted.

Mr. SHANKS. I move that the House adjourn until to-morrow morning at eight o'clock. The motion was disagreed to.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. DICKEY. I demand the yeas and nays on concurrence in the report of the committee of conference.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WARD. Are not two thirds necessary to adopt that report?

The SPEAKER. A two-thirds vote is necessary under the Constitution.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 61, nays 82, not voting 79; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Baker, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Blair, Boyden, Brooks, Buckley, Burr, Callis, Deweese, Dockory, James T. Elliott, French, Getz, Golladay, Goss, Gove, Gravely, Grover, Haight, Haughey, Heaton, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Ketcham, Knott, Mallory, Marvin, McCormick, Morrill, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Norris, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Prince, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stewart, Taber, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Wood, and Young—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Beaman, Beatty, Bingham, Broomall, Broomall, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Calk, Cary, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dickey, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferriss, Fields, Harding, Hawkins, Higby, Hill, Hopkins, Hunter, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kitchen, Kootz, Lash, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Mullins, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pettis, Price, Raum, Roots, Sawyer, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Stokes, Stover, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whittemore, William Williams, and Stephen F. Wilson—82.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Benjamin, Benton, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyer, Roderick R. Butler, Chandler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Colfax, Corley, Delano, Dodge, Eckley, Edwards, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferry, Fox, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Holman, Hooper, Asahel H. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Julian, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lynch, Marshall, McCullough, Myers, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Nunn, O'Neill, Peters, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Pruyn, Randall, Schenck, Scofield, Spalding, Stevens, Stone, Sypher, Taffe, Thomas, Tift, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, Woodward—79.

So the report of the committee was rejected.

Mr. PAINE. I move that the Senate be asked to agree to another committee of conference.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. This not having received a two-thirds vote, I hold that this is the final disposition of the case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The proper motion is that the House insist on its disagreement and ask for another committee of conference.

Mr. HARDING demanded the yeas and nays, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2006) to establish certain post roads;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 327) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit the duty on certain meridian circles; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 475) for the appointment of Thomas O. Osborn as manager of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

PUBLICATION OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. ELA. I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing report that under the authority vested in them by Senate joint resolution No. 231, empowering them to provide for reporting and publishing the debates of Congress, they have met the Committee on Printing on the part of the Senate, and found themselves unable to agree upon a contract with the present publishers prior to the 5th of March, for several reasons; but especially because the committee on the part of the Senate express themselves unable to examine prior to the 5th of March into any proposition for a contract. It will be seen, therefore, that without further action no provision exists for reporting and publishing the debates of Congress. We therefore recommend the adoption of the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the Congressional Printer be directed to report and publish the debates of Congress, commencing at twelve o'clock March 4, 1869, until further and definite action can be had under the joint resolution recently passed.

Mr. ELA. I call the previous question on the resolution. I do not propose to take any time myself.

On seconding the previous question there were ayes eighty-five.

The main question was then ordered.

The question being put on agreeing to the resolution, there were—ayes 87, noes 81.

Mr. BROOKS. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BROOKS. Is it in order to move to lay the resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BROOKS. I make that motion, and demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ROSS, (at ten o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) moved that the House adjourn.

The question being put on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 33, noes 85.

Mr. ROSS demanded tellers.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that that body had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1808) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1870.

PUBLICATION OF DEBATES—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Printing.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. Ross and ELA.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 30, noes 84.

Mr. ROSS. Yeas and nays.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BEAMAN submitted the following privileged report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1808) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their first amendment. That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu thereof "$100,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the third amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

F. C. BEAMAN,

JOHN A. NICHOLSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

ROSCOE CONKLING,

ALEX. RAMSEY,

GARRETT DAVIS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BEAMAN. I move the previous question on agreeing to the report.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 81, noes 7; no quorum voting.

Mr. PILE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KERR. I move to lay the report on the table.

Mr. STOVER. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 4, nays 125, not voting 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Hotchkiss, and Windom—4.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Burr, Calk, Callis, Cary, Clift, Cobb, Cook, Corley, Cornell, Cullom, Dawes, Deweese, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Fox, French, Getz, Golladay, Goss, Gravely, Griswold, Grover, Haight, Harding, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, Kootz, Lash, Lash, Lincoln, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McCormick, McCullough, McKee, Mercer, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Morrissey, Mullins, Mungen, Newsham, Norris, Orth, Perham, Peters, Poland, Price, Randall, Raum, Robinson, Roots, Ross, Sawyer, Selye, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Sypher, Taber, Taylor, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, and Stephen F. Wilson—125.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Bingham, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Boyer, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Chandler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Colfax, Covode, Delano, Dickey, Dockery, Dodge, Edwards, Ela, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Gove, Halsey, Hamilton, Haughey, Hawkins, Heaton, Holman, Asahel H. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Thomas L. Jones, Kelley, Kellogg, Ketcham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Marshall, Miller, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Nunn, O'Neill, Paine, Pettis, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Plants, Polsley, Prince, Pruyn, Robertson, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Stokes, Stone, Stover, Taffe, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, Woodward, and Young—93.

So the House refused to lay the report upon the table.

Mr. BEAMAN. I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. KNOTT. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know if there was not a motion to adjourn pending when this report of the committee of conference came in?

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn had been lost.

Mr. BROOKS. No, sir; the House had divided, and the yeas and nays were called for.

The SPEAKER. The resolution of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAMAN] will be read, and then a motion to adjourn will be in order.

Mr. BROOKS. There is a motion to adjourn pending, on which the yeas and nays had been called when the privileged question came in.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair the yeas and nays had not been ordered.

Mr. BROOKS. They were not ordered, but they were called for. There was a division and it was against us, and then we demanded the yeas and nays, and pending that call a privileged question intervened.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the motion was lost. It will be in order for the gentleman from New York to renew the motion to adjourn after the resolution shall have been read.

Mr. BROOKS. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The question was put, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" and there were—ayes 100, noes 5; no quorum voting.

Mr. KELSEY. I insist that the rule shall be enforced, and that gentlemen who are in their seats shall vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. Under the rules of the House gentlemen who are in their seats are required to vote either in the affirmative or in the negative. Gentlemen remain in their seats and refuse to vote.

Mr. COBB. I make the point of order that it does not require a quorum to sustain the decision of the Chair. A majority of those voting is sufficient.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains that point of order; and the decision of the Chair is sustained. The resolution of the gentleman from Michigan will be read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the rules be suspended so that the House shall proceed to a direct vote, without dilatory motions, upon the report of the committee of conference upon House bill No. 1808, being the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. ROSS. I move to lay that resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAMAN] is a motion to suspend the rules, and it is not in order to move to lay it on the table.

Mr. BROOKS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order. Mr. MAYNARD. Is that motion in order pending the motion to suspend the rules? I submit that pending the action of the House on a motion to suspend the rules no other motion can be entertained. The motion of the gentleman from Michigan is simply a motion to suspend the rules reduced to writing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. Pending the motion to suspend the rules a motion to adjourn is in order, and the gentleman from New York has made that motion.

The question was upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. PILE. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 16, nays 120, not voting 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Fox, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Robinson, Ross, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, and Van Trump—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Boyden, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Burr, Roderick B. Butler, Cake, Callis, Cary, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Cornell, Cullom, Dawes, Dewees, Dixon, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Ela, Thomas D. Elliott, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, French, Goss, Gove, Gravely, Griswold, Halsey, Harding, Hawkins, Heaton, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Knott, Ladin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Newsham, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Peters, Pierce, Price, Poland, Raun, Robertson, Roots, Sawyer, Selye, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stewart, Stover, Sypher, Taylor, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, and Stephen F. Wilson—120.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Blackburn, Blaine, Blair, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyer, Benjamin F. Butler, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Colfax, Covode, Cullom, Delano, Dickey, Edwards, Eggleston, Eldridge, Fields, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Hamilton, Haughey, Hill, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hunter, Julian, Kelley, Kellogg, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Marshall, McCormick, McCarthy, McCullough, Morrissey, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Nunn, Perham, Pettis, Phelps, Pierce, Pile, Polsley, Prince, Pruyn, Randall, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Stevens, Stokes, Stone, Taffe, Thomas, Tift, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Windom, Wood, Woodbridge, Woodward, and Young—86.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate still further insisted upon its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to House bill No. 1746, for the removal of certain disabilities from the persons therein named, had agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill, and had appointed Messrs. WILLIAMS, EDMUNDS, and ROBERTSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The question recurred upon the following resolution, offered by Mr. BEAMAN:

Resolved, That the rules be suspended so that the House shall proceed to a direct vote, without dilatory motions, upon the report of the committee of conference upon House bill No. 1808, it being the Post Office appropriation bill.

The question was taken upon the resolution; and upon a division there were—yeas 95, noes 27.

So (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended and the resolution was adopted.

The question was upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. ROSS. Upon this question I call for tellers.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers; and there were nineteen in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one fifth of a quorum) tellers were not ordered.

Mr. KERR. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were on a division—yeas 21, noes 96.

So (one fifth not voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The report was then agreed to.

Mr. BEAMAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and I also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. BROOKS. On that motion I call for a division.

Mr. BEAMAN. Then I withdraw the motion.

Mr. ROSS. I renew the motion to reconsider the vote agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. PILE. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. ROSS. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were nineteen in the affirmative, not one fifth of the last vote.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. ROSS called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering tellers; and there were twenty-one in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one fifth of a quorum) tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were accordingly not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was then laid on the table.

PUBLICATION OF DEBATES.

Mr. ELA. I now offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the rules be suspended so that the House will proceed to a direct vote, without dilatory motions, upon the motion to lay upon the table and upon the passage of the concurrent resolution providing for reporting and printing the debates and proceedings of Congress by the Congressional Printer.

Mr. KNOTT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ROSS. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 14, nays 112, not voting 96; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Callis, Getz, Golladay, Humphrey, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Mungen, Niblack, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Van Trump, and Whittemore—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Barnes, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boyden, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckley, Roderick B. Butler, Cake, Cary, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Cook, Corley, Cornell, Cullom, Dawes, Dewees, Dickey, Dixon, Dockery, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, French, Garfield, Goss, Gove, Gravely, Grover, Halsey, Hawkins, Higby, Holman, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Ladin, Lash, Lincoln, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McCullough, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Newsham, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Peters, Pierce, Pile, Poland, Price, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Roots, Ross, Spalding, Starkweather, Stewart, Stover, Sypher, Taber, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, and William B. Washburn—112.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Archer, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barnum, Beaman, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyer, Buckland, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Colfax, Covode, Delano, Dodge, Edwards, Eldridge, Ferry, Fox, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Heaton, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hunter, Kelley, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Marshall, McCormick, Morrissey, Myers, Newcomb, Nicholson, Nunn, Perham, Pettis, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Polsley, Prince, Pruyn, Raun, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stevens, Stokes, Stone, Taffe, Thomas, Tift, John Trimble, Van Wyck, Vidal, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, Woodbridge, Woodward, and Young—96.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question being taken on agreeing to the resolution of Mr. ELA, to suspend the rules, there were—yeas 72, noes 10; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KERR and Mr. KELSEY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 93, noes 19.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the resolution of Mr. ELA to suspend the rules was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. BROOKS, to lay on the table the concurrent resolution reported by Mr. ELA from the Committee on Printing, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Under the resolution just adopted that motion is not in order.

Mr. KELSEY. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the motion to lay on the table is a dilatory motion, and under the resolution just adopted cannot be entertained.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the motion to lay on the table was pending before the adoption of the resolution to suspend the rules. The question is now upon the motion to lay on the table.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 35, nays 92, not voting 95; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Archer, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Bingham, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Cary, Dewees, Driggs, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Holman, Ingersoll, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Knott, McCullough, Miller, Mungen, Niblack, Phelps, Poland, Randall, Sawyer, Smith, Spalding, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, and Van Trump—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Arnell, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Beatty, Benton, Blair, Boyden, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick B. Butler, Cake, Callis, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Cornell, Cullom, Dickey, Dixon, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Getz, Goss, Gove, Gravely, Halsey, Higby, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Jenckes, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kellogg, Kelsey, Lash, Lincoln, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Mercer, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Newsham, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pierce, Price, Robinson, Roots, Starkweather, Stewart, Stover, Sypher, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—92.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Colfax, Covode, Dawes, Delano, Edwards, Ela, Eldridge, James T. Elliott, Thomas D. Eliot, Farnsworth, Fox, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Hawkins, Heaton, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hunter, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Marshall, Marvin, McCormick, Morrissey, Myers, Newcomb, Nicholson, Nunn, Paine, Pettis, Pike, Pile, Plants, Polsley, Prince, Pruyn, Raun, Robertson, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Stevens, Stokes, Stone, Taffe, Thomas, Tift, John Trimble, Van Wyck, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, Woodward, and Young—95.

So the concurrent resolution was not laid on the table.

The question recurred on agreeing to the concurrent resolution, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 90, nays 48, not voting 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benton, Blair, Boyden, Brownwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cake, Callis, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dixon, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Ela, Thomas D. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, and Whittemore—90.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Axtell, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Bingham, Boyer, Burr, Cary, Driggs, Ferry, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Higby, Holman, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Koontz, Logan, Loughridge, Mallory, McCormick, McCullough, Mungen, Niblack, O'Neill, Orth, Peters, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Pruyn, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Smith, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Windom, and Young—48.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Benjamin, Blackburn, Blaine, Boles, Boutwell, Bowen, Buckland, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Colfax, Dawes, Delano, Deweese, Dickey, Eckley, Edwards, Eldridge, James T. Elliott, Fox, French, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goss, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Heaton, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Jenckes, Judd, Kelley, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, Miller, Morrissey, Myers, Newcomb, Nicholson, Nunn, Pettis, Plants, Polisy, Prince, Roots, Schenck, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Stokes, Stone, Taffe, Thomas, Tift, John Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—84.

So the concurrent resolution was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had adopted reports of committees of conference on the Army appropriation bill and the miscellaneous appropriation bill.

PUBLICATION OF DEBATES—AGAIN.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to reconsider; and that motion is, I believe, debatable.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Before submitting any remarks on this proposition I desire the proposition to be reported.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to inquire whether or not this resolution is open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. Not while the motion to reconsider is pending.

Mr. INGERSOLL. This is a proposition to take the printing of the debates from the Congressional Globe.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a privileged report.

Mr. INGERSOLL. When the privileged report has been disposed of I of course resume the floor.

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have only to report to the House from the committee of conference on the Indian appropriation bill that that committee, in view of the very grave questions to be decided and the great lack of time in which to decide them, have agreed to examine the bill no further, but to report their disagreement to the House with this information, that they will recommend, as soon as the reorganization of the two Houses shall take place, a joint special committee of the two Houses may be raised to take into consideration the whole subject of Indian affairs and the necessary appropriations to take care of the Indians and to carry on the Indian Bureau, and to report at any time, so that no detriment shall result from the failure to pass at this session the Indian appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. No motion can be entertained or action had on any bill not in the possession of the House.

REPORT ON NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1881) regulating the reports of the national banking associations having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill, and agree to the same with the following amendments, namely: in line fourteen, page 1, after the word "association" insert the words "above required."

Add the following as an additional section: SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in addition to said reports each national banking association shall report to the Comptroller of the Currency the amount of each dividend declared by said association and the amount of net earnings in excess of said dividends, which report shall be made within ten days after the declaration of each dividend and attested by the oath of the president or cashier of said association; and a failure to comply with the provisions of this section shall subject such association to the penalties provided in the foregoing section; and the Senate agree to the same.

A. G. CATTELL,

G. H. WILLIAMS,

JOHN CONNESS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

S. J. RANDALL,

E. C. INGERSOLL,

JOHN LYNCH,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the previous question on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof, the question being put on agreeing to the report, there were—ayes 55, noes 26; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. RANDALL and KERR were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 97, noes 17.

So the report was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to.

Mr. KERR. I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. KERR. Tellers.

Tellers were refused.

The motion to reconsider was then laid on the table.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD submitted the following privileged report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the House No. 1803, being an act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their sixth, eighth, and sixteenth amendments.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, seventh, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth amendments of the Senate and concur in the said amendments.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the ninth amendment of the Senate and concur in the same with the following amendment: strike out "eight" and insert "six and one half;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the fifteenth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with the following two amendments:

1. Strike out the first twelve lines and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That there shall be no new commissions, no promotions, and no enlistments in any infantry regiment until the total number of infantry regiments is reduced to twenty-five; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to consolidate the infantry regiments as rapidly as the requirements of the public service and the reduction of the number of officers will permit.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That no appointments of brigadier generals shall be made until the number is reduced to less than eight, and thereafter there shall be but eight brigadier generals in the Army.

2. Strike out all after and including line fifteen down to and including line twenty-one of the said fifteenth amendment of the Senate; and that the Senate agree to the said amendments.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the seventeenth amendment of the Senate and concur in the same with the following amendment: strike out all after the word "enacted," in line one, and insert: "brevet rank shall not entitle an officer to precedence for command except by special assignment of the President, but such assignment shall not entitle any officer to additional pay or allowances;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

HENRY WILSON,

JOHN CONNESS,

W. SPRAGUE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. A. GARFIELD,

J. G. BLAINE,

G. M. DODGE,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. If I can have the attention of members of the House a moment I will state briefly the points of difference and settlement of them as agreed upon by the conference report.

Several MEMBERS. "All right!" "Question!"

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, if gentlemen wish to have the vote taken I will call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof, the question being put on agreeing to the report, there were—ayes 90, noes 26.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 122, nays 25, not voting 75; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Barnes, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Boyden, Boyer, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Cake, Callis, Cary, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Deweese, Dixon, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Getz, Goss, Gove, Gravelly, Halsey, Hawkins, Higby, Hill, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Ladin, Lincoln, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Mercur, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Newsham, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pierce, Pike, Poland, Price, Raum, Robertson, Roots, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Smith, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Stover, Sypher, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—122.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Barnum, Beck, Brooks, Burr, Eldridge, Golladay, Haight, Holman, Hopkins, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Knott, William Lawrence, McCullough, Mungen, Niblack, Pruyn, Robinson, Ross, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Trump, and Young—25.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Beatty, Bingham, Blackburn, Blaine, Boles, Boutwell, Bowen, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Colfax, Dawes, Delano, Dickey, Edwards, Ela, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Fox, Glossbrenner, Mr. Griswold, Grover, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Heaton, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Kelley, Kellogg, George V. Lawrence, Loan, McCormick, Morrissey, Myers, Newcomb, Nicholson, Nunn, Pettis, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Polisy, Prince, Randall, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Stokes, Stone, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Tift, John Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—75.

So the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. The hour of twelve o'clock has arrived, and I believe that this Congress is played out. The members of the Forty-First Congress are here ready to be sworn in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] is entitled to the floor on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution in regard to the publication of the debates was agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask my colleague to yield to me to offer a resolution.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will yield to hear what the resolution is.

Mr. LOGAN, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be directed to forward to members of the Fortieth Congress not elected to the Forty-First Congress their proportion of all public documents ordered printed by the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I offer the following as a substitute for the resolution:

Resolved, That all books and documents ordered by the Fortieth Congress to be printed for distribution, and that may be ready for delivery prior to the 1st of December next, shall be delivered to members of the Fortieth Congress for that purpose.

Mr. LOGAN. I accept that as a modification of my resolution.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 1808) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. INGERSOLL resumed the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would request the gentleman from Illinois to yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNELL,] for the purpose of offering a resolution for the payment of the salary of a deceased member of the House.

PAY OF HON. JAMES HINDS, DECEASED.

Mr. ARNELL. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be hereby authorized to pay to Mrs. James Hinds, widow of the late member from the second district of Arkansas, assassinated on the 22d day of October, 1868, a sum of money out of the contingent fund of the House equal to what his salary would have been from that date until the close of the present session if he had lived.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest to the gentleman that he strike out the word "assassinated" and insert the word "deceased."

Mr. ARNELL. Oh, no; I object to that.

Mr. KNOTT and Mr. BECK objected to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. ARNELL. I move that the rules be suspended, and the resolution adopted.

The question was taken; and (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ARNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I now yield to my colleague, [Mr. RAUM.]

Mr. RAUM. I am instructed by the Committee on Mileage to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to the Representatives and Delegates the mileage now allowed them by law for the adjourned session of the present Congress, commenced and held in the month of July, A. D. 1867, from the contingent fund of the House upon the certificates in the usual form of the Representatives and Delegates.

I ask unanimous consent to report the resolution.

Mr. ALLISON and Mr. SCOFIELD objected.

Mr. RAUM moved that the rules be suspended to enable him to report the resolution.

Mr. WARD and Mr. SCOFIELD demanded the yeas and nays.

The question recurred upon ordering the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 20, nays 108, not voting 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Burr, Corley, Dodge, Driggs, Eldridge, Goss, Jenckes, Kerr, Logan, Mallory, Mungen, Orth, Pierce, Raum, Schenck, Spalding, Van Auken, Robert T. Van Horn, Whittemore, and Young—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Arnell, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Barnes, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Boyden, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Calk, Cary, Churchill, Clift, Cobb, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Dockery, Eggleston, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Getz, Golladay, Haight, Halsey, Hawkins, Hill, Holman, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Ingersoll, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Knott, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loughridge, Lynch, Marshall, Maynard, McCarthy, McCormick, McCullough, McKee, Mercier, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Newcomb, Niblack, Norris, Paine, Perham, Phelps, Pile, Price, Robertson, Robinson, Sawyer, Scofield, Smith, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Stover, Taber, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburne, Welker, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—108.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnum, Beck, Benton, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Bowen, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick K. Butler, Callis, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Colfax, Covode, Delano, Deweese, Diekey, Donnelly, Eckley, Edwards, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Fox, Glossbrenner, Gove, Gravely, Griswold, Grover, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Alexander H. Jones, Kelley, Laffin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Marvin, Morrissey, Myers, Newsham, Nicholson, Nunn, O'Neill, Peters, Pettis, Pike, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Prince, Pruyn, Randall, Roots, Ross, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Stokes, Stone, Sypher, Taffe, Thomas, Tift, John Trimble, Van Aernam, Van Wyok, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, William Williams, Wood, and Woodward—94.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. LOGAN. A question of order. Is it in order for a member to carry a resolution around to see how many members will vote for it, and then when the yeas and nays are called to vote against the resolution himself? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that is a question of order.

PUBLICATION OF DEBATES—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House passed the resolution concerning the printing of the debates by the Congressional Printer.

The SPEAKER. Upon this question the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I insist that the gentleman from Illinois shall proceed or yield the floor unconditionally. No business can be done except on motion of some gentleman to whom he chooses to yield.

The SPEAKER. Whenever any member insists upon the regular order the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] must proceed or yield the floor.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am ready to proceed.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I insist upon the regular order of business.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] yield to allow me to move to proceed to business on the Speaker's table?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will yield for that motion with the understanding that when this subject again comes up I shall be considered as entitled to the floor.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I insist that the gentleman from Illinois shall make his speech now without further interruption.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is it not in order for me to yield for a motion to go to business on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. Business on the Speaker's table is the regular order when there is no other business before the House.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I insist upon the regular order of business.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] to yield to a motion to go to business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am willing to do so, with the understanding that I am entitled to the floor when this subject again comes up for consideration.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the House now proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order, pending a motion to reconsider.

Mr. COVODE. I rise to make a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. Is it a report from a committee of conference?

Mr. COVODE. It is a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] is privileged. The gentleman must proceed or abandon the floor.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to postpone the consideration of the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] is in possession of the floor.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If it be in order, I move to postpone the consideration of the motion to reconsider for the purpose of going to business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The motion in that form is not in order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I will proceed with my remarks. In the first place I ask the Clerk to read the concurrent resolution which I have moved to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the resolution is not now at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I will state the purport of the resolution. The proposition as submitted by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ELA] is to transfer the printing of the Congressional Globe to the Public Printing Office.

Mr. NIBLACK. I raise the point of order that the gentleman cannot proceed while the resolution is not at the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The resolution having passed the House has been engrossed and sent to the Senate, and is not now in the possession of the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a point of order. I submit that it is not proper for the officers of this House or whoever has committed this outrage upon the House—I do not mean to be personally offensive—to carry away the resolution while the motion to reconsider is pending.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is now in the possession of the Clerk, and will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That the Congressional Printer be directed to report and publish the debates of Congress, commencing at twelve o'clock, March 4, 1869, until further and definite action can be had under the joint resolution recently passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I now desire to state the reasons why the vote adopting this resolution should be reconsidered. The proposition is to transfer the printing of the Congressional Globe to the Public Printing Office. No gentleman here can deny that the Public Printer is now overwhelmed with business, and that he is behind, as is reported, from three to perhaps six months with much of the public printing. How, then, can it possibly be that the Public Printer will be prepared to-morrow to take the reports of this House and of the Senate and publish not only the Congressional Globe but also the Daily Globe? There has been no appropriation; no means for doing the work have been provided; there is no law whatever authorizing this proceeding; and more than that, there is not now at the command of the Public Printer a sufficient force to execute the work proposed to be imposed upon him.

Mr. CAKE. Will the gentleman yield to me for half a minute?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir.

Mr. CAKE. I want to correct the gentleman's statement. The Public Printer has a force of compositors ready—

Mr. INGERSOLL. I call the gentleman to order. I do not yield to him.

Mr. LYNCH. I want to put to the Chair a parliamentary question.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I yield for that.
Mr. LYNCH. If the motion to reconsider be entered without any action being taken upon it—

The SPEAKER. It will have no effect whatever.

Mr. LYNCH. Does the pendency of the motion to reconsider have no effect upon the position of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. Until it be acted upon it has no effect whatever.

Mr. LYNCH. When the motion to reconsider has been made and no action taken upon it does not the resolution die with the session?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the motion to reconsider pending before the House, some action upon it is necessary before the House can proceed to other business. The motion to postpone is in order if the gentleman from Illinois will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman from Illinois consents; and I move to postpone the further consideration of the motion till nine o'clock.

Mr. CAKE. I object to that.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have yielded to the gentleman from Ohio to make that motion.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Ohio moves to postpone until nine o'clock to-morrow. Is that a part of the term of this Congress?

Mr. SCHENCK. Nine o'clock a. m. to-day.

The SPEAKER. That is part of this legislative day.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is nine o'clock to-morrow to-day?

The SPEAKER. It is, for legislative purposes.

Mr. MAYNARD. The House some time ago adopted a resolution that nothing should be done until this question was disposed of.

The SPEAKER. It has been disposed of, and this is a motion to reconsider.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the Chair think that the force of that resolution has expended itself?

The SPEAKER. It did on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Illinois yielded to the gentleman from Ohio to move to postpone, and I insist that motion should be put to the House.

Mr. SCHENCK's motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I understood the Chair to state that the resolution had been sent to the Senate, but that the motion to reconsider having been made it would be recalled. Now, will not the effect of the motion to postpone be to leave the resolution upon the table until to-morrow at nine o'clock? If that is not the effect I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The resolution having been engrossed and sent to the Senate, and the motion to reconsider having now been made and postponed, the resolution will be recalled and laid upon the Speaker's table until nine o'clock a. m. The request for its recall has already been sent to the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I object to that, and I objected at the time.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to reconsider the vote by which this motion was postponed until to-morrow.

SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope we will be allowed to proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table. There are sixty odd bills from the Senate. Many of them are pension bills and can soon be disposed of. I make that motion if there be no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had adopted the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 1911, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes.

It further announced that the Senate had adopted the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 1677, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870.

COLORED SCHOOLS IN THE DISTRICT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the trustees of the colored schools in the District; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

N. K. TROUT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the application of N. K. Trout, of Staunton, Virginia, for removal of political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

STEAM EXPANSION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a letter from the chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering relative to the amount of money expended in experiments on steam expansion; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PUBLICATION OF DEBATES.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. MAYNARD, to reconsider the vote by which the House postponed the motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution of the Committee on Printing in relation to the publication of the debates was adopted.

Mr. SHANKS. I rise to ask a parliamentary question. Where is the resolution now pending, in the Senate or here?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that the motion to reconsider having been postponed it necessarily recalls the resolution from the Senate, and a messenger must be sent to the Senate to recall it until the motion is finally disposed of.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SCOFIELD submitted the following privileged report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the House (H. R. No. 1191) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 17, 22, 23, 24, 28, 29, and 30, and agree to the same.

They recommend that the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 1, 5, 16, 18, 21, 26, and 27.

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: after the word "compensation" insert "exceeding one eighth of one per cent. in any case."

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the fourth amendment of the Senate, so far as it proposes to strike out the second proviso in said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the nineteenth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: insert in lieu of said amendment the words "for the construction of basin and new dock barge office at New York, $25,000."

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the twentieth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out "$15,000," and insert in lieu thereof "$7,500."

They recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: insert in lieu of the words stricken out the words "for collecting, preparing, and printing the proceedings at the decoration of the soldiers' graves, under resolution of June 22, 1868, $2,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

TIMOTHY O. HOWE,

A. H. CRAGIN,

J. W. NYE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

G. W. SCOFIELD,

STEVENSON ARCHER,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Unless some member wishes to make inquiries about the bill I will ask the previous question.

Several MEMBERS. "Question!" "Question!"

Mr. CULLOM. What appropriations have been stricken out?

Mr. SCOFIELD. Very few changes are made in the bill as it passed the House. The Senate added about two hundred thousand dollars, and they have refused a few of our appropriations. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, submitted the following privileged report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1672) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 29, 33, 35, 36, 40, 41, 43, 44, 45, 65, 71, 75, 76, 77, 78, 84, and 90.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 8, 10, 12, 13, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 30, 32, 33, 37, 38, 39, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 67, 68, 73, 79, 85, 86, and 89, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the fourth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment "$1,000" and insert in lieu the following words: "ten dollars' worth for each member, $740;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the fifth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment, the following: "$2,000" and insert in lieu the following words: "ten dollars' worth for each member and Delegate, $2,280;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the sixth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line three of said amendment strike out the word "eleven" and insert in lieu the word "five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their seventh amendment, and on page 10, line fifteen of the bill, strike out the word "five;" and the House agree to the same as so modified.

That the Senate recede from their eleventh amendment, and on page 11, line twenty-five of the bill, strike out the word "legislative;" and the House agree to the same as so modified.

That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 24, 25, 26, 27, and 28; and on page 17 of the bill strike out all after the word "dollars," in line twenty, down to and including the word "clases;" in line twenty-five.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the thirty-first amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: after the word "dollars," in line thirteen on page 2 of the bill, add the following: "Provided, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall make a detailed report to Congress of the expenditure of this appropriation at the next December session, to whom paid, how much to each, and for what purpose, giving the items of each payment and the number of employes; and hereafter the said Commissioner shall estimate in detail by collection districts the expense of assessing and the expense of the collection of internal revenue."

That the Senate recede from their forty-second amendment, and that the word "and" contained in said amendment be stricken out and the word "at" inserted in lieu thereof.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the sixty-ninth amendment and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in lieu of said amendment insert "sixty-eight thousand five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the seventieth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the words "one thousand" and insert in lieu "seven hundred and twenty."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the seventy-second amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the words "seven thousand five hundred" and insert in lieu "fifteen thousand."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the seventy-fourth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the word "fifteen" and insert in lieu the word "ten."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eightieth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment "twenty-five thousand and two hundred" and insert "twenty thousand;" and at the end of line fourteen, page 42 of the bill, add the following words: "Provided, That hereafter the salaries of the clerks and messengers employed in this office shall not exceed the sum herewith appropriated."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighty-first amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out the words proposed to be inserted by said amendment and insert in lieu "ninety thousand."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighty-second amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the words "twenty-four" and insert "twenty."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighty-third amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the word "ten" and insert the word "eight."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighty-seventh amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the word "seven" and insert "five."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighty-eighth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out the words "fourteen thousand eight hundred and fifty" and insert "ten thousand."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the ninety-first amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line six of said amendment, after the word "Departments," insert the following words: "the number of clerks in their several Departments, the number employed therein during the preceding fiscal year, when employed, and when discharged, and the amount of compensation received by each."

L. M. MORRILL,

TIMOTHY O. HOWE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

BENJAMIN F. BUTLER,

W. H. KELSEY,

CHARLES E. PHELPS,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This is a unanimous report of both committees, and has been agreed to by the Senate. I demand the previous question, and when it is seconded I will answer any question that any gentleman desires.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Now will the gentleman explain the twenty-eighth amendment?

Several MEMBERS. "Vote!" "Vote!"

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am ready to answer any question which is put in good faith for the purpose of information.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I put the question in good faith; for I do not know what it is, nor does any member on the floor know.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield? Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not. The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a Senate joint resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object, and insist on the regular order.

SYMPATHY WITH SPAIN.

The House, as the regular order, resumed the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table, the first business in order being the following message from the Senate:

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 178) tendering sympathy to the people of Spain.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the House insist on its amendment and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. BANKS, Mr. BARNES, and Mr. BLAIR managers of the conference on the part of the House.

W. W. CORCORAN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution of the House No. 418, in relation to lands and other property of W. W. Corcoran, in the District of Columbia, used by the United States Government during and since the war of the rebellion.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Page 1, line seven, strike out all after "until" and insert:

Said W. W. Corcoran shall have taken and subscribed before some person duly authorized to administer oaths the following oath: "I, W. W. Corcoran, do solemnly swear that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement, either personally or by agent, to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought nor accepted nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States, hostile or inimical thereto; and I do further swear that, to the best of my knowledge and ability, I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, so help me God." And that said oath, so taken and subscribed, shall be filed with the Secretary of the Treasury in connection with all payments of money for the purposes above mentioned.

Mr. KELSEY moved that the joint resolution and the amendment thereto be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays, and call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred, and I ask the Clerk to read the first part of the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line seven, strike out all after "until" and insert "the said W. W. Corcoran shall have taken and subscribed before some person duly authorized to administer oaths the following oath."

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Now, Mr. Speaker, in the first place the Department ordered the payment of these claims, or a part of them. The House passed a joint resolution directing the Department not to pay them until the further order of Congress. The Senate has passed it with an amendment striking out "until after further order of Congress" and saying "until he takes that oath." Now, if the joint resolution is referred to the Committee of Claims now, at the close of the session, it will be exactly the same as if the House had taken no action whatever. There is no restraint upon the Department. They can pay the claim if they see fit without a condition. I therefore move that the vote by which the joint resolution was referred be reconsidered; and I demand the previous question on that motion.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The effect of the gentleman's motion will be to leave the joint resolution precisely where it is now. I hope the vote will be reconsidered and the amendment of the Senate concurred in.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I suppose that if we non-concur in the amendment of the Senate the joint resolution will not be passed. But I suppose that after the House has twice said—once by refusing to concur in the amendment and once by passing the joint resolution—that this bill shall not be paid until the further order of Congress the Department will not feel like taking the responsibility of paying it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What reason is there why this claim should not be paid if Mr. Corcoran can take that oath?

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] if Mr. Corcoran was ever a citizen of the United States?

Mr. PRUYN. Why not? He was born in Alexandria.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg pardon of the gentleman. I am informed that he is a foreign-born person.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. He may be a citizen notwithstanding that fact.

Mr. LOGAN. My information is different, and if so that oath amounts to nothing. I do not know of my own knowledge.

Mr. PRUYN. What does the oath amount to in the case of a naturalized citizen?

Mr. LOGAN. Just as much as in the case of a native-born citizen.

Mr. PRUYN. Then it is effectual in this case.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I am informed that Mr. Corcoran was born in Georgetown.

Mr. STOVER. That makes two places he was born in. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] says he was born in Georgetown, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRUYN] says he was born in Alexandria.

Mr. PRUYN. I meant to say that he was born in Georgetown as I am informed.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not state of my own knowledge that he was not born in this country, but I have been so informed.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I call the previous question on my motion to reconsider the vote by which this bill was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay that motion on the table, so as to leave this bill with the Committee of Claims.

The question was taken on laying the motion to reconsider on the table; and it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on the motion to reconsider; and it was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of Claims; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I now move that the House non-concur in the amendment of the Senate; and on that motion I call for the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate, which I believe has precedence of the motion to non-concur.

The SPEAKER. The motion to concur takes precedence of the other motion.

The question was then taken upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate; and upon a division there were—yeas 41, nays 74.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. ELDRIDGE called for the yeas and nays on the motion to concur.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were twenty-seven in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being one fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 52, nays 69, not voting 101; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Axtell, Barnum, Benman, Beck, Bingham, Blair, Boyden, Brooks, Burr, Corley, Driggs, Ela, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Garfield, Getz, Golladay, Goss, Grover, Haight, Higby, Holman, Ingersoll, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kitchen, Knott, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, Monro, Morrell, Mungen, Niblack, Poland, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Smith, Stewart, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Upson, Van Auker, Van Trump, Woodbridge, and Young—52.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Baker, Banks, Benjamin, Benton, Boutwell, Brounwell, Broomall, Buckland, Callis, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Callum, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Halsey, Hill, Hopkins, Hubard, Julian, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koontz, William Lawrence, Logan, Loughbridge, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Mullins, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Phelps, Price, Routs, Sawyer, Scofield, Selye, Stevens, Stover, Sypher, Trowbridge, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—69.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Barnes, Beatty, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Bowen, Boyer, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Calk, Cary, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Colfax, Cornell, Delano, Deweese, Dickey, Dockery, Eckley, Edwards, James T. Elliott, Fox, French, Glessbrenner, Gove, Gravelly, Griswold, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Hawkins, Heaton, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Jencks, Judd, Kelley, Kellogg, Kerr, Ladin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Marvin, McCormick, McCallough, Morrissey, Myers, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Norris, Nunn, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Plants, Polley, Prince, Schenck, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Starkweather, Stokes, Stone, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Tift, John Trimble, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Whittemore, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—101.

So the amendment of the Senate was not concurred in.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move that the House ask the appointment of a committee of conference on the bill the amendment to which has just been non-concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the House non-concur in the amendments to the bill just returned from the Senate, and ask the appointment of a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill (S. No. 784) to amend the judicial system of the United States be taken from the Speaker's table for consideration at the present time.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, and read the first and second time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I demand the previous question.

The first section of the bill provides that the Supreme Court of the United States shall hereafter consist of the Chief Justice of the United States and eight associate justices, any six of whom shall constitute a quorum; and for this purpose there is to be appointed an additional associate justice of said court. The second section provides that for each of the nine existing judicial circuits there shall be appointed a circuit judge, who shall reside in his circuit, and shall possess the same power and jurisdiction therein as the justice of the Supreme Court allotted to the circuit. The circuit courts in each circuit are to be held by the justice of the Supreme Court allotted to the circuit, or by the circuit judge of the circuit, or by the district judge of the district sitting alone, or by any two of them sitting together. And such courts may be held at the same time in the different districts of the same circuit, and more than one such court may be held at the same time in the same district. The circuit judges are each to receive an annual salary of $5,000. The third section provides that nothing in this act shall affect the powers of the justices of the Supreme Court as judges of the circuit court except in the appointment of clerks of the circuit courts, who in each circuit shall be appointed by the circuit judge of that circuit, and the clerks of the district courts are to be appointed by the judges thereof respectively. The fourth section provides that it shall be the duty of each justice of the Supreme Court to attend at least one term of the circuit court in each district of his circuit during every period of two years.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this bill is a very short one, and doubtless every member has paid attention to the reading of it. I do not desire to enter upon any discussion of the measure. It provides that there shall be one associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States in addition to the number now provided by law; making nine judges instead of eight. It provides also that there shall be appointed for each circuit a circuit judge, who shall hold, in connection with the district judge, the circuit court. It further requires that each of the supreme judges shall perform circuit duty for at least one term in every two years. Unless some further explanation is desired I demand the previous question upon the passage of the bill. It is absolutely necessary that we should do something to relieve our judicial system.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] that a bill of this important character ought not to be put through at this stage of the session and without debate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. This has been investigated by many members of the House to whose attention the subject was called. I now demand the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 93, noes 22.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. KELSEY demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COBB demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The amendment was agreed to.

CHARLOTTE CRANE.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, moved that the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 846, granting a pension to Charlotte Crane, and that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved that the House take a recess until nine o'clock a. m.

The motion was disagreed to.

WASHINGTON FAMILY RELICS.

Mr. COVODE. I rise to make a privileged report of the evidence submitted in the matter of the Washington relics taken from the Arlington House.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is that a privileged report?

Mr. COVODE. It is.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Has it the privilege of reporting at any time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it has the privilege of reporting at any time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order, that that does not appear by the records.

The SPEAKER. The question then is on the reception of the report.

Mr. COVODE. The committee were authorized to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair relies upon the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I appeal from the gentleman's statement to the record.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot refer to the record.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the Chair feel bound by the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the statement upon his honor, and the Chair takes it to be correct.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the production of the record of the House to decide the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot bring the records before the House. Does the gentleman appeal from a decision of the Chair?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I appeal to the records of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WARD. I drew the resolution with my own hand, and know that to be the fact.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then I withdraw my appeal from the decision of the Chair, but I think in such a matter that the records of the House should be produced.

Mr. COVODE. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report the testimony taken before that committee, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the articles known as the effects of George Washington, the Father of his Country, now in the custody of the Department of the Interior, are of right the property of the United States; and any attempt on the part of the present Administration or any Department thereof to deliver the same to the rebel General Robert E. Lee is an insult to the loyal people of the United States; and they ought to be kept as relics in the Patent Office, and ought not to be delivered to any one without the consent of Congress.

I demand the previous question on the adoption of that resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I wish to submit a minority report.

Mr. COVODE. The gentleman can do so without debate.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I deny the facts as the gentleman has reported them.

Mr. COVODE. No debate.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I offer as a minority report the following resolution, to come in as a substitute for that submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania:

Resolved, That the articles in the Patent Office which have been identified as the property of Mrs. Mary Custis Lee, and which were taken without authority of the Government from her home at Arlington, as they are of but little value except as heirlooms in her family bequeathed to her by her father, George Washington Parke Custis, be at her request restored to her possession.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to allow the substitute to be offered?

Mr. COVODE. I do, as the report of the minority. I call the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I desire to say this is an unheard-of outrage, and—Several members objected to debate.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question will be on the adoption of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of inconsiderable importance. I believe the relics consist of some brass buttons and cracked plates, [laughter,] and I would like to have it postponed. [Calls to order.]

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 34, nays 92, not voting 96; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Bingham, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Eldridge, Gerz, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Holman, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Laffin, Marshall, Mungen, Niblack, Phelps, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Spalding, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aiken, and Young—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bailey, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Buckler, Cake, Callis, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Daves, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eggleston, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, French, Garfield, Halsey, Higby, Hill, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jencks, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Ketchum, Kitchen, William Lawrence, Logan, Loughbridge, Mallory, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Merruc, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Pierce, Pile, Price, Raum, Robertson, Roots, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selvy, Smith, Stevens, Stover, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, Windom, and Woodward—92.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Bowen, Boyden, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cary, Chanter, Colfax, Delmo, Dewese, Diekey, Dockery, Donnelly, Eckley, Edwards, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Fields, Fox, Glossbrenner, Goss, Gove, Gravelly, Griswold, Hamilton, Harding, Haughy, Hawkins, Heaton, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Thomas L. Jones, Kelley, Kellogg, Koontz, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Lynch, Marvin, McCormick, McCullough, Morrissey, Myers, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Nunn, Perham, Peters, Pettit, Pike, Plants, Poland, Polesley, Prince, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Starkweather, Stewart, Stokes, Stone, Sypher, Taffe, Thomas, Tift, John Trimble, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—96.

So the resolution was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that that body had passed a joint resolution of the House No. 280, for the relief of Ella E. Hobart.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, had agreed to the conference asked for by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Messrs. MORRILL of Maine, EDMUNDS, and HARLAN the conferees on the part of the Senate.

WASHINGTON FAMILY RELICS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The pending question was on agreeing thereto.

Mr. ROSS. I move to refer it to the Committee on Reconstruction. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That is not in order.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I ask leave to print remarks.

Mr. COVODE. I object to debate altogether. The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman having leave to print? The Chair hears none.

[The remarks of Mr. JONES will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. ROSS. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes 25, noes 84.

Mr. ROSS. I demand the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes a. m.) moved that the House take a recess till half past nine o'clock a. m.

The question being taken; there were—ayes 69, noes 51.

Mr. PRICE and Mr. DODGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 56, nays 73, not voting 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Baker, Barnes, Barnum, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Buckley, Burr, Cake, Cary, Cook, Cornell, Daves, Dixon, Eldridge, French, Getz, Golladay, Goss, Grover, Haight, Hill, Holman, Ingersoll, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, Koontz, William Lawrence, McCullough, McKee, Niblack, Pruyn, Randall, Robertson, Ross, Scofield, Smith, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Auker, Van Trump, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and Young—56.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Archer, Axtell, Bailey, Banks, Beaman, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyden, Brouwell, Broomall, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Callis, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Covode, Dickey, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Ela, Thomas D. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—93.

So the House refused to take a recess.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Leave was granted to Mr. HIGBY to print remarks in the Globe on the constitutional amendment. [See Appendix.]

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 784) to amend the judicial system of the United States; when the Speaker signed the same.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1880) to relieve certain persons therein named from the legal and political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. MULLINS. I hope that bill will be laid aside, and that we shall take up something of more importance and not stop wholesome legislation to pardon rebels as black as sin.

Mr. MILLER. Is not this the bill we disposed of some time ago?

Mr. PAINE. I will state for the information of the House that this is not the bill which was before the House earlier in the evening, but is a bill which passed the House a week or two ago, and which seems to have just arrived here from the Senate with amendments. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. KELSEY. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department.

Mr. KELSEY's motion was disagreed to. The bill and amendments were then referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

MINING STATISTICS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 195) requiring the Commissioner of the General Land Office to transfer certain moneys; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution directs the Commissioner of the General Land Office to transfer to the Treasury Department $2,500 appropriated for collecting statistics of mines and mining under the act of Congress approved July 20, 1868, and requires the Secretary of the Treasury to disburse the same as provided for in said act.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask that that joint resolution be put upon its passage. It is obviously proper and no one can object to it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. JULIAN. I cannot yield for that purpose. The appropriation is proper and is already provided for by law. I demand the previous question.

The question was put upon seconding the previous question; and there were—ayes 79, noes 16; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ELDRIDGE and Mr. JULIAN were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 31.

So the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. KELSEY (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes a. m.) moved that the House take a recess until ten o'clock a. m.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 51, noes 71.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. ELDRIDGE called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered. The motion for a recess was accordingly not agreed to.

WRIGHT DURYEA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 860, for the relief of Wright Duryea; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The preamble of the bill was not read. The bill, which was read, authorizes and empowers the Commissioner of Patents to receive the application for the renewal of the said patent (issued to Wright Duryea April 10, 1855) the same as though the time had not passed which is specified by law.

Mr. JENCKES. This patent has not yet expired. The patentee would have made his application in time if it had not been for a severe illness, which resulted in his partial insanity. I call the previous question on the bill.

Mr. SCOFIELD. What is this patent for?

Mr. JENCKES. It makes no difference what it is for. This bill does not renew the patent, only gives leave for the application to be made for a renewal.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill; and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 52, noes 25; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. JENCKES and Mr. HOPKINS were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 76, noes 38.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were seventeen in the affirmative; not one fifth of the last vote.

Mr. SCOFIELD called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were eleven in the affirmative; not one fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were refused; and the yeas and nays were refused.

The bill was accordingly passed.

Mr. O'NEILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. O'NEILL. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I renew the motion to reconsider.

Mr. JENCKES. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not yield the floor. I desire only to ask one or two questions about this patent. We have been voting for an extension of a patent, and no one knows what the patent is for. Inquiry was made of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] who has this bill in charge, and he declined to state to the House what the invention was, whether useful or otherwise, for which the patent was to be extended. I think the House under those circumstances should reconsider the vote by which this bill was passed. I will yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island to make an explanation if he desires to do so.

Mr. JENCKES. I do not decline to make an explanation. This patent is for a little simple contrivance for exhibiting show cards, of value to the inventor and to those who would use such a device. The question is whether this man shall be allowed to apply to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of his patent, he having been sick at the time the law obliged him to make his application. In consequence of his sickness he was subject to fits of insanity, which prevented him from doing any business whatever. This bill does not extend the patent, but simply allows an application for an extension, to be determined by the Commissioner the same as if it had been made in time.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

C. H. RODD AND A. J. CAMPEAN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 896) confirming certain purchases of lands in the Ionia district, Michigan, made by Charles H. Rodd and Andrew J. Campean; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the locations and purchases of land made by Charles H. Rodd and Andrew J. Campean, under the provisions of the treaty of August 2, 1865, in the Ionia district, Michigan, be confirmed, so far as such purchases or locations were made prior to the instructions of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the register and receiver not to allow any further Indian locations or purchases in the Indian reservation; provided that such purchases were made regularly, according to the regulations and instructions of the General Land Office in force at the time; and provided that this act shall not prejudice any adverse claims to such lands.

Mr. DRIGGS. I desire that this bill be put on its passage, and I will make a brief statement. The bill has reference to the purchase of a small piece of land in an Indian reservation in my district by two Indians named respectively Rodd and Campean. Under the arrangement of the treaty they were allowed to purchase the land and to sell without a description. Owing to some conflict between the decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the then Secretary of the Interior the patents have been withheld. This bill, which is designed to remedy the difficulty, has been considered by the Committee on the Public Lands, who are unanimously in favor of its passage.

Mr. SCOFIELD. How much land in all is involved in the case?

Mr. DRIGGS. About one hundred and sixty acres. The bill is all right. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

On the passage of the bill, there were—ayes 91, noes 14; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SCOFIELD and Mr. DRIGGS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes one hundred and seventeen, noes not counted.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. DRIGGS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER (at ten minutes before five o'clock a. m.) moved that the House take a recess till half past nine o'clock a. m.

On the motion, there were—ayes 51, noes 65. So the House refused to take a recess.

TAKING DEPOSITIONS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 729) to provide for the execution in the District of Columbia of commissions issued by the courts of the States and Territories of the United States or of foreign nations, and for taking depositions to be used in such courts; which was read a first and second time.

The first section provides that any party to a suit depending in any court of any State or Territory of the United States or of any foreign nation may obtain the testimony of any witness residing in or temporarily within the District of Columbia to be used in such suit. When a commission to take such testimony shall have issued from the court in which such suit is pending or a notice shall have been given according to the rules of practice prevailing in such court, on producing the same to a justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and on due proof being made to such officer that the testimony of any witness residing in the District or temporarily within it is material to the party desiring the same, such officer is to issue a summons to such witness requiring him to appear before the commissioners named in such commission or notice to testify in such suit. Such summons is to specify the time and place at which the witness is required to attend, which shall be within the District of Columbia.

The second section provides that if a suit be pending in any court of any State or Territory of the United States or of any foreign nation and it shall satisfactorily appear by affidavit to any officer named in the next preceding section or to the judge of the orphans' court or any commissioner for the taking of depositions appointed by the supreme court of the District, that any person residing or temporarily dwelling in the District of Columbia is a material witness for either party to such suit; that no commission or notice to take the testimony of such witness has been issued or given; and that according to the course and practice of the court in which such suit is pending the deposition of a witness taken without the presence and consent of both parties will be received on the trial or hearing of such suit, such officer is to issue his summons requiring such witness to appear before him at a place within the District at some reasonable time to testify in such suit.

The third section provides that the officer before whom such witness shall appear shall take down his testimony in writing, and shall certify and transmit the same to the court before which such suit is pending in such manner as the practice of the court may require. If any person shall refuse or neglect to appear at the time and place mentioned in the summons issued in accordance with this act, or if on his appearance he shall refuse to testify, he is to be liable to the same penalties as would be incurred for a like offense on the trial of a suit.

The fourth section provides that every witness appearing and testifying under this act shall be entitled to receive from the party at whose instance he has been summoned the fees now provided by law for each day he shall give attendance.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask that the bill be put on its passage. There is now no way of enforcing testimony of witnesses by commission.

Mr. BINGHAM. From a general reading of this bill I take it that it is intended to apply only to civil cases.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is all.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask the gentleman to consider whether it may not be made to apply to criminal proceedings?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Criminal proceedings are already provided for. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BINGHAM. I understand this is to go beyond this District.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In criminal proceedings depositions may be taken.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is not limited to cases in the District of Columbia, and there is the trouble.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAIRO AND FULTON RAILROAD.

Mr. ROOTS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the joint resolution (S. R. No. 238) extending the time for the completion of the first twenty miles of the Cairo and Fulton railroad.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object. The gentleman objected to a resolution I offered in the House some time ago.

Mr. ROOTS. I offered a resolution next day and the gentleman's friends objected. I move to suspend the rules to take up and pass that joint resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. When the militia of the gentleman's State were killing men down there he objected to all investigation.

Mr. ROOTS. Next day I asked for an investigation in regard to the Kuklux murders and the gentleman's friends objected. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of passing the joint resolution. It extends the time only nine months for the completion of the first twenty miles of the Cairo and Fulton railroad.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes 17; no quorum voting.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that there be a call of the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 50.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ELDRIDGE and Mr. ROOTS were appointed.

Mr. PILE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

RECESS.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that we take a recess until ten o'clock.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I will withdraw my motion for a call of the House on that condition.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We might as well take a recess. The Senate have taken a recess. The committee of conference on the miscellaneous appropriation bill is still out, and it will be half or three quarters of an hour before it will be able to make its report. So far as the public business is concerned, then, we may as well take a recess until ten o'clock.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I withdraw my motion for a call of the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Of course the pending bill is to be disposed of.

Mr. ROOTS's motion to suspend the rules was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROOTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, (at a quarter past five o'clock, a. m.) the House took a recess until ten o'clock a. m.

The House reassembled at ten o'clock a. m., [Thursday, March 4.]

CLERKS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. BROOMALL, from the Committee on Accounts, submitted a report in pursuance of the instructions of a resolution of the House relative to the pay of clerks to committees; which was laid on the table.

WILLIAM H. HARMON.

Mr. MAYNARD, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported adversely on the bill (S. No. 183) for the relief of William H. Harmon; and the same was laid on the table.

FINANCE AND CURRENCY.

Mr. COBURN submitted the following privileged report; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 440) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, having met, after full and free conference have disagreed, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

FUR-SEAL.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the joint resolution of the Senate (S. No. 239) more effectually to protect the fur-seal in Alaska.

Mr. KERR. I reserve objection.

The joint resolution was taken up and read a first and second time. It declares the islands of St. Paul and St. George, in Alaska, a special reservation for Government purposes, and until otherwise provided by law makes it unlawful for any person to land or remain on either of them except by the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury. It further provides that any person found thereon contrary to the provisions of this resolution shall be summarily removed, and makes it the duty of the Secretary of War to carry this resolution immediately into effect.

Mr. KERR. I object.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. Allow me to say this is only a temporary provision merely for the purpose of saving the fur-seals from destruction till Congress can legislate. It has been submitted to the judgment of all the parties interested in these fisheries, and they all say it should be passed until there is some legislation.

Mr. KERR. I think we had better pass this by till the House is full, so that we can hear a more general expression of opinion in regard to its propriety.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. I then move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. There is evidently no quorum present.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. I can assure him there is nothing in this resolution that is not entirely right. It merely provides that these two islands, where there is nothing but seals, shall be reserved until Congress can legislate on the subject. The object is to keep people off who have no right there. It will save hundreds of thousands of dollars, besides preserving these animals from destruction.

Mr. KERR. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. MALLORY. Is there not another resolution on the table in regard to this same matter?

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. There is a long bill from the Senate regulating the killing of the fur-seal. If that should be reached in its order I am instructed by the committee to report a substitute, which is also long, and which it would be impossible to pass at this session. Persons are now going out to these islands, and unless Congress does something it will soon be impossible to save these animals from destruction.

Mr. McCORMICK. Does not this resolution give the Secretary of the Treasury power to appoint a few friends to go there?

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. It does not. The Secretary of the Treasury has no power by the law as it now stands to permit the killing of any fur-bearing seal.

Mr. McCORMICK. But this resolution gives him the authority.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. No, sir; it does not. It merely gives him authority to prevent persons from going there until Congress shall act. By the law which was passed last year the Secretary of the Treasury is prohibited from permitting persons to go there for the purpose of killing the fur-seal.

Mr. HARDING. But this joint resolution says they may go there by permission of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. But not for the purpose of killing seal.

Mr. HARDING. It does not say for what purpose they may go there.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. At three o'clock this afternoon we begin a new session of Congress, which I apprehend may be a long one. I know there are some members now absent who are opposed to this joint resolution.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. It is to protect the fur-bearing seal of Alaska.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. We have no quorum present now. There is no need of getting out of breath in regard to this joint resolution, because if it is all right, as the gentleman says, we shall have time enough to pass it at the next session. If I understand the reading of the joint resolution it provides that the Government of the United States shall take possession of these two islands simply as Government reservations. For what?

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. There is nothing valuable there but seals, and this is to prevent persons from going there and killing them until Congress shall take action upon the subject.

The question was taken upon the passage of the joint resolution; and upon a division, there were—ayes 60, noes 19; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts, and Mr. SPALDING, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 95, noes 18.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. SPALDING. I do not often ask this House, and I never shall again ask it, to hear me by way of personal explanation. I wish to say to the House that in some remarks which I made in Committee of the Whole the other day, when the miscellaneous appropriation bill was pending, I said in regard to some items of appropriation for the Freedmen's Bureau that they had found their way into the bill without the concurrence of the majority of the Committee on Appropriations, and that I was instructed by the committee to move to strike them out. That statement was all correct. I further said that those items were placed in the bill by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for his own purpose, what I did not know; that he was then sick and I could not get information upon the subject from him.

Now, I understand that the impression is sought to be made that I impugned the motives and conduct of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Sir, nothing was further from my intentions. I have been associated with that gentleman here for six years, and our friendship has been of a very warm and ardent character. Although we sometimes differed I have always had the utmost confidence in him, and I would be the last man on this floor to impugn his motives. And to show that he was entirely justified in putting those items in the bill I have since become convinced that I was mistaken, that the appropriations were proper and necessary, that the public interest required that they should be made, and they were last night put in the appropriation. I say this to exonerate the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations from any imputation that my remarks the other day might seem to convey.

ENROLLED BILLS, ETC., SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 729) to provide for the execution in the District of Columbia of commissions issued by the courts of the States and Territories of the United States or of foreign nations, and for taking depositions to be used in such suits;

An act (S. No. 860) for the relief of Wright Duryea;

An act (S. No. 896) confirming certain purchases of lands in the Ionia district, Michigan, made by Charles H. Rodd and Andrew J. Campan;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 195) requiring the Commissioner of the General Land Office to transfer certain money; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 238) extending the time for the completion of the first twenty miles of the Cairo and Fulton railroad.

ADMISSION TO THE CAPITOL.

Mr. COBURN. I submit the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be authorized to open the doors of the House wing of the Capitol for the admission of the people to the galleries.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the resolution should be modified by striking out "Doorkeeper" and inserting "Sergeant-at-Arms and the police."

Mr. COBURN. With the consent of the House I will modify the resolution in the manner suggested by the Chair.

Mr. PAINE. I wish to ask my friend from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] a question. Will it not happen that after twelve o'clock our order will be powerless here, because this Congress will have expired?

Mr. COBURN. Well, let the people be admitted till twelve o'clock at any rate.

Mr. PAINE. Is there not danger that they may be removed by the Senate after that time?

Mr. COBURN. I desire that the people shall be allowed to come in out of the rain. The Senate has bad manners enough to keep them out. This is the people's House, and they are entitled to come in here.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to:

Mr. COBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS WILLAMETTE RIVER.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage a small bill of much importance to the people of Oregon. I think the measure, after it has been read, will not be objected to. The title of the bill to which I refer is an act (S. No. 896) giving the consent of the United States to the erection of a bridge across the Willamette river, in Oregon, from the city of Portland to the east bank of said river.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which there will be an opportunity for objection to its consideration.

The bill was read. The first section provides for giving the consent of the United States to the corporation of the city of Portland, in the State of Oregon, to erect or cause to be erected a bridge, with diverging roadways and footways and double draws, over and across the Willamette river, between the city of Portland and the east bank of said river, at any time within six years after the passage of this act. The bridge is to be so constructed and built as not to obstruct, impair, or injuriously modify the navigation of the river; and in order to secure a compliance with these conditions the corporation, association, or company proposing to erect the same, previous to commencing the construction of the bridge, is to submit to the Secretary of War a plan of the bridge, with a detailed map of the river at the proposed site of the bridge and for the distance of a mile above and below the site, exhibiting the depths and currents at all points of the same, together with all other information touching the bridge and river as may be deemed requisite by the Secretary of War to determine whether the bridge when built will conform to the prescribed condition of the bill, not to obstruct, impair, or injuriously modify the navigation of the river. The Secretary of War is authorized to detail an officer to superintend the survey and examination of the river with a view to the location.

The second section authorizes and directs the Secretary of War, upon receiving such plan and map and other information, and upon being satisfied that a bridge built on such plan and at that locality will conform to the prescribed conditions of this bill, not to obstruct, impair, or injuriously modify the navigation of the river, to notify the corporation, association, or company proposing to erect the same that he approves the same; and upon receiving such notification the corporation, association, or company may proceed to the erection of the bridge, conforming strictly to the approved plan and location. But until the Secretary of War approve the plan and location of the bridge and notify the corporation, association, or company of the same, the bridge shall not be built or commenced.

The third section authorizes and empowers the corporation of the city of Portland, so far as Congress has the power to grant the same, to make such rules and regulations for the care of the bridge, and for the regulation and collection of tolls for crossing on the same, as they shall deem just and reasonable.

THE SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill at this time?

MR. BAKER. I object.

NEW YORK AND LONDON TELEGRAPH.

MR. KELSEY. I ask that the House, by unanimous consent, take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 731, to authorize the New York, Newfoundland, and London Telegraph Company to land its submarine cable upon the shores of the United States. It is a bill to which I think no one can object.

The bill, which was read, proposes to authorize the New York, Newfoundland, and London Telegraph Company to land one or more submarine cables upon the shores of the United States at such place or places as may from time to time appear to the directors of the said company to be most convenient, and to maintain and work such cable or cables for the transmission of messages and intelligence between the United States and Europe, or at any of the intermediate places during the existence of the charter of the company.

THE SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill at the present time?

MR. KERR. I object. It is an exceedingly important bill, and ought to be brought up at some time when it can be more deliberately considered than now.

MR. KELSEY. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of considering the bill at this time.

MR. ELIOT, of Massachusetts, rose.

MR. BROOKS. I object to any debate unless it is open for all members of the House. This is an entire monopoly.

MR. ELDRIDGE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered: and MR. KERR and MR. KELSEY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 61.

So (two thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the House refused to suspend the rules.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by MR. GORHAM, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body insisted on its amendment to House joint resolution No. 143, in relation to the lands and other property of W. W. Corcoran in the District of Columbia used by the United States Government during and since the war of the rebellion, disagreed to by the House, and agreed to the committee of conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed MR. HARRIS, MR. PATTERSON of New Hampshire, and MR. VICKERS as the managers of said conference on its part.

PUBLIC AFFAIRS IN MARYLAND.

MR. THOMAS, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave for the Committee on the Judiciary to file a majority and minority report, to be printed with the testimony taken concerning public affairs in Maryland.

PUBLIC AFFAIRS IN DELAWARE.

MR. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, asked and obtained the same leave concerning public affairs in Delaware.

WILLAMETTE RIVER BRIDGE.

MR. MALLORY moved to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 895, giving the consent of the United States to the erection of a bridge across the Willamette river, in Oregon, from the city of Portland to the east bank of said river.

There was no objection; and the bill was taken up and read a first and second time. The bill was then ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MR. MALLORY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORT SNELLING MILITARY RESERVATION.

MR. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time a joint resolution (S. R. No. 211) for setting apart a portion of the Fort Snelling military reservation for a permanent military post and the settlement of all claims in relation thereto.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that if that resolution fails now from lack of time it will be pressed on every succeeding Congress in some plausible form until it is passed, and that under it a great fraud will be perpetrated upon the Government. I feel, therefore, that I cannot better employ the few remaining moments of my official career on this floor than in explaining the true character of the resolution, and so amending it that the opinion of the House will be clearly expressed on the questions involved in it and will prevent it from ever coming back here.

In 1857, under the administration of James Buchanan, the Secretary of War, the notorious John B. Floyd, consummated a pretended sale of the Fort Snelling military reservation in the State of Minnesota. He did so under the provisions of section four of an act of Congress of March 3, 1857, in reference to the sale of military posts. The law gave the Secretary authority to sell any military posts "which are or may become useless for military purposes." Under this law he sold, or pretended to sell, this military reservation, then used as a United States fort, and which is now used as such. General Sherman, in his official report of the March 10, 1868, says:

"Fort Snelling is valuable to us: the Government promptly took it back when the war revealed its use as a depot for the collection of volunteer troops, and on all future occasions when troops are needed anywhere north or west of this Fort Snelling will be found the natural point."

"Fort Snelling will always be a military point from which troops and supplies can be handled for use on the northern frontier, and should never be sold."

Hence it appears by the testimony of one of the highest officers in our Army that this fort is not "useless for military purposes," and never was. General Terry, commanding in that district, says:

"From personal inspection and a study of the relations of the site with regard to the region of country round about to the sources of the Mississippi and to our northern national boundary, I am clearly of opinion that Fort Snelling, with its present reduced boundary, should be held by the United States forever."

The whole sale, therefore, was fraudulent and void ab initio. It could not be made under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1857.

How was it made? It was a private sale, made under circumstances of the greatest secrecy, under the pretense that open competition by numerous bidders would cheapen the price! The evidence shows that the sale was conducted with such secrecy that the very officers in command of the fort did not know that any such sale had been made until it was approved by Floyd. And this was in the face of the fact that Floyd claimed that he directed the commissioners as follows:

"Have it carefully surveyed first, divided into lots of forty acres each. The object is to obtain the largest amount for the Government, and give all who desire it an opportunity to purchase."

As soon as the character of the sale was known, to wit, on the 29th of January, 1858, a resolution was passed by the House of Representatives creating a special committee to investigate the sale; and the committee passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the chairman of this committee call upon the President of the United States and Secretary of War and request that no title shall be executed to the party making purchase of the military reservation at Fort Snelling until this committee shall have closed its investigation and the House shall have acted thereon."

Immediately after the sale, however, the Secretary of War issued the following order:

[Special Order No. 109—Extract.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, July 31, 1857.

1. The first installment of the purchase money of Fort Snelling having been paid into the Treasury the military reservation and property pertaining thereto, excepting the fort and other buildings which are required for the use of the troops at the post, will be put in the immediate possession of Mr. Franklin Steele. The military post will be maintained until further orders.

By order of the Secretary of War:

S. COOPER,

Adjutant General.

This order shows, first, that the fort could not be dispensed with and had not "become useless;" and, secondly, that Mr. Steele, the purchaser, did not receive possession of the fort and buildings, but of the part of the reservation not necessary for military purposes.

What did Mr. Steele pay for the reservation? There are about seven thousand acres embraced in it. He agreed to pay $90,000, in three installments, or about twelve dollars per acre. He really paid but $30,000, and that is all he has ever paid or ever intends to pay. But he claims that after having paid at the rate of $4 20 per acre for the seven thousand acres of land he will pay the balance by renting the property to the United States. I doubt if anything quite equal to this has ever before been heard of in the history of our legislation. Here is his "little bill:—"

The United States to Franklin Steele, Dr.

To use and occupation of Fort Snelling reservation for military purposes from April 24, 1861, to January 24, 1868, eighty-one months, at $2,000 per month.....$162,000

Cr.

By balance of purchase money for reservation unpaid.....60,000

Balance unpaid.....102,000

JANUARY 24, 1864.

It should be embalmed as the coolest proposition of the century.

Here Mr. Steele gets into pretended possession of United States property under a pretended sale for which there was no authority in law, and instead of paying the amount of $60,000 due by him he claims rent of the United States for occupying its own military post, and wants a little balance of $102,000 besides.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to treat Mr. Steele fairly and equitably. I am willing he should be repaid his $30,000 and interest thereon, deducting all rents, issues, and profits received by him from the reservation. This is substantially the view taken by General Sherman. I am willing that all that portion of the reservation not needed for military purposes should be sold and the balance found due Mr. Steele be paid him out of the proceeds of such sale. If I have an opportunity I shall move to amend the joint resolution by striking out all after the resolving clause and inserting as follows:

That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to designate and set apart so much of the Fort Snelling military reservation, in the State of Minnesota, as shall be retained by the Government for military purposes; and that after giving public notice thereof he shall proceed to sell at public auction all the residue of such military reservation, at a price not less than fifteen dollars per acre and in quantities not greater than one hundred and sixty acres to any one person, upon the following terms: one fourth of the purchase money to be paid at the time of purchase and the remainder in ten annual installments, with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum. And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to repay out of the proceeds of said sale, the sum of $30,000 paid by Franklin Steele on the 25th of July, 1857, under a pretended sale made to him by John B. Floyd, then Secretary of War, with interest thereon, deducting therefrom all rents, issues, and profits received by the said Steele from the reservation since the date of said pretended sale.

This would transfer the greater portion of the reservation to actual settlers on such terms as would induce competition and a high price. I believe that under such a sale the surplus lands would average over twenty dollars per acre. The Government is now in possession of the whole reservation, as stated by General Sherman. I ask that the rules be suspended so as to allow a consideration of the joint resolution at this time.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 50, nays 95, not voting 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bailey, Bowen, Broomall, Roderick R. Butler, Reader, W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, James T. MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPALDING submitted the following privileged report, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 7, 8, 9, 15, 26, 32, 34, 37, 47, and 48.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 16, 17, 19, 20, 21, 22, 24, 25, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 33, 35, 36, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, and 46; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighteenth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line nine of said amendment, after the word "paid" insert "and no liability incurred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-third amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the word "fifty" and insert in lieu the word "twenty-five."

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the thirty-eighth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: at the end of said amendment add the following words, "provided that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury shall review the said claim upon its merits and allow only so much, not exceeding said sum, as shall be just;" and the Senate agree to the same.

L. M. MORRILL,

GEORGE F. DUNDUNDS,

JAMES HARLAN,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

R. P. SPALDING,

H. H. STARKWEATHER,

S. S. MARSHALL,

Managers on the part of the House.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ATTENDING INAUGURATION CEREMONIES.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That when the hour of twelve m. arrives and this House is adjourned and dissolved the members will proceed in a body, headed by the Speaker and other officers of this House, to the Senate Chamber, to attend the ceremonies of the inauguration of the President and Vice President-elect.

PENSION PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the cases of Elizabeth Hockaday, Nancy Hix, Sarah Bary, Colonel Patton, Captain Grisham, Captain Taylor, W. J. Byrd, Melinda Herman, and McHenry Bray, for pensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had adopted a resolution directing that a committee consisting of two members be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that unless he have some further communication to make the two Houses of Congress, having finished the business before them, are ready to adjourn; and that Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. WHYTE had been appointed said committee on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The House has heard the message from the Senate. If no objection be made the Chair will appoint a similar committee on the part of the House.

No objection was made.

The SPEAKER accordingly appointed Mr. GRISWOLD, Mr. POLAND, and Mr. KERR the committee on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL, ETC., SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2007) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 239) more efficiently to protect the fur-seal of Alaska.

ABBOT Q. ROSS.

Mr. FERRY. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time Senate bill No. 845, for the relief of Abbot Q. Ross.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read; after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The bill was read. It authorizes and requires the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Abbot Q. Ross, of Cleves, Ohio, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, as full compensation for the past and future use in the United States Navy of his invention for using hot water and steam as a weapon in naval warfare, for extinguishing fires, and for other purposes.

THE SPEAKER. Is there objection to taking this bill from the Speaker's table out of its regular order for consideration at this time?

Mr. WOOD. I object.

Mr. FERRY. I move that the rules be suspended for that purpose.

The question was taken on suspending the rules; and upon a division there were—ayes 52, noes 63.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. INGERSOLL called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 122, noes 55, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Bingham, Blair, Boyer, Broomall, Buckley, Burr, Roderick R. Butler, Calkins, Cary, Chandler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Clift, Corley, Covode, Deweese, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Fox, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Gravely, Griswold, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, Koontz, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Marshall, McCarthy, McCullough, McKee, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Myers, Newsbarn, Niblack, Nicholson, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Poland, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Roots, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Selye, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Starkweather, Stevens, Stone, Stover, Taber, Taffe, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Twichell, Upson, Van Aiken, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, Whittemore, John T. Wilson, Wood, Woodward, and Young—122.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos B. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Boyden, Bromwell, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Cullis, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Delano, Dixon, Dockery, Ela, French, Gove, Harding, Hawkins, Richard D. Hubbard, Kelsey, Lash, William Lawrence, Maynard, McCormick, Moore, Paine, Phelps, Plants, Scofield, Shellabarger, Smith, Stokes, Sypher, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Aernum, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, and William Williams—55.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Beaman, Blackburn, Blaine, Boles, Boutwell, Bowen, Brooks, Coburn, Colfax, Dawes, Dickey, Dodge, Driggs, Edwards, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Goss, Hamilton, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Thomas L. Jones, Kellogg, Ketcham, Lynch, Mungen, Newcomb, Nunn, Polsley, Price, Prince, Spalding, Stewart, Taylor, Van Wyck, Vidal, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—45.

So (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended.

The bill (S. No. 845) for the relief of Abbot Q. Ross was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

The bill was then read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. FERRY. Upon that question I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

The question was, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. BENJAMIN. I call for the yeas and nays on that question.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 18, noes 105; not one fifth in the affirmative.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COBB and Mr. FERRY were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were twenty-seven in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being one fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

BUSTEED IMPEACHMENT CASE.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, by unanimous consent, moved that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further investigation into the official conduct of Hon. Richard Busteed, judge of the United States district court of Alabama, and that the testimony already taken be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

COSTELLO AND WARREN.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, moved that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the message from the President of the United States relative to Messrs. Costello and Warren, naturalized citizens of the United States imprisoned in Great Britain, and that the report of the committee be laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

THANKS TO THE SPEAKER.

Mr. ALLISON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore,

Mr. NIBLACK submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be, and are hereby, tendered to Hon. THEODORE M. POMEROY, Speaker of the House, for the very able, dignified, and impartial manner in which he has discharged the duties of Speaker for the brief but very trying period during which he has occupied the chair.

The resolution was adopted unanimously.

Mr. NIBLACK moved that an engrossed copy of the resolution just passed be furnished to the Speaker.

The motion was agreed to.

ABBOT Q. ROSS—AGAIN.

The question then recurred on ordering the main question on the passage of Senate bill

No. 845, for the relief of Abbot Q. Ross, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 48, not voting, 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Axtell, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Bingham, Blair, Boyer, Burr, Roderick R. Butler, Calkins, Cary, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Coburn, Corley, Deweese, Dickey, Donnelly, Eggleston, Ferriss, Ferry, Fox, French, Garfield, Getz, Goss, Gove, Gravely, Griswold, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Heaton, Higby, Holman, Humphrey, Hunter, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kelley, Kerr, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, Mercur, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mullins, Myers, Newsbarn, Nicholson, Norris, Nunn, O'Neill, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Pierce, Pie, Poland, Price, Prince, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Roots, Ross, Sawyer, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Taffe, Thomas, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Upson, Van Aiken, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, Whittemore, and Wood—96.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Boutwell, Boyden, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Delano, Dixon, Ela, Eldridge, Golladay, Harding, Hulburt, Kelsey, Ketcham, Lash, William Lawrence, Lynch, McCormick, Miller, Moore, Niblack, Phelps, Plants, Scofield, Smith, Stokes, Taylor, John Trimble, Van Aernum, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, William Williams, and Woodward—48.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Beatty, Blackburn, Blaine, Boles, Bowen, Brooks, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Churchill, Clift, Colfax, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Dockery, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Edwards, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Fields, Glossbrenner, Hamilton, Haughey, Hawkins, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kellogg, Kitchen, Knott, Laffin, Loughbridge, Mallory, Maynard, McCullough, McKee, Morrill, Mungen, Newcomb, Orth, Paine, Pike, Polsley, Schenck, Selye, Shanks, Spalding, Stone, Stover, Sypher, Taber, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Wyck, Vidal, Welker, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Young—78.

So the main question was ordered to be now put.

The question then recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk commenced to call the roll, but was soon interrupted by the hour of adjournment; when at twelve o'clock m. the Speaker resumed the chair, and said:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I shall not attempt to add anything to the expressive remarks addressed to you by my predecessor on leaving the chair a few hours since. The Fortieth Congress has now expired by limitation of law. Our public acts will be preserved on parchment. Our personal relations, our sympathies, our kindnesses, all the ties that bind us to each other will forever live as part of ourselves. I now pronounce the Fortieth Congress of the United States of America adjourned without day. [Applause.]

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

MESSAGE

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

Upon the reassembling of Congress, it again becomes my duty to call your attention to the state of the Union, and to its continued disorganized condition under the various laws which have been passed upon the subject of reconstruction.

It may be safely assumed, as an axiom in the government of States, that the greatest wrongs inflicted upon a people are caused by unjust and arbitrary legislation, or by the unrelenting decrees of despotic rulers, and that the timely revocation of injurious and oppressive measures is the greatest good that can be conferred upon a nation. The legislator or ruler who has the wisdom and magnanimity to retrace his steps, when convinced of error, will sooner or later be rewarded with the respect and gratitude of an intelligent and patriotic people.

Our own history, although embracing a period less than a century, affords abundant proof that most, if not all, of our domestic troubles are directly traceable to violations of the organic law and excessive legislation. The most striking illustrations of this fact are furnished by the enactments of the past three years upon the question of reconstruction. After a fair trial they have substantially failed and proved pernicious in their results, and there seems to be no good reason why they should longer remain upon the statute-book. States to which the Constitution guarantees a republican form of government have been reduced to military dependencies, in each of which the people have been made subject to the arbitrary will of the commanding general. Although the Constitution requires that each State shall be represented in Congress, Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas are yet excluded from the two Houses, and contrary to the express provisions of that instrument were denied participation in the recent election for a President and Vice President of the United States. The attempt to place the white population under the domination of persons of color in the South has impaired, if not destroyed, the kindly relations that had previously existed between them; and mutual distrust has engendered a feeling of animosity which, leading in some instances to collision and bloodshed, has prevented that coöperation between the two races so essential to the success of industrial enterprises in the southern States. Nor have the inhabitants of those States alone suffered from the disturbed condition of affairs growing out of these congressional enactments. The entire Union has been agitated by grave apprehensions of troubles which might again involve the peace of the nation; its interests have been injuriously affected by the derangement of business and labor, and the consequent want of prosperity throughout that portion of the country.

The Federal Constitution—the Magna Charta of American rights, under whose wise and salutary provisions we have successfully conducted all our domestic and foreign affairs, sustained ourselves in peace and in war, and become a great nation among the Powers of the earth—must assuredly be now adequate to the settlement of questions growing out of the civil war waged alone for its vindication. This great fact is made most manifest by the condition of the country when Congress assembled in the month of December, 1865. Civil strife had ceased; the spirit of rebellion had spent its entire force; in the southern States the people had warmed into national life, and throughout the whole country a healthy reaction in public sentiment had taken place. By the application of the simple yet effective provisions of the Constitution the executive department, with the voluntary aid of the States, had brought the work of restoration as near completion as was within the scope of its authority, and the nation was encouraged by the prospect of an early and satisfactory adjustment of all its difficulties. Congress, however, intervened, and refusing to perfect the work so nearly consummated declined to admit members from the unrepresented States, adopted a series of measures which arrested the progress of restoration, frustrated all that had been so successfully accomplished, and after three years of agitation and strife has left the country further from the attainment of union and fraternal feeling than at the inception of the congressional plan of reconstruction. It needs no argument to show that legislation which has produced such baneful consequences should be abrogated, or else made to conform to the genuine principles of republican government.

Under the influence of party passion and sectional prejudice other acts have been passed not warranted by the Constitution. Congress has already been made familiar with my views respecting the "tenure-of-office bill." Experience has proved that its repeal is demanded by the best interests of the country, and that while it remains in force the President cannot enjoin that rigid accountability of public officers so essential to an honest and efficient execution of the laws. Its revocation would enable the executive department to exercise the power of appointment and removal in accordance with the original design of the Federal Constitution.

The act of March 2, 1867, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes, contains provisions which interfere with the President's constitutional functions as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and deny to States of the Union the right to protect themselves by means of their own militia. These provisions should be at once annulled; for while the first might, in times of great emergency, seriously embarrass the Executive in efforts to employ and direct the common strength of the nation for its protection and preservation, the other is contrary to the express declaration of the Constitution, that "a well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed."

It is believed that the repeal of all such laws would be accepted by the American people as at least a partial return to the fundamental principles of the Government, and an indication that hereafter the Constitution is to be made the nation's safe and unerring guide. They can be productive of no permanent benefit to the country, and should not be permitted to stand as so many monuments of the deficient wisdom which has characterized our recent legislation.

The condition of our finances demands the early and earnest consideration of Congress. Compared with the growth of our population, the public expenditures have reached an amount unprecedented in our history.

The population of the United States in 1790 was nearly four millions of people. Increasing each decade about thirty-three per cent., it reached in 1860 thirty-one millions—an increase of seven hundred per cent. on the population in 1790. In 1869 it is estimated that it will reach thirty-eight millions, or an increase of eight hundred and sixty-eight per cent. in seventy-nine years.

The annual expenditures of the Federal Government in 1791 were $4,200,000; in 1820, $18,200,000; in 1850, $41,000,000; in 1860, $63,000,000; in 1865, nearly $1,300,000,000; and in 1869 it is estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his last annual report, that they will be $372,000,000.

By comparing the public disbursements of 1869, as estimated, with those of 1791, it will be seen that the increase of expenditure since the beginning of the Government has been eight thousand six hundred and eighteen per cent., while the increase of the population for the same period was only eighteen hundred and sixty-eight per cent. Again: the expenses of the Government in 1860, the year of peace immediately preceding the war, were only $63,000,000; while in 1869, the year of peace three years after the war, it is estimated they will be $372,000,000—an increase of four hundred and eighty-nine per cent., while the increase of population was only twenty-one per cent. for the same period.

These statistics further show that in 1791 the annual national expenses, compared with the population, were little more than one dollar per capita, and in 1860 but two dollars per capita; while in 1869 they will reach the extravagant sum of $9 78 per capita.

It will be observed that all of these statements refer to and exhibit the disbursements of peace periods. It may, therefore, be of interest to compare the expenditures of the three war periods—the war with Great Britain, the Mexican war, and the war of the rebellion.

In 1814 the annual expenses incident to the war of 1812 reached their highest amount—about thirty one millions; while our population slightly exceeded eight millions, showing an expenditure of only $3 80 per capita. In 1847 the expenditures growing out of the war with Mexico reached $55,000,000, and the population about twenty-one millions, giving only $2 60 per capita for the war expenses of that year. In 1865 the expenditures called for by the rebellion reached the vast amount of $1,290,000,000, which, compared with a population of thirty-four millions, gives $38 20 per capita.

From the 4th day of March, 1789, to the 30th of June, 1861, the entire expenditures of the Government were $1,700,000,000. During that period we were engaged in wars with Great Britain and Mexico, and were involved in hostilities with powerful Indian tribes; Louisiana was purchased from France at a cost of $15,000,000; Florida was ceded to us by Spain for $5,000,000; California was acquired from Mexico for $15,000,000; and the Territory of New Mexico was obtained from Texas for the sum of $10,000,000. Early in 1861 the war of the rebellion commenced; and from the 1st of July of that year to the 30th of June, 1865, the public expenditures reached the enormous aggregate of $8,300,000,000. Three years of peace have intervened, and during that time the disbursements of the Government have successively been $520,000,000, $346,000,000, and $392,000,000. Adding to these amounts $872,000,000, estimated as necessary for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1869, we obtain a total expenditure of $1,600,000,000 during the four years immediately succeeding the war, or nearly as much as was expended during the seventy-two years that preceded the rebellion, and embraced the extraordinary expenditures already named.

These startling facts clearly illustrate the necessity of retrenchment in all branches of the public service. Abuses which were tolerated during the war for the preservation of the nation will not be endured by the people, now that profound peace prevails. The receipts from internal revenues and customs have during the past three years gradually diminished, and the continuance of useless and extravagant expenditures will involve us in national bankruptcy, or else make inevitable an increase of taxes, already too onerous, and in many respects obnoxious on account of their inquisitorial character. One hundred millions annually are expended for the military force, a large portion of which is employed in the execution of laws both unnecessary and unconstitutional; $150,000,000 are required each year to pay the interest on the public debt; an army of tax-gatherers impoverishes the nation; and public agents, placed by Congress beyond the control of the Executive, divert from their legitimate purposes large sums of money which they collect from the people in the name of the Government. Judicious legislation and prudent economy can alone remedy defects and avert evils which, if suffered to exist, cannot fail to diminish confidence in the public councils, and weaken the attachment and respect of the people toward their political institutions. Without proper care the small balance which it is estimated will remain in the Treasury at the close of the present fiscal year will not be realized, and additional millions be added to a debt which is now enumerated by billions.

It is shown, by the able and comprehensive report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, were $405,638,083, and that the expenditures for the same period were $377,340,284, leaving in the Treasury a surplus of $28,297,798. It is estimated that the receipts during the present fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, will be $341,392,868, and the expenditures $336,152,470, showing a small balance of $5,240,398 in favor of the Government. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, it is estimated that the receipts will amount to $327,000,000, and the expenditures to $303,000,000, leaving an estimated surplus of $24,000,000.

It becomes proper, in this connection, to make a brief reference to our public indebtedness, which has accumulated with such alarming rapidity and assumed such colossal proportions.

In 1789, when the Government commenced operations under the Federal Constitution, it was burdened with an indebtedness of $75,000,000 created during the war of the Revolution. This amount had been reduced to $45,000,000 when in 1812 war was declared against Great Britain. The three years' struggle that followed largely increased the national obligations, and in 1816 they had attained the sum of $127,000,000. Wise and economical legislation, however, enabled the Government to pay the entire amount within a period of twenty years, and the extinguishment of the national debt filled the land with rejoicing, and was one of the great events of President Jackson's administration. After its redemption a large fund remained in the Treasury, which was deposited for safe keeping with the several States, on condition that it should be returned when required by the public wants. In 1849—the year after the termination of an expensive war with Mexico—we found ourselves involved in a debt of $64,000,000; and this was the amount owed by the Government in 1860, just prior to the outbreak of the rebellion. In the spring of 1861 our civil war commenced. Each year of its continuance made an enormous addition to the debt; and when, in the spring of 1865, the nation successfully emerged from the conflict, the obligations of the Government had reached the immense sum of $2,878,992,909. The Secretary of the Treasury shows that on the 1st day of November, 1867, this amount had been reduced to $2,491,504,450; but at the same time his report exhibits an increase during the past year of $35,625,102; for the debt on the 1st day of November last is stated to have been $2,527,129,552. It is estimated by the Secretary that the returns for the past month will add to our liabilities the further sum of $11,000,000—making a total increase during thirteen months of $46,500,000.

In my message to Congress of December 4, 1865, it was suggested that a policy should be devised which, without being oppressive to the people, would at once begin to effect a reduction of the debt, and if persisted in discharge it fully within a definite number of years. The Secretary of the Treasury forcibly recommends legislation of this character, and justly urges that the longer it is deferred the more difficult must become its accomplishment. We should follow the wise precedents established in 1789 and 1816, and without further delay make provision for the payment of our obligations at as early a period as may be practicable. The fruits of their labors should be enjoyed by our citizens, rather than used to build up and sustain moneyed monopolies in our own and other lands. Our foreign debt is already computed by the Secretary of the Treasury at $850,000,000; citizens of foreign countries receive interest upon a large portion of our securities, and American tax-payers are made to contribute large sums for their support. The idea that such a debt is to become permanent should be at all times discarded, as involving taxation too heavy to be borne, and payment once in every sixteen years, at the present rate of interest, of an amount equal to the original sum. This vast debt, if permitted to become permanent and increasing, must eventually be gathered into the hands of a few, and enable them to exert a dangerous and controlling power in the affairs of the Government. The borrowers would become servants to the lenders—the lenders the masters of the people. We now pride ourselves upon having given freedom to four millions of the colored race; it will then be our shame that forty million people, by their own toleration of usurpation and profligacy, have suffered themselves to become enslaved, and merely exchanged slave-owners for new taskmasters in the shape of bondholders and tax-gatherers. Besides, permanent debts pertain to monarchical Governments, and tending to monopolies, perpetuities, and class legislation, are totally irreconcilable with free institutions. Introduced into our republican system, they would gradually but surely sap its foundations, eventually subvert our governmental fabric, and erect upon its ruins a moneyed aristocracy. It is our sacred duty to transmit unimpaired to our posterity the blessings of liberty which were bequeathed to us by the founders of the Republic, and by our example teach those who are to follow us carefully to avoid the dangers which threaten a free and independent people.

Various plans have been proposed for the payment of the public debt. However they may have varied as to the time and mode in which it should be redeemed, there seems to be a general concurrence as to the propriety and justness of a reduction in the present rate of interest. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report, recommends five per cent.; Congress, in a bill passed prior to adjournment on the 27th of July last, agreed upon four and four and a half per cent.; while by many three per cent. has been held to be an amply sufficient return for the investment. The general impression as to the exorbitancy of the existing rate of interest has led to an inquiry in the public mind respecting the consideration which the Government has actually received for its bonds, and the conclusion is becoming prevalent that the amount which it obtained was in real money three or four hundred per cent. less than the obligations which it issued in return. It cannot be denied that we are paying an extravagant percentage for the use of the money borrowed, which was paper currency, greatly depreciated below the value of coin. This fact is made apparent when we consider that bondholders receive from the Treasury, upon each dollar they own in Government securities, six per cent. in gold, which is nearly or quite equal to nine per cent. in currency; that the bonds are then converted into capital for the national banks, upon which those institutions issue their circulation, bearing six per cent. interest; and that they are exempt from taxation by the Government and the States, and thereby enhanced two per cent. in the hands of the holders. We thus have an aggregate of seventeen per cent. which may be received upon each dollar by the owners of Government securities.

A system that produces such results is justly regarded as favoring a few at the expense of the many, and has led to the further inquiry whether our bondholders, in view of the large profits which they have enjoyed, would themselves be averse to a settlement of our indebtedness upon a plan which would yield them a fair remuneration, and at the same time be just to the tax-payers of the nation. Our national credit should be sacredly observed; but in making provision for our creditors we should not forget what is due to the masses of the people. It may be assumed that the holders of our securities have already received upon their bonds a larger amount than their original investment, measured by a gold standard. Upon this statement of facts it would seem but just and equitable that the six per cent. interest now paid by the Government should be applied to the reduction of the principal in semi-annual installments, which in sixteen years and eight months would liquidate the entire national debt. Six per cent. in gold would at present rates be equal to nine per cent. in currency, and equivalent to the payment of the debt one and a half time in a fraction less than seventeen years. This, in connection with all the other advantages derived from their investment, would afford to the public creditors a fair and liberal compensation for the use of their capital, and with this they should be satisfied. The lessons of the past admonish the lender that it is not well to be over anxious in exacting from the borrower rigid compliance with the letter of the bond.

If provision be made for the payment of the indebtedness of the Government in the manner suggested, our nation will rapidly recover its wonted prosperity. Its interests require that some measure should be taken to release the large amount of capital invested in the securities of the Government. It is not now merely unproductive, but in taxation annually consumes $150,000,000, which would otherwise be used by our enterprising people in adding to the wealth of the nation. Our commerce, which at one time successfully rivaled that of the great maritime Powers, has rapidly diminished, and our industrial interests are in a depressed and languishing condition. The development of our inexhaustible resources is checked, and the fertile fields of the South are becoming waste for want of means to till them. With the release of capital, new life would be infused into the paralyzed energies of our people, and activity and vigor imparted to every branch of industry. Our people need encouragement in their efforts to recover from the effects of the rebellion and of injudicious legislation; and it should be the aim of the Government to stimulate them by the prospect of an early release from the burdens which impede their prosperity. If we cannot take the burdens from their shoulders, we should at least manifest a willingness to help to bear them.

In referring to the condition of the circulating medium, I shall merely reiterate, substantially, that portion of my last annual message which relates to that subject.

The proportion which the currency of any country should bear to the whole value of the annual produce circulated by its means is a question upon which political economists have not agreed. Nor can it be controlled by legislation, but must be left to the irrevocable laws which everywhere regulate commerce and trade. The circulating medium will ever irresistibly flow to those points where it is in greatest demand. The law of demand and supply is as unerring as that which regulates the tides of the ocean; and indeed currency, like the tides, has its ebbs and flows throughout the commercial world.

At the beginning of the rebellion the bank-note circulation of the country amounted to not much more than $200,000,000; now the circulation of national bank notes and those known as "legal-tenders" is nearly $700,000,000. While it is urged by some that this amount should be increased, others contend that a decided reduction is absolutely essential to the best interests of the country. In view of these diverse opinions, it may be well to ascertain the real value of our paper issues, when compared with a metallic or convertible currency. For this purpose, let us inquire how much gold and silver could be purchased by the $700,000,000 of paper money now in circulation? Probably not more than half the amount of the latter—showing that when our paper currency is compared with gold and silver, its commercial value is compressed into $350,000,000. This striking fact makes it the obvious duty of the Government, as early as may be consistent with the principles of sound political economy, to take such measures as will enable the holder of its notes and those of the national banks to convert them, without loss, into specie or its equivalent. A reduction of our paper circulating medium need not necessarily follow. This, however, would depend upon the law of demand and supply, though it should be borne in mind that by making legal-tender and bank notes convertible into coin or its equivalent, their present specie value in the hands of their holders would be enhanced one hundred per cent.

Legislation for the accomplishment of a result so desirable is demanded by the highest public considerations. The Constitution contemplates that the circulating medium of the country shall be uniform in quality and value. At the time of the formation of that instrument the country had just emerged from the war of the Revolution, and was suffering from the effects of a redundant and worthless paper currency. The sages of that period were anxious to protect their posterity from the evils which they themselves had experienced. Hence, in providing a circulating medium, they conferred upon Congress the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, at the same time prohibiting the States from making anything but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts.

The anomalous condition of our currency is in striking contrast with that which was originally designed. Our circulation now embraces, first, notes of the national banks, which are made receivable for all dues to the Government, excluding imposts, and by all its creditors, excepting in payment of interest upon its bonds and the securities themselves; second, legal-tender notes, issued by the United States, and which the law requires shall be received as well in payment of all debts between citizens as of all Government dues, excepting imposts; and third, gold and silver coin. By the operation of our present system of finance, however, the metallic currency, when collected, is reserved only for one class of Government creditors, who, holding its bonds, semi-annually receive their interest in coin from the national Treasury. There is no reason which will be accepted as satisfactory by the people why those who defend us on the land and protect us on the sea; the pensioner upon the gratitude of the nation, bearing the scars and wounds received while in its service; the public servants in the various Departments of the Government; the farmer who supplies the soldiers of the Army and the sailors of the Navy; the artisan who toils in the nation's workshops, or the mechanics and laborers who build its edifices and construct its forts and vessels of war, should, in payment of their just and hard-earned dues, receive depreciated paper, while another class of their countrymen, no more deserving, are paid in coin of gold and silver. Equal and exact justice requires that all the creditors of the Government should be paid in a currency possessing a uniform value. This can only be accomplished by the restoration of the currency to the standard established by the Constitution; and by this means we would remove a discrimination which may, if it has not already done so, create a prejudice that may become deep rooted and wide-spread, and imperil the national credit.

The feasibility of making our currency correspond with the constitutional standard may be seen by reference to a few facts derived from our commercial statistics.

The aggregate product of precious metals in the United States from 1849 to 1867 amounted to $1,174,000,000, while, for the same period, the net exports of specie were $741,000,000. This shows an excess of product over net exports of $433,000,000. There are in the Treasury $103,407,985 in coin; in circulation in the States on the Pacific coast about $40,000,000, and a few millions in the national and other banks—in all less than $160,000,000. Taking into consideration the specie in the country prior to 1849 and that produced since 1867, and we have more than $300,000,000 not accounted for by exportation or by the returns of the Treasury, and therefore most probably remaining in the country.

These are important facts, and show how completely the inferior currency will supersede the better, forcing it from circulation among the masses, and causing it to be exported as a mere article of trade, to add to the money capital of foreign lands. They show the necessity of retiring our paper money, that the return of gold and silver to the avenues of trade may be invited, and a demand created which will cause the retention at home of at least so much of the productions of our rich and inexhaustible gold-bearing fields as may be sufficient for purposes of circulation. It is unreasonable to expect a return to a sound currency so long as the Government and banks, by continuing to issue irredeemable notes, fill the channels of circulation with depreciated paper. Notwithstanding a coinage by our mints, since 1849, of $874,000,000, the people are now strangers to the currency which was designed for their use and benefit, and specimens of the precious metals bearing the national device are seldom seen, except when produced to gratify the interest excited by their novelty. If depreciated paper is to be continued as the permanent currency of the country, and all our coin is to become a mere article of traffic and speculation, to the enhancement in price of all that is indispensable to the comfort of the people, it would be wise economy to abolish our mints, thus saving the nation the care and expense incident to such establishments, and let all our precious metals be exported in bullion. The time has come, however, when the Government and national banks should be required to take the most efficient steps and make all necessary arrangements for a resumption of specie payments. Let specie payments once be earnestly inaugurated by the Government and banks, and the value of the paper circulation would directly approximate a specie standard.

Specie payments having been resumed by the Government and banks, all notes or bills of paper issued by either of a less denomination than twenty dollars should by law be excluded from circulation, so that the people may have the benefit and convenience of a gold and silver currency which in all their business transactions will be uniform in value at home and abroad.

"Every man of property or industry, every man who desires to preserve what he honestly possesses, or to obtain what he can honestly earn, has a direct interest in maintaining a safe circulating medium—such a medium as shall be real and substantial, not liable to vibrate with opinions, not subject to be blown up or blown down by the breath of speculation, but to be made stable and secure. A disordered currency is one of the greatest political evils. It undermines the virtues necessary for the support of the social system, and encourages propensities destructive of its happiness. It wars against industry, frugality, and economy, and it fosters the evil spirits of extravagance and speculation." It has been asserted by one of our profound and most gifted statesmen that "of all the contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind none has been more effectual than that which deludes them with paper money. This is the most effectual of inventions to fertilize the rich man's fields by the sweat of the poor man's brow. Ordinary tyranny, oppression, excessive taxation—these bear lightly on the happiness of the mass of the community compared with a fraudulent currency, and the robberies committed by depreciated paper. Our own history has recorded for our instruction enough and more than enough of the demoralizing tendency, the injustice, and the intolerable oppression on the virtuous and well-disposed of a degraded paper currency authorized by law or in any way countenanced by Government." It is one of the most successful devices, in times of peace or war, of expansions or revulsions, to accomplish the transfer of all the precious metals from the great mass of the people into the hands of the few, where they are hoarded in secret places or deposited under bolts and bars, while the people are left to endure all the inconvenience, sacrifice, and demoralization resulting from the use of depreciated and worthless paper.

The Secretary of the Interior, in his report, gives valuable information in reference to the interests confided to the supervision of his Department, and reviews the operations of the Land Office, Pension Office, Patent Office, and the Indian Bureau.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, six million six hundred and fifty-five thousand seven hundred acres of public land were disposed of. The entire cash receipts of the General Land Office for the same period were $1,632,745, being greater by $284,883 than the amount realized from the same sources during the previous year. The entries under the homestead law cover two million three hundred and twenty-eight thousand nine hundred and twenty-three acres, nearly one fourth of which was taken under the act of June 21, 1866, which applies only to the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida.

On the 30th of June, 1868, one hundred and sixty-nine thousand six hundred and forty-three names were borne on the pension rolls, and during the year ending on that day the total amount paid for pensions, including the expenses of disbursement, was $24,010,982, being $5,391,025 greater than that expended for like purposes during the preceding year.

During the year ending the 30th of September last the expenses of the Patent Office exceeded the receipts by $171; and, including reissues and designs, fourteen thousand one hundred and fifty-three patents were issued.

Treaties with various Indian tribes have been concluded, and will be submitted to the Senate for its constitutional action. I cordially sanction the stipulations which provide for reserving lands for the various tribes, where they may be encouraged to abandon their nomadic habits and engage in agricultural and industrial pursuits. This policy, inaugurated many years since, has met with signal success whenever it has been pursued in good faith and with becoming liberality by the United States. The necessity for extending it as far as practicable in our relations with the aboriginal population is greater now than at any preceding period. While we furnish subsistence and instruction to the Indians, and guaranty the undisturbed enjoyment of their treaty rights, we should habitually insist upon the faithful observance of their agreement to remain within their respective reservations. This is the only mode by which collisions with other tribes and with the whites can be avoided, and the safety of our frontier settlements secured.

The companies constructing the railway from Omaha to Sacramento have been most energetically engaged in prosecuting the work, and it is believed that the line will be completed before the expiration of the next fiscal year. The six per cent. bonds issued to these companies amounted on the 5th instant to $44,337,000, and additional work had been performed to the extent of $3,200,000.

The Secretary of the Interior in August last invited my attention to the report of a Government director of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, who had been specially instructed to examine the location, construction, and equipment of their road. I submitted for the opinion of the Attorney General certain questions in regard to the authority of the Executive which arose upon this report, and those which had from time to time been presented by the commissioners appointed to inspect each successive section of the work. After carefully considering the law of the case he affirmed the right of the Executive to order, if necessary, a thorough revision of the entire road. Commissioners were thereupon appointed to examine this and other lines, and have recently submitted a statement of their investigations, of which the report of the Secretary of the Interior furnishes specific information.

The report of the Secretary of War contains information of interest and importance respecting the several bureaus of the War Department and the operations of the Army. The strength of our military force on the 30th of September last was forty-eight thousand men, and it is computed that, by the 1st of January next, this number will be decreased to forty-three thousand. It is the opinion of the Secretary of War that within the next year a considerable diminution of the infantry force may be made without detriment to the interests of the country; and in view of the great expense attending the military peace establishment, and the absolute necessity of retrenchment where ever it can be applied, it is hoped that Congress will sanction the reduction which his report recommends. While in 1860 sixteen thousand three hundred men cost the nation $16,472,000, the sum of $65,682,000 is estimated as necessary for the support of the Army during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870. The estimates of the War Department for the last two fiscal years were, for 1867, $33,814,461; and for 1868 $25,205,669. The actual expenditures during the same periods were, respectively, $95,224,415 and $123,246,648. The estimate submitted in December last for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, was $77,124,707; the expenditures for the first quarter, ending the 30th of September last, were $27,219,117, and the Secretary of the Treasury gives $66,000,000 as the amount which will probably be required during the remaining three quarters, if there should be no reduction of the Army—making its aggregate cost for the year considerably in excess of $93,000,000. The difference between the estimates and expenditures for the three fiscal years which have been named is thus shown to be $175,545,343 for this single branch of the public service.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy exhibits the operations of that Department and of the Navy during the year. A considerable reduction of the force has been effected. There are forty-two vessels, carrying four hundred and eleven guns, in the six squadrons which are established in different parts of the world. Three of these vessels are returning to the United States and four are used as storeships, leaving the actual cruising force thirty-five vessels, carrying three hundred and fifty-six guns. The total number of vessels in the Navy is two hundred and six, mounting seventeen hundred and forty-three guns. Eighty-one vessels of every description are in use, armed with six hundred and ninety-six guns. The number of enlisted men in the service, including apprentices, has been reduced to eight thousand five hundred. An increase of navy-yard facilities is recommended as a measure which will, in the event of war, be promotive of economy and security. A more thorough and systematic survey of the North Pacific ocean is advised in view of our recent acquisitions, our expanding commerce, and the increasing intercourse between the Pacific States and Asia. The naval pension fund, which consists of a moiety of the avails of prizes captured during the war, amounts to $14,000,000. Exception is taken to the act of 28d July last, which reduces the interest on the fund loaned to the Government by the Secretary, as trustee, to three per cent, instead of six per cent., which was originally stipulated when the investment was made. An amendment of the pension laws is suggested to remedy omissions and defects in existing enactments. The expenditures of the Department during the last fiscal year were $20,120,394, and the estimates for the coming year amount to $20,993,414.

The Postmaster General's report furnishes a full and clear exhibit of the operations and condition of the postal service. The ordinary postal revenue for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, was $16,292,600, and the total expenditures, embracing all the service for which special appropriations have been made by Congress, amounted to $22,730,592, showing an excess of expenditures of $6,437,991. Deducting from the expenditures the sum of $1,896,525, the amount of appropriations for ocean steamship and other special service, the excess of expenditures was $4,541,466. By using an unexpended balance in the Treasury of $3,800,000, the actual sum for which a special appropriation is required to meet the deficiency is $741,466. The causes which produced this large excess of expenditure over revenue were the restoration of service in the late insurgent States, and the putting into operation of new service established by acts of Congress, which amounted, within the last two years and a half, to about forty-eight thousand seven hundred miles—equal to more than one third of the whole amount of the service at the close of the war. New postal conventions with Great Britain, North Germany, Belgium, the Netherlands, Switzerland, and Italy, respectively, have been carried into effect. Under their provisions important improvements have resulted, in reduced rates of international postage and enlarged mail facilities with European countries. The cost of the United States transatlantic ocean mail service since January 1, 1866, has been largely lessened under the operation of these new conventions, a reduction of over one half having been effected under the new arrangements for ocean mail steamship service which went into effect on that date. The attention of Congress is invited to the practical suggestions and recommendations made in his report by the Postmaster General.

No important question has occurred during the last year in our accustomed cordial and friendly intercourse with Costa Rica, Guatemala, Honduras, San Salvador, France, Austria, Belgium, Switzerland, Portugal, the Netherlands, Denmark, Sweden and Norway, Rome, Greece, Turkey, Persia, Egypt, Liberia, Morocco, Tripoli, Tunis, Muscat, Siam, Borneo, and Madagascar.

Cordial relations have also been maintained with the Argentine and the Oriental republics. The expressed wish of Congress that our national good offices might be tendered to those republics, and also to Brazil and Paraguay, for bringing to an end the calamitous war which has so long been raging in the valley of the La Plata, has been assiduously complied with and kindly acknowledged by all the belligerents. That important negotiation, however, has thus far been without result.

Charles A. Washburn, late United States minister to Paraguay, having resigned, and being desirous to return to the United States, the rear admiral commanding the South Atlantic squadron was early directed to send a ship-of-war to Asuncion, the capital of Paraguay, to receive Mr. Washburn and his family, and remove them from a situation which was represented to be endangered by faction and foreign war. The Brazilian commander of the allied invading forces refused permission to the Wasp to pass through the blockading forces, and that vessel returned to its accustomed anchorage. Remonstrance having been made against this refusal it was promptly overruled, and the Wasp, therefore, resumed her errand, received Mr. Washburn and his family, and conveyed them to a safe and convenient seaport. In the meantime an excited controversy had arisen between the president of Paraguay and the late United States minister, which, it is understood, grew out of his proceedings in giving asylum in the United States legation to alleged enemies of that republic. The question of the right to give asylum is one always difficult, and often productive of great embarrassment. In States well organized and established, foreign Powers refuse either to concede or exercise that right, except as to persons actually belonging to the diplomatic service. On the other hand, all such Powers insist upon exercising the right of asylum in States where the law of nations is not fully acknowledged, respected, and obeyed.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Message of the President.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

The president of Paraguay is understood to have opposed to Mr. Washburn's proceedings the injurious and very improbable charge of personal complicity in insurrection and treason. The correspondence, however, has not yet reached the United States.

Mr. Washburn, in connection with this controversy, represents that two United States citizens attached to the legation were arbitrarily seized at his side, when leaving the capital of Paraguay, committed to prison, and there subjected to torture for the purpose of procuring confessions of their own criminality and testimony to support the president's allegations against the United States minister. Mr. McMahon, the newly-appointed minister to Paraguay, having reached the La Plata, has been instructed to proceed without delay to Asuncion, there to investigate the whole subject. The rear admiral commanding the United States South Atlantic squadron has been directed to attend the new minister with a proper naval force to sustain such just demands as the occasion may require, and to vindicate the rights of the United States citizens referred to, and of any others who may be exposed to danger in the theater of war. With these exceptions, friendly relations have been maintained between the United States and Brazil and Paraguay.

Our relations during the past year with Bolivia, Ecuador, Peru, and Chili, have become especially friendly and cordial. Spain and the republics of Peru, Bolivia, and Ecuador have expressed their willingness to accept the mediation of the United States for terminating the war upon the South Pacific coast. Chili has not finally declared upon the question. In the meantime the conflict has practically exhausted itself, since no belligerent or hostile movement has been made by either party during the last two years, and there are no indications of a present purpose to resume hostilities on either side. Great Britain and France have cordially seconded our proposition of mediation, and I do not forego the hope that it may soon be accepted by all the belligerents, and lead to a secure establishment of peace and friendly relations between the Spanish American republics of the Pacific and Spain—a result which would be attended with common benefits to the belligerents and much advantage to all commercial nations. I communicate, for the consideration of Congress, a correspondence which shows that the Bolivian republic has established the extremely liberal principle of receiving into its citizenship any citizen of the United States, or of any other of the American republics, upon the simple condition of voluntary registry.

The correspondence herewith submitted will be found painfully replete with accounts of the ruin and wretchedness produced by recent earthquakes, of unparalleled severity, in the republics of Peru, Ecuador, and Bolivia. The diplomatic agents and naval officers of the United States who were present in those countries at the time of those disasters furnished all the relief in their power to the sufferers, and were promptly rewarded with grateful and touching acknowledgments by the congress of Peru. An appeal to the charity of our fellow-citizens has been answered by much liberality. In this connection I submit an appeal which has been made by the Swiss republic, whose Government and institutions are kindred to our own, in behalf of its inhabitants, who are suffering extreme destitution produced by recent devastating inundations.

Our relations with Mexico during the year have been marked by an increasing growth of mutual confidence. The Mexican Government has not yet acted upon the three treaties celebrated here last summer for establishing the rights of naturalized citizens upon a liberal and just basis, for regulating consular powers, and for the adjustment of mutual claims.

All commercial nations, as well as all friends of republican institutions, have occasion to regret the frequent local disturbances which occur in some of the constituent States of Colombia. Nothing has occurred, however, to affect the harmony and cordial friendship which have for several years existed between that youthful and vigorous republic and our own.

Negotiations are pending with a view to the survey and construction of a ship-canal across the Isthmus of Darien, under the auspices of the United States. I hope to be able to submit the results of that negotiation to the Senate during its present session.

The very liberal treaty which was entered into last year by the United States and Nicaragua has been ratified by the latter republic.

Costa Rica, with the earnestness of a sincerely friendly neighbor, solicits a reciprocity of trade, which I commend to the consideration of Congress.

The convention created by treaty between the United States and Venezuela in July, 1865, for the mutual adjustment of claims, has been held, and its decisions have been received at the Department of State. The heretofore recognized Government of the United States of Venezuela has been subverted. A provisional government having been instituted under circumstances which promise durability, it has been formally recognized.

I have been reluctantly obliged to ask explanation and satisfaction for national injuries committed by the president of Hayti. The political and social condition of the republics of Hayti and St. Domingo is very unsatisfactory and painful. The abolition of slavery, which has been carried into effect throughout the Island of St. Domingo and the entire West Indies, except the Spanish islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, has been followed by a profound popular conviction of the rightfulness of republican institutions, and an intense desire to secure them. The attempt, however, to establish republics there encounters many obstacles, most of which may be supposed to result from long-indulged habits of colonial supineness and dependence upon European monarchical Powers. While the United States have, on all occasions, professed a decided unwillingness that any part of this continent or of its adjacent islands shall be made a theater for a new establishment of monarchical power, too little has been done by us, on the other hand, to attach the communities by which we are surrounded to our own country, or to lend even a moral support to the efforts they are so resolutely and so constantly making to secure republican institutions for themselves. It is, indeed, a question of grave consideration whether our recent and present example is not calculated to check the growth and expansion of free principles, and make those communities distrust, if not dread, a Government which at will consigns to military domination States that are integral parts of our Federal Union, and, while ready to resist any attempts by other nations to extend to this hemisphere the monarchical institutions of Europe, assumes to establish over a large portion of its people a rule more absolute, harsh, and tyrannical than any known to civilized Powers.

The acquisition of Alaska was made with the view of extending national jurisdiction and republican principles in the American hemisphere. Believing that a further step could be taken in the same direction, I last year entered into a treaty with the king of Denmark for the purchase of the islands of St. Thomas and St. John, on the best terms then attainable, and with the express consent of the people of those islands. This treaty still remains under consideration in the Senate. A new convention has been entered into with Denmark, enlarging the time fixed for final ratification of the original treaty.

Comprehensive national policy would seem to sanction the acquisition and incorporation into our Federal Union of the several adjacent continental and insular communities as speedily as it can be done peacefully, lawfully, and without any violation of national justice, faith, or honor. Foreign possession or control of those communities has hitherto hindered the growth and impaired the influence of the United States. Chronic revolution and anarchy there would be equally injurious. Each one of them, when firmly established as an independent republic, or when incorporated into the United States, would be a new source of strength and power. Conforming my administration to these principles, I have on no occasion lent support or toleration to unlawful expeditions set on foot upon the plea of republican propagandism or of national extension or aggrandizement. The necessity, however, of repressing such unlawful movements clearly indicates the duty which rests upon us of adapting our legislative action to the new circumstances of a decline of European monarchical power and influence and the increase of American republican ideas, interests, and sympathies.

It cannot be long before it will become necessary for this Government to lend some effective aid to the solution of the political and social problems which are continually kept before the world by the two republics of the Island of St. Domingo, and which are now disclosing themselves more distinctly than heretofore in the Island of Cuba. The subject is commended to your consideration with all the more earnestness because I am satisfied that the time has arrived when even so direct a proceeding as a proposition for an annexation of the two republics of the Island of St. Domingo would not only receive the consent of the people interested, but would also give satisfaction to all other foreign nations.

I am aware that upon the question of further extending our possessions it is apprehended by some that our political system cannot successfully be applied to an area more extended than our continent; but the conviction is rapidly gaining ground in the American mind that, with the increased facilities for intercommunication between all portions of the earth, the principles of free government, as embraced in our Constitution, if faithfully maintained and carried out, would prove of sufficient strength and breadth to comprehend within their sphere and influence the civilized nations of the world.

The attention of the Senate and of Congress is again respectfully invited to the treaty for the establishment of commercial reciprocity with the Hawaiian kingdom, entered into last year, and already ratified by that Government. The attitude of the United States toward these islands is not very different from that in which they stand toward the West Indies. It is known and felt by the Hawaiian Government and people that their Government and institutions are feeble and precarious; that the United States, being so near a neighbor, would be unwilling to see the islands pass under foreign control. Their prosperity is continually disturbed by expectations and alarms of unfriendly political proceedings, as well from the United States as from other foreign Powers. A reciprocity treaty, while it could not materially diminish the revenues of the United States, would be a guarantee of the good will and forbearance of all nations until the people of the islands shall of themselves, at no distant day, voluntarily apply for admission into the Union.

treaty negotiated here in January last for the security of trade-marks in the interest of manufacturers and commerce. I have invited his attention to the importance of establishing, now while it seems easy and practicable, a fair and equal regulation of the vast fisheries belonging to the two nations in the waters of the North Pacific ocean.

The two treaties between the United States and Italy for the regulation of consular powers and the extradition of criminals, negotiated and ratified here during the last session of Congress, have been accepted and confirmed by the Italian Government. A liberal consular convention which has been negotiated with Belgium will be submitted to the Senate. The very important treaties which were negotiated between the United States and North Germany and Bavaria, for the regulation of the rights of naturalized citizens, have been duly ratified and exchanged, and similar treaties have been entered into with the kingdoms of Belgium and Wurtemberg, and with the Grand Duchies of Baden and Hesse-Darmstadt. I hope soon to be able to submit equally satisfactory conventions of the same character now in the course of negotiation with the respective Governments of Spain, Italy, and the Ottoman empire.

Examination of claims against the United States by the Hudson Bay Company and the Puget Sound Agricultural Company, on account of certain possessory rights in the State of Oregon and Territory of Washington, alleged by those companies in virtue of provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain of June 15, 1846, has been diligently prosecuted under the direction of the joint international commission to which they were submitted for adjudication by treaty between the two Governments of July 1, 1863, and will, it is expected, be concluded at an early day.

No practical regulation concerning colonial trade and the fisheries can be accomplished by treaty between the United States and Great Britain until Congress shall have expressed their judgment concerning the principles involved. Three other questions, however, between the United States and Great Britain remain open for adjustment. These are the mutual rights of naturalized citizens, the boundary question involving the title to the island of San Juan, on the Pacific coast, and mutual claims arising since the year 1853 of the citizens and subjects of the two countries for injuries and depredations committed under the authority of their respective Governments. Negotiations upon these subjects are pending, and I am not without hope of being able to lay before the Senate, for its consideration during the present session, protocols calculated to bring to an end these justly exciting and long-existing controversies.

We are not advised of the action of the Chinese Government upon the liberal and auspicious treaty which was recently celebrated with its plenipotentiaries at this capital.

Japan remains a theater of civil war, marked by religious incidents and political severities peculiar to that long-isolated empire. The Executive has hitherto maintained strict neutrality among the belligerents, and acknowledges with pleasure that it has been frankly and fully sustained in that course by the enlightened concurrence and coöperation of the other treaty Powers, namely, Great Britain, France, the Netherlands, North Germany, and Italy.

Spain having recently undergone a revolution marked by extraordinary unanimity and preservation of order, the provisional government established at Madrid has been recognized, and the friendly intercourse which has so long happily existed between the two countries remains unchanged.

I renew the recommendation contained in my communication to Congress dated the 18th July last, a copy of which accompanies this message, that the judgment of the people should be taken on the propriety of so amending the Federal Constitution that it shall provide—

First. For an election of President and Vice President by a direct vote of the people, instead of through the agency of electors, and making them ineligible for reelection to a second term.

Second. For a distinct designation of the person who shall discharge the duties of President in the event of a vacancy in that office by the death, resignation, or removal of both the President and Vice President.

Third. For the election of Senators of the United States directly by the people of the several States, instead of by the Legislatures; and Fourth. For the limitation to a period of years of the terms of Federal judges.

Profoundly impressed with the propriety of making these important modifications in the Constitution, I respectfully submit them for the early and mature consideration of Congress. We should as far as possible remove all pretext for violations of the organic law, by remedying such imperfections as time and experience may develop, ever remembering that "the Constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all."

In the performance of a duty imposed upon me by the Constitution, I have thus communicated to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommended for their consideration such measures as have seemed to me necessary and expedient. If carried into effect, they will hasten the accomplishment of the great and beneficent purposes for which the Constitution was ordained, and which it comprehensively states were "to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." In Congress are vested all legislative powers, and upon them devolves the responsibility as well for framing unwise and excessive laws, as for neglecting to devise and adopt measures absolutely demanded by the wants of the country. Let us earnestly hope that before the expiration of our respective terms of service, now rapidly drawing to a close, an all-wise Providence will so guide our counsels as to strengthen and preserve the Federal Union, inspire reverence for the Constitution, restore prosperity and happiness to our whole people, and promote "on earth peace, good will toward men."

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, December 9, 1868.

Report of the Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON CITY, November 20, 1868.

MR. PRESIDENT: I have the honor to submit a general report of the operations of this Department since the last annual report of the Secretary of War, with the reports of the chiefs of bureaus and military commanders for the same period.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

The strength of the Army on the 30th of September was 48,081, which by the 1st of January next will be reduced, by the expiration of term of service alone, to about 43,000.

Orders were issued in November last to reduce all regiments of infantry and artillery (except ten light batteries) to fifty men per company. No recruiting rendezvous are now in operation except for the cavalry service, and the expense of the recruiting service is reduced to the minimum.

All volunteer officers except one have been mustered out of service.

At the suggestion of Lieutenant General Sherman authority was given on the 6th of October last for the muster-in of one regiment of volunteer cavalry from the State of Kansas for service against hostile Indians. The service of this regiment is not expected to exceed six months, after which it is hoped the regular cavalry will be sufficient for the frontier service.

It may be reasonably expected that a considerable reduction of the infantry of the Army may be made within the next year without detriment to the interests of the country. I recommend that such reduction be authorized by law to be made gradually by ordinary casualties, by discharge of incompetent and unworthy officers, and by consolidation of regiments. I also recommend that the four regiments constituting the Veteran Reserve corps be disbanded, officers unfit for active service to be retired, and all others to be transferred to active regiments.

The term of enlistment for all arms of the service should be increased to five years, as a measure of economy and efficiency.

INSPECTION SERVICE.

Through the agency of the inspection branch of the service, the entire Army, with a few exceptions, otherwise especially provided for, has been thoroughly and constantly inspected during the year, and numerous special investigations have been made, resulting in material improvement in the efficiency of the troops, in the economical management of the administrative branches, and in the care and disposition of public moneys and property.

Both here and abroad inspections have come to be regarded as indispensable to successful management of a military establishment, and the conviction of the usefulness is everywhere gaining ground.

The importance of the duties to be performed, and the insufficient number of officers of the regular inspection service, has resulted in the adoption of a system whereby the required number will be supplied by detail of field officers in addition to the regular inspectors, the selections to be made by the War Department. This plan is designed to secure officers of proper capacity, judgment, and experience, and to obviate the necessity of an immediate increase in the corps of inspectors, which now numbers but nine officers.

BUREAU OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

The officers of this bureau consist of a Judge Advocate General, an Assistant Judge Advocate General, and eight judge advocates. The two vacancies in the grade of judge advocate, and the absence of any legal provision for filling them, has prevented a compliance with several applications from department commanders for such officers.

The work of the bureau is comprised in 15,046 records of military courts received, reviewed, and registered, and 1,457 reports on various subjects especially referred for opinion.

It is recommended that the number and grades of officers of the bureau be permanently fixed by law, so that vacancies may be filled.

SIGNAL SERVICE.

Provision has been made during the past year for such general instruction in military telegraphy and signaling as may be necessary for the service. Books of instruction have been furnished each company and post, and steps have been taken to provide necessary telegraphic apparatus and the equipments for signaling.

The courses of study in military telegraphy and signaling have been pursued with success at the Military Academy at West Point. By concert with the officers of the Navy, nearly similar courses of study and practice in these branches have been had at the Naval Academy at Annapolis.

A drill with a field electric telegraph train has been introduced and practiced at West Point, the cadets discharging all the duties of running out and erecting the lines, working the telegraphic instruments, and sending and receiving messages by sound.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Report of the Secretary of War.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

A school of telegraphy and signaling has been established at Fort Grebel, Maryland, and is in successful operation. At this school selected officers and enlisted men are instructed in all the duties pertaining to the service with electric telegraphs and signals. A simple telegraphic code, easily acquired, is used for this purpose.

The report of the chief signal officer, and the sub-reports covered by it, give details of the duties of his office for the past year, and the results so far attained.

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

The report of the Quartermaster General shows the total expenditure of that department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, including claims for stores taken for the use of the Army during the war, to be $36,506,381 53. Claims for property taken during the war have been allowed to the amount of $500,313 28; rejected, $2,654,430 38; and are still pending to the amount of $6,905,691 18.

In the national cemeteries 316,233 remains of soldiers have been collected, of which 175,764 are identified. The total cost has been about $2,700,000.

The fire-proof warehouse at the Schuylkill arsenal has been completed, and the expense of rent greatly reduced thereby. The warehouse authorized at Jeffersonville will not be erected, as that depot will be broken up. The $150,000 appropriated for that warehouse has been remitted to the Treasury.

Of the debt of southern railroads for material sold to them after the war, $4,627,695 77 remain unpaid.

The erection of a suitable building to accommodate the several branches of the War Department is recommended as a measure of economy and efficiency.

An appropriation of $50,000 is asked for a stock farm to supply horses for the cavalry.

No appropriation for clothing or camp equipment is required.

An increase of the number of assistant quartermasters to fifty is urgently recommended as necessary to the proper administration of that department.

Attention is invited to the operation of the joint resolution of March 30, 1868, by which the control of the appropriations for the War Department is taken, in a great measure, from the Secretary of War and vested in the accounting officers of the Treasury, in consequence of which large sums have been and are being paid from those appropriations contrary to the advice and opinion of the War Department.

SUBSISTENCE DEPARTMENT.

During the past year the supplies for the Army have been mainly purchased in the large markets of the country, though the policy has been steadfastly adhered to of purchasing near to the points of consumption whenever and wherever the same could advantageously be done. The prospect of supplying the troops in the Territories and on the Pacific in this manner is increasing, and the subject is being diligently inquired into by the department.

The average cost of the Army ration during the year has been slightly above twenty-three cents.

Tobacco to the monthly value of $20,000 has been furnished the troops at cost prices.

Subsistence to the value of over $630,000 has been supplied for the purposes of the Freedmen's Bureau, and to the value of more than $370,000 for the support of Indians—a large decrease in both instances.

In settlement of the claims for commutation of rations of Union soldiers while prisoners of war $134,056 have been expended.

On account of supplies taken for the use of the Army during the war claims to the amount of nearly three million dollars have been received, of which nearly two hundred thousand dollars have been allowed, $630,000 are awaiting decision, and the balance have been rejected for various causes.

The officers of the subsistence department number twenty-nine; but accounts have been received from time to time during the year from over eight hundred different officers. The appointment of assistant commissaries of subsistence from lieutenants of the line, with a trifling increase of pay while so acting, is again recommended, as is also the appointment of post commissary sergeants.

Measures have been instituted for executing the law abolishing the office of Army sutler, by providing a considerable variety of articles for sale to officers and men.

There remains a large unexpended appropriation for this Department, which should be returned to the Treasury, and an appropriation made of the sum necessary for the next fiscal year.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

No cases of the epidemic cholera or yellow fever which prevailed among the troops at the date of the last report have been reported during the present year.

One hundred and forty-six thousand one hundred and ninety-seven cases (being an average of three for each man in service) received medical treatment during the year ending June 30, 1868, of which about ninety per cent. were cases of disease, and the rest of wounds, accidents, and injuries. The total number of deaths from all causes was 1,621, of which about eighty-eight per cent. was from disease, and the rest from wounds, injuries, and accidents; 452 deaths were from yellow fever and 228 from cholera. The discharges upon certificate of disability number 1,074. The strength of the Army during this period was 50,000 men.

Sixteen casualties (including five deaths) have occurred in the medical corps, and there are forty-nine vacancies in the grade of assistant surgeon.

The actual expenditures during the fiscal year were $842,124 20, and the balance on hand was $1,473,792 20 on the 30th of June last.

The disbursements of the pay department during the last fiscal year have been:

For the regular Army.....	$17,303,968 53
For the Military Academy.....	169,199 04
To volunteers.....	42,936,444 08
Total.....	$60,630,611 65

There are now in service 59 paymasters of the regular establishment and 18 of the temporary establishment, it being expected that all of the latter will be mustered out prior to the date of the next report.

In the report of the Paymaster General the organization of the pay department is discussed; the advantages of the present system over the old system of regimental paymasters pointed out; the causes why payments cannot be made monthly, or even more frequently and regularly than now, stated, and the impracticability of reducing the present authorized number of paymasters, (60,) even with a large reduction of the Army, demonstrated.

Attention is asked to the statement, that while under the old system, during the war of 1812, the defalcations and expenses amounted to over seven per cent. on the amount disbursed, under the present organization and during the late war the total losses, defalcations, and expenses amounted to less than three fourths of one per cent. on the sums disbursed. During the Mexican war, under the present system, not a dollar was lost by defalcation.

The disbursements for reconstruction purposes have been $2,261,415 02. There remains an available balance of $467,626 46, which, it is believed, will cover all future expenses; but as the specific amount for each military district is fixed by law, authority is asked for the transfer of amounts from districts not requiring them to others insufficiently supplied.

During the year claims for additional bounty were allowed to the number of 241,992, involving an expenditure of $23,649,157 78. Claims were rejected to the number of 19,407, and 109,104 were still unsettled at the close of the fiscal year. Since the date of the act 435,199 claims have been received, 387,091 paid, 32,403 rejected, and 15,705 were yet unsettled at the date of the Paymaster General's report. The total disbursements on these claims have been $37,764,774 78, to which must be added the claims settled by the accounting officers of the Treasury, bringing the aggregate up to more than $54,000,000. The expense of settling these claims has been kept within five sixths of one per cent. on the amount disbursed, or about the average cost of seventy cents per claim. It is recommended that the 4th of March next be fixed by law as the date beyond which no more claims will be received, and that all claims then remaining unsettled be transferred to the Second Auditor of the Treasury for disposition.

ENGINEER DEPARTMENT.

All officers of the Corps of Engineers, except fifteen, are employed on various special and detached duties—engaged upon the permanent national defenses, survey of the lakes, improvement of rivers and harbors, explorations, command and instruction of engineer troops, and in charge of the public buildings, grounds, and works in the District of Columbia.

Work on the permanent defenses has been continued on a smaller scale, and reduced appropriations are asked to continue such work as is not liable to future modification.

Experiments with iron targets, shields, and other structures designed to resist heavy ordnance, have been and are being continued.

Three engineer depots have been established, at each of which engineer trains and materials have been collected and will be held ready for service.

Estimates amounting to $46,000 for erecting and continuing the erection of engineer barracks are submitted.

Extensive surveys for the improvement of rivers and harbors have been and are being made, and the preparation of the necessary plans is being conducted with great energy. The report of the chief of engineers, with accompaniments, will supply the information essential to legislative action.

The late appropriation of $1,500,000 has been distributed, as designed by law, among those works where most required. Such modification of the contract system prescribed for these works, as experience has shown to be advisable, is again earnestly recommended.

The appropriations for public works in the District of Columbia have been well applied and with satisfactory results.

Geographical and geological explorations and surveys in the far West have been continued during the year. These surveys, and the military reconnaissances made by engineer officers accompanying troops, afford valuable information for military and other national purposes.

The several appropriations required for the various purposes of the engineer department are heartily recommended to favorable consideration.

ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

The expenditures of the ordnance department during the last fiscal year, for all purposes, inclusive of the payment of war claims, were a little more than $3,000,000—less than three fifths of the expenditure of the preceding year.

There are twenty-seven military arsenals in all, including the national armory at Springfield. The work done at them by the hired mechanics and enlisted men of the ordnance corps, under the direction of skilled officers of the corps, has been economically and satisfactorily performed.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Report of the Secretary of War.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Measures have been taken for the construction of the Rock Island bridge, the sale of damaged and unserviceable ordnance stores, and the sale of St. Louis and Liberty arsenals, all of which were provided for by law.

Legislative authority for the sale of the arsenals at Rome, New York, and Vergennes, Vermont, and the lands at Harper's Ferry, is again recommended, and the establishment of an arsenal at Omaha or other suitable point again advocated.

Highly favorable reports of the breech-loading converted Springfield musket have been received from those portions of the Army where it has been distributed. Further supplies are now in preparation.

A few smooth-bore and rifle guns of heavy caliber are being made for trial of their power and endurance. When the most suitable kinds have been determined, a large number of guns for fortifications will have to be made, and authority to make them as fast as can be done is asked.

The necessity of draining the extensive marsh lands reclaimed by enlargement of the Washington arsenal grounds is set forth in the report of the chief of ordnance.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Large reductions of the officers and agents of the bureau have been made during the year, and arrangements are in progress to close it up by the 1st of January next, except the educational and claims divisions.

The abandoned lands yet in possession of the bureau are mostly worthless for cultivation, and will be restored at once or dropped from the returns.

Claims of colored soldiers to the number of nearly 2,000 have been settled through the bureau, without cost to the claimants, and a little more than 8,800 remain unsettled. Treasury certificates and checks for settlement of claims of colored soldiers and marines have been collected by the bureau to the number of 17,000, and to the value of nearly $3,500,000.

Transportation has been furnished to 6,418 persons—less than one third of the number transported last year.

Over 150,000 persons have received medical treatment during the year; 27 hospitals have been closed, and 21 yet remain; also 6 orphan asylums, which are in charge of the bureau.

Efforts have been made to turn over to the local civil authorities the charge of the sick, the infirm, and the insane, and in some instances with success.

The sanitary condition of the freed people has, in general, improved.

Subsistence supplies have been issued to a daily average of 16,000 persons, the number of rations issued during the year being 2,802,478. For a part of these supplies liens have been taken upon the crops.

The schools have in the main progressed, though in some places seriously injured by local opposition and want of means. Private associations have continued their liberal support, and teachers have labored faithfully, though in many cases beset with difficulties. The number of day and night schools is 1,831, with 2,295 teachers and 104,327 pupils. The aggregate number of Sunday and day schools of all kinds is 4,026, with 241,819 scholars. The amount expended for support of schools during the year was $942,523 66; this does not include the expenditures by benevolent societies, estimated at $700,000, and by freedmen, estimated at $360,000. Fifteen normal schools and colleges have been chartered or incorporated in different parts of the country.

The total expenditures of the bureau during the fiscal year were $3,977,041 72. The balance on hand was $3,622,067 99.

The Commissioner recommends appropriations to continue hospitals at New Orleans, Vicksburg, Richmond, and Washington.

To dispose of the school buildings it is proposed to transfer them to the corporations and trustees who now have them in charge, guaranteeing to be taken that they shall not be diverted from their proper uses. A grant of public lands in aid of the schools of the District of Columbia, of all grades, is recommended.

For an account of the operations of the bureau in the several States reference is made to the report of the Commissioner.

MILITARY ACADEMY.

The corps of cadets, on June 1, 1868, numbered 210 members, under the care and instruction of a superintendent, eight professors, and 32 officers of the Army. Fifty-four members of the first class were graduated June 15, and appointed to the army. During the past academic year 96 candidates have been admitted into the Academy, and 87 rejected. The cadets now at the Academy number 225, which, under existing laws, can eventually be increased to 290. The necessity of a further increase is again mentioned, and the superiority of the Military Academy over all other plans lately proposed for meeting that want is pointed out by the inspector in his report.

The great value and importance of the annual Board of Visitors, both to the Academy and the Government, is referred to, and the report of the board for 1868 is attached to the inspector's report. The board report very favorably upon the discipline, instruction, administration, and fiscal affairs of the Academy, and recommend several appropriations as especially necessary to be made. They highly commend the public value of the institution, and ask for it a generous support. The favorable report of the board is concurred in by the inspector from personal observation during his semi-annual inspections. The charges once, but now no longer, directed against the Military Academy of its alleged costliness, exclusiveness, and the disloyalty of its graduates, are referred to and refuted by facts and figures, among the most interesting of which are the statements that during the late war, of the graduates from all the southern States, one half remained loyal; that of the graduates from the actual rebel States more than one fourth remained loyal; and that of the graduates engaged on the side of the Union one fifth lost their lives.

The past honorable record of the Academy, and its present high standing at home and abroad, are cited as evidence of the great usefulness to which it will in the future attain.

ARTILLERY SCHOOL.

This school was organized at the close of 1867 by order of the General of the Army, and Brevet Major General Barry, colonel second artillery, was assigned to its command. It was established at Fortress Monroe, and one battery from each of the five regiments of artillery was ordered to that post as the instruction batteries for the first year.

The course of instruction adopted for the school is both theoretical and practical, embracing a variety of subjects, and is pursued both by the officers and non-commissioned officers of the batteries. The practical course for the present year has just been completed by an examination of the officers under instruction. The theoretical part of the course is now in operation, and will likewise be closed by an examination before the 1st of April next. It embraces mathematics, military surveying and engineering, artillery, military history, and military, international, and constitutional law.

It is believed that this school will supply a long-felt want in the artillery arm, and prove greatly beneficial to the military service.

EXPENDITURES AND ESTIMATES.

The actual current expenses of the War Department for the last fiscal year were $68,743,094 71, to which is to be added the sum of $9,961,406 48, old war debts paid during the year, making the total expenditures of the Department $78,704,501 14. The appropriations for the present fiscal year were $35,400,557 47; the estimated deficiencies for the current year are $13,975,000. It is estimated that the sum of $65,682,388 85 will be required for the expenses of this Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870. There will be a surplus of $60,240,221 81 from unexpended appropriations to be paid into the Treasury at the close of the present fiscal year.

THE ARMY.

The General of the Army submits, with the following letter, the reports of commanders of military divisions, departments, and military districts:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., November 24, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the reports of division, district, and department commanders for the past year. These reports give a full account of the operations and services of the Army for the year, and I refer to them for details.

I would earnestly renew my recommendation of last year that the control of the Indians be transferred to the War Department. I call special attention to the recommendation of General Sherman on this subject. The recommendation has my earnest approval. It is unnecessary that the arguments in favor of the transfer should be restated; the necessity for the transfer becomes stronger and more evident every day.

While the Indian war continues I do not deem any general legislation for the reduction of the Army advisable. The troops on the Plains are all needed; troops are still needed in the southern States, and further reduction can be made in the way already used and now in operation where it is safe, namely: by allowing companies to diminish by discharges, without being strengthened by recruits, and by stopping appointments of second lieutenants.

If it should be deemed advisable, the Veteran Reserve regiments might be discontinued, by absorption and retirement of officers and discharge of men without detriment to the service.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
U. S. GRANT, General.
General J. M. SCHOFIELD, Secretary of War.

ABSTRACTS OF REPORTS.

Military Division of the Missouri.

This division, commanded by Lieutenant General Sherman, is composed of the military departments of the Missouri, the Platte, and Dakota, embracing the territory west of the Mississippi river to the Rocky mountains, and commanded respectively by Major General Sheridan and Brevet Generals Augur and Terry.

The war of races, which is the normal condition of things on the Plains, has continued without interruption during the past year. The Indian Peace Commission, created by act of Congress last year to devise a practical, and, if possible, a peaceful solution of our Indian troubles, and of which General Sherman was constituted a member, gave the unanimous opinion that peace with the Indians east of the Rocky mountains could only be secured by their collection on reservations and maintenance by the Government till able to provide for themselves. Two such reservations were selected by the commission and treaties made with several tribes to go on them; but the necessary legislative action, setting apart the reservations and providing necessary governments for them, (these being the vital principles of the plan,) was not taken, and to this many attribute the failure of a lasting peace and the occurrence of a costly war with four of the principal tribes with whom treaties were made.

Concerning the existing war, it is proved beyond dispute that it was begun by the Indians without any provocation whatever on the part of the whites. Its object is supposed to be to procure the abandonment of the Smoky Hill route, the best hunting grounds of America; and those engaged in it are believed to have been instigated by the Sioux, to whom the Powder River road had been abandoned at their entreaty, principally because it was of no further value; but they attributing this action to fear, doubtless so represented to the other tribes, thus leading them to believe that they, too, could enforce a compliance with their demands. The troops have been reinforced by seven companies of cavalry, and a mounted regiment of Kansas volunteers will soon be in active service. With these it is designed during the coming winter, the only time for efficient operations, to punish the hostile Indians so that they will not again resort to war, and to collect them by force upon their reservations and compel them there to remain. It is useless any longer to attempt the occupation of these plains in common with these tribes. The country is adapted only to grazing, which necessitates scattered settlements, while the horses and cattle tempt the hungry Indian, who, deprived of his accustomed subsistence, will steal rather than starve, and will kill in order to steal. With such opposing interests the races cannot live together, and it is the Indians who must yield. They have been assigned reservations which in fifty years will enrich their descendants, and mean time they must be fed while learning to cultivate the soil and rear domestic animals.

But personal labor and restriction to one place being at variance with the hereditary pride and habits of the Indian, the desired result can only be obtained by coercion, and it was for this reason that the peace commission, in view, too, of recent events, was impelled to the conclusion, in their late report, that the management of Indian affairs should be again vested in the War Department, as the only branch of the Government able to use the required force promptly and without the circumlocution unavoidable, no other Department being able to act with such vigor and promptness as to warrant any hope that the plans and purposes of the commission could be carried into execution.

The plan of the peace commission is by General Sherman believed to be the only means of saving the Indians from total annihilation, and he urges upon Congress its immediate adoption. Meanwhile, his purposes are declared to be to protect the Missouri river traffic and the Union Pacific railroad with jealous care; to gather in the wandering bands of Sioux to the reservation selected north of Nebraska, and feed and protect them to the extent of his means, and to destroy or punish, to his utmost power, the hostile Indians, till they are willing to go and remain upon the reservation assigned to them at Fort Cobb, where he is prepared to provide for them to a limited extent. This double policy, of peace within their reservations and war without, must soon, in his opinion, bring matters to a determination.

The appropriation of $500,000 for carrying out the treaty stipulations and defraying the expenses of the commission has been applied to those objects; the outstanding accounts amounting to about $150,000, and the balance being applied to the care and support of the Indians collected on the reservations.

The appropriation of $212,500 for the Navajo Indians of New Mexico, placed in charge of General Sherman, has been intrusted to General Getty, commanding in that Territory, who will cause it to be properly expended. An appropriation of $150,000, under control of the Interior Department, for the removal of these Indians to their new reservation, was also made; but the removal had already been effected by the military authorities at a cost of less than one third of that amount.

Military Division of the Pacific.

This division, commanded by Major General Halleck, includes three military departments, embracing three States and four Territories, with an area of nearly 1,250,000 square miles, more than 12,000 miles of sea-coast, and a population of about 700,000 whites and 130,000 Indians. Two regiments of cavalry, one regiment of artillery, and four regiments of infantry compose the military force of the division.

The department of Alaska, commanded by Brevet Major General Davis, comprises the territory lately known as Russian America. Its area is about 578,000 square miles, and its population about 2,000 whites and 60,000 half-breeds and Indians. The military force of the department consists of five companies of artillery and one of infantry, distributed at six military posts. The remarks of the department commander respecting the best policy to pursue toward the Indians, the needlessness of a civil government for the Territory at present, and his especial recommendation that no Indian agents or superintendents be sent there at this time, are commended to attention.

The department of the Columbia, commanded by Brevet Major General Crook, includes the State of Oregon and the Territories of Washington and Idaho. Its area is about 275,000 square miles, with a population of 130,000 whites and 35,000 Indians. Twenty companies, distributed at fifteen military posts, constitute the military force of the department. The Indian war, which for many years has been waged in this region, has by the skill and energy of General Crook been brought to a virtual termination. No depredations have lately been committed. A reduction of the military force may probably be made next year.

The department of California, commanded by Brevet Major General Ord, includes the States of California and Nevada and the Territory of Arizona, with an area of about 365,000 square miles, and a population of 538,000 whites and 35,000 Indians. Forty-eight companies of troops of all arms constitute the military force of the department, of which twenty-nine companies are serving in Arizona alone, though the 8,000 inhabitants of the Territory are far from being satisfied with that number.

The erection of Arizona into a separate military department, and an increase of the force, with a view to more energetic operations against the Apache, the worst of all Indians, is recommended by the division commander, who speaks highly of the agricultural capacity of the Territory.

Department of the South.

The second and third military districts, composed of the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, were in August last, after the admission of those States to representation in Congress, organized into the department of the South, and Major General George G. Meade assigned to the command. The department commander issued orders conforming the action of the military to the changed state of affairs in the several States, and adopted such measures as to make the transition from military to civil authority gradual and almost imperceptible. The troops have been so distributed throughout the different States composing the department that they could at any time be used to cooperate with and sustain the State authorities; and the officers and men of the Army have, as a rule, conducted themselves in the discharge of their delicate and responsible duties in a manner creditable to themselves and conducive to the best interests of the people in the States where they are stationed.

Department of the Cumberland.

This department embraces the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, and West Virginia, and is commanded by Major General Thomas, to whose accompanying report attention is invited. He reports no improvement in the state of public and social affairs, nor does he look for any immediate improvement. In some sections affairs are decidedly worse, and generally the necessity for the presence of troops is as great as heretofore.

The lawless operations of a mysterious organization known as the "Ku-Klux Klan," and the terror inspired by it in Tennessee, are described at length, together with the action taken by the State authorities and himself respectively.

Considerable lawlessness is also reported as prevalent in Kentucky, and the services of troops have been called into requisition for the protection of various Federal civil officers in the discharge of their duties.

The attempts of certain railroad companies to evade their obligations to the United States are mentioned in the report.

Military Division of the Atlantic.

This division, composed of the department of the Lakes, department of the East, and department of Washington, was created by order of the President on the 12th of February, 1868, and Lieutenant General Sherman assigned to its command, with headquarters at Washington. General Hancock, however, was afterward substituted for General Sherman, and assumed command on the last day of March.

The division embraces the States of Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin, the New England States, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware, and the District of Columbia.

No military operations have taken place in the division since its establishment, though reports of intended Fenian movements against Canada have from time to time been made.

The headquarters of the division have recently been transferred to New York city.

Department of Louisiana.

The department of Louisiana, consisting of the States of Louisiana and Arkansas, was organized on the 28th of July, after the admission of those States to representation in Congress, and Brevet Major General L. H. Rousseau assigned to the command. Prior to the arrival of General Rousseau at the headquarters, on the 15th day of September, Brevet Major General R. C. Buchanan commanded the department.

The duties of the department commander have been principally to preserve the peace and sustain the State authorities of the newly organized State governments of Louisiana and Arkansas. The difficulties experienced in carrying out these objects, and the means adopted to overcome those difficulties, are set forth in his report.

First Military District.

This district consists of the State of Virginia, and is commanded by Brevet Major General George Stoneman, who succeeded Brevet Major General J. M. Schofield on the 1st of June. The military force of this district is composed of two regiments of infantry and one company of artillery, which force has been found sufficient to protect the citizens in their lives and property and preserve the peace in the district. In pursuance of the policy pursued in the district ever since its formation the State courts and civil authorities generally throughout the State have been permitted to exercise the functions appertaining to their respective offices, subject, however, to appeal to the military authorities by any person who might conceive that injustice had been done him by their action.

The constitutional convention, called under the reconstruction acts of Congress, which was in session at the date of the last annual report, framed a constitution to be submitted to the people, but in consequence of Congress having failed to make the necessary appropriation for defraying the expenses of an election, it was not so submitted, the district commander referring the matter of the appropriation, as well as designating a day for the election, to Congress, which has, as yet, failed to designate the day, although the necessary appropriation was made at its last session. The delicate and perplexing questions growing out of the removal of civil officers, the appointment of others in their places qualified for their positions and eligible under the reconstruction acts, are pointed out, and the repeal of the 9th section of the act of Congress passed July 19, 1867, recommended.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Report of the Secretary of War.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Second Military District.

At the date of the last report of the Secretary of War the second military district, composed of the States of North Carolina and South Carolina, was under command of Brevet Major General E. R. S. Canby. The principal duties of the district commander were those assigned him by the reconstruction acts, under which he so established the jury system in the States composing his district that the jury lists embraced all citizens who were identified with the community in which they resided by the payment of taxes, and were mentally and morally qualified for the proper performance of jury duty. Measures were adopted for the purpose of securing quiet and order by the enforcement of the State laws for the prevention and punishment of crimes, through and by means of the local authorities, and not to interfere with the usual mode of procedure, except where the proper civil authorities refused or failed to act, or where it became manifest that from past political action, or by reason of prejudice against color or caste, impartial justice would not be administered.

In both North and South Carolina elections were held for the purpose of deciding whether there should be a convention for framing a new constitution for the State and electing delegates to the convention. The elections passed off quietly, and a majority of the electors having voted for a convention the delegates were called together, and after having framed a constitution which was submitted to the people and adopted by them, and the Representatives elected under that constitution admitted to their seats in Congress, under the act of Congress of June 25, 1863, the military district ceased to exist, and was merged into the department of the South, under command of Major General Meade.

Third Military District.

At the date of the last annual report the third military district consisted of the States of Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, and was under command of Brevet Major General John Pope, who remained in command until the 6th day of January, 1868, when he was relieved by Major General George G. Meade, who assumed command in compliance with orders from the War Department.

At the time Major General Meade assumed command the condition of affairs in the several States composing his district was as follows:

In Georgia a convention, elected under the reconstruction laws, was in session at Atlanta, but hampered and embarrassed for want of funds.

In Alabama a convention had met, framed a constitution, nominated a ticket for State officers, and adjourned.

In Florida an election had been held for members of a convention, but under General Pope's orders was not to meet until the 20th of January.

During General Meade's administration the following events occurred prior to the discontinuance of the district:

In Georgia, the officers of the State government having refused to recognize the authority of the district commander, because, as the Governor alleged, the reconstruction acts were unconstitutional, General Meade removed the Governor and two other officers of the State government and appointed officers of the Army to their positions, who continued to fulfill the duties with faithfulness and efficiency until the qualification of State officers elected under the new constitution, which was framed by the convention and ratified by the people.

In Alabama the constitution framed by the convention was submitted to the people, and although in the opinion of General Meade it was rejected by the people it was adopted by Congress.

In Florida the convention assembled, and after a great deal of bickering and dissension adopted a constitution, which was subsequently ratified by the people of the State.

Congress, having admitted the States of Georgia, Alabama, and Florida to representation in Congress, orders were issued from headquarters of the Army dated July 28, 1868, discontinuing the third military district, and assigning the States composing it to the department of the South.

Fourth Military District.

At the date of the last annual report this district comprised the States of Arkansas and Mississippi, and was commanded by Brevet Major General E. O. C. Ord, who was relieved on the 8th day of January last by Brevet Major General Alvan C. Gillem. On the 28th of July last Arkansas, having, in compliance with the reconstruction acts, adopted a constitution and been admitted to representation in Congress, was detached from the fourth military district and attached to the department of Louisiana. The State of Mississippi, having rejected the constitution submitted by the convention convened under the reconstruction acts, is still retained as a military district.

The citizens of the State of Mississippi have devoted themselves to repairing the losses resulting from the war, and the following extract from the report shows the present agricultural and financial condition of affairs in the State:

"Thanks to energy and industry, favored by a good season, an abundant crop of corn—more than a year's supply, and by some estimated as a supply sufficient for two years—has been secured, while the yield of cotton in the State is very great, estimated as high as 350,000 bales. At present prices this will produce more than $50,000,000."

The civil courts have continued to dispense justice under the supervision of the military authorities, and there has been no necessity for the use of the troops stationed in the State.

Fifth Military District.

This district, composed of the States of Louisiana and Texas, at the date of the last report was under the temporary command of Brevet Major General Mower, until the arrival of Major General Hancock on the 29th November last, when that officer assumed and exercised command until relieved on the 28th of March, 1868, the command of the fifth military district being devolved, first upon Brevet Major General Reynolds, and subsequently upon Brevet Major General Buchanan.

The State of Louisiana having adopted a constitution and been admitted to representation in Congress, orders were issued from headquarters of the Army on the 28th of July, 1868, reducing the fifth military district to the State of Texas, and assigning Brevet Major General J. J. Reynolds to the command.

General Reynolds reports the existence of armed secret organizations in the State, the objects of which seem to be to "disarm, rob, and in many cases murder Union men and negroes, and, as occasion may offer, murder United States officers and soldiers." "The murder of negroes is so common as to render it impossible to keep an accurate account of them." "These organizations are evidently countenanced, or at least not discouraged, by a majority of the white people in the counties where the bands are most numerous. They could not otherwise exist." "Free speech and free press, as the terms are generally understood in other States, have never existed in Texas."

In consequence of this state of affairs General Reynolds has found it necessary to withdraw troops from the frontier posts "to such an extent as to impair their efficiency for protection against Indians; but the bold, wholesale murdering in the interior of the State seems at present to present a more urgent demand for troops than Indian depredations."

DISCIPLINE OF THE ARMY.

During the short time I have had charge of the War Department it has been my constant aim to systematically reduce the expenses of the Department; to improve the discipline and efficiency of the Army; to prosecute such experiments in engineering and ordnance, and to continue such instruction of the officers and men as are necessary to the perfection of our military establishment; to give all needful strength to the forces operating against hostile Indians; and to give the greatest practicable assistance to the civil authorities in the States where recently organized governments need military support.

The discipline of the Army is believed to be better than at any previous time since the late war. The efficient action of courts-martial, with prompt executive confirmation, has resulted in dismissal from the service of a considerable number of unworthy officers and exemplary punishment of others. Provision has also been made, under authority of the acts of Congress approved August 8, 1861, and June 25, 1864, for dropping from the rolls of the Army, upon the report of an examining board, such officers as may be unfit for the service by reason of intemperate or vicious habits. These measures, having the earnest support of the great body of officers, have already produced beneficial results, and cannot fail soon to relieve the Army of such officers as have proved wholly unworthy, and to reform such as have only temporarily yielded to temptation. From thorough discipline and efficiency among the officers the same essential qualities among the enlisted men follow as a matter of course.

INDIANS.

I refer to the report of Lieutenant General Sherman for an instructive statement of facts and valuable suggestions in respect to Indian affairs. I believe it manifest that an important change should be made in our mode of dealing with the Indians. While good faith and sound policy alike require us to strictly observe existing treaties so long as the Indians maintain like good faith, when any tribe has violated its treaty it should no longer be regarded as a nation with which to treat, but as a dependent uncivilized people, to be cared for, fed when necessary, and governed.

It is manifest that any branch of the public service cannot be efficiently and economically managed by two Departments of the Government. If the Interior Department can alone manage Indian affairs, and thus save the large expense of the Army in the Indian country, very well. But if the Army must be kept there for the protection of railroads and frontier settlements, why not require the Army officers to act as Indian agents, and thus save all the expense of the civilians so employed. Besides, an Army officer has his military reputation and commission at stake, and is subject to trial by court-martial for any misconduct in office. Thus is afforded the strongest possible security the Government can have for an honest administration of Indian affairs by officers of the Army, while the civilian agent, being only a temporary officer of the Government, and practically exempt from trial and punishment for misconduct, gives the Government the least possible security for honest administration.

For the sake of economy to the Government, for the sake of more efficient protection to the frontier settlements, and for the sake of justice to the Indians, I recommend that the management of Indian affairs be restored to the War Department, with authority to make regulations for their government and for their protection against lawless whites.

MILITARY AID TO STATE GOVERNMENTS.

The relation of the Army to the civil authorities in the States recently restored to civil government has been a subject of no little perplexity.

While those governments were yet imperfectly organized, lacking, to a great extent, the sympathy and support of the most influential citizens, without organized police or militia

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

HO. OF REPS.

forces, without arms and without money, and without even authority of law to organize and arm a militia, the military government, which the people had learned by more than three years' experience to rely upon for protection of life and property, was suddenly withdrawn. Immediately followed an exciting political canvass, having for its alternative results, in popular expectation, the support or overthrow of those newly-formed governments. The result has been unusual disposition to lawlessness and crime and comparative inefficiency of civil government in those States.

The only laws of Congress providing for the employment of the military force of the United States in support of the government of any State were passed in the infancy of the Republic, with a jealous care to avoid undue interference by the national Government in State affairs, and not designed for such a condition of society as now exists in the southern States.

Hence, with an earnest desire to do all in the power of the Executive to preserve peace in those States, and enable the people to fairly decide at the polls the exciting questions involved in the canvass, it has been found possible to attain these objects only in an imperfect degree, but it is believed that, considering the difficulties of the situation, there is abundant reason to be satisfied with the comparative good order that has prevailed throughout the country. The instructions issued from this Department, with the President's sanction, for the government of department commanders, and correspondence with those commanders and Governors of States, are submitted with this report for the information of Congress.

J. M. SCHOFIELD,
Secretary of War.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
December 1, 1868.

In compliance with the requirements of law the Secretary of the Treasury has the honor to make to Congress the following report:

In his former communications the Secretary has expressed so fully his views upon the great subjects of the currency, the revenues, and the public debt, that it may be thought quite unnecessary for him again to press them upon the attention of Congress. These subjects, however, have lost none of their importance; on the contrary, the public mind during the past year has been turned to their consideration with more absorbing interest than at any former period. The Secretary will therefore, he trusts, be pardoned for restating some of the views heretofore presented by him.

If there is any question in finance or political economy which can be pronounced settled by argument and trial it is that inconvertible and depreciated paper money is injurious to public and private interests, a positive political and financial evil for which there can be but one justification or excuse, to wit: a temporary necessity arising from an unexpected and pressing emergency; and it follows, consequently, that such a circulation should only be tolerated until, without a financial shock, it can be withdrawn or made convertible into specie. If an irredeemable bank-note circulation is an evidence of bankrupt or badly managed banking institutions, which should be deprived of their franchises, or compelled to husband and make available their resources in order that they may be prepared at the earliest day practicable to take up their dishonored obligations, why should not an irredeemable Government currency be regarded as an evidence of bad management of the national finances, if not of national bankruptcy? And why should not such wise and equal revenue laws be enacted, and such economy in the use of public moneys be enforced, as will enable the Government either judiciously to fund or promptly to redeem its broken promises?

The United States notes, although declared by law to be lawful money, are, nevertheless, a dishonored and disreputable currency. The fact that they are a legal tender, possessing such attributes of money as the statute can give them, adds nothing to their real value, but makes them all the more dishonorable to the Government and subversive of good morals. The people are compelled to take as money what is not money; and becoming demoralized by its constantly changing value, they are in danger of losing that sense of honor in their dealings with the Government and with each other which is necessary for the well-being of society. It is vain to expect on the part of the people a faithful fulfillment of their duties to the Government as long as the Government is faithless to its own obligations; nor will those who do not hesitate to defraud the public revenues long continue to be scrupulous in their private business. Justifiable and necessary as the measure was then regarded, it is now apparent that an unfortunate step was taken when irredeemable promises were issued as lawful money; and especially when they were made a valid tender in payment of debts contracted when specie was the legal as well as the commercial standard of value. The legal-tender notes enabled debtors to pay their debts in a currency largely inferior to that which was alone recognized as money at the time they were incurred, and thus the validity of contracts was virtually impaired. If all creditors had been compelled by law to pay into the public Treasury fifty per cent., or ten per cent., or, indeed, any portion of the amounts received by them from their debtors, such a law would have been condemned as unequal and unjust; and yet the effect of it would have been to lessen, to the extent of the receipts from this source, the necessity for other kinds of taxation, and thus to relieve in some measure the class unjustly, because unequally, taxed. By the legal-tender acts a portion of the property of one class of citizens was virtually confiscated for the benefit of another, without an increase thereby of the public revenues, and consequently without any compensation to the injured class. There can be no doubt that these acts have tended to blunt and deaden the public conscience, nor that they are chargeable in no small degree with the demoralization which so generally prevails.

The economical objections to these notes as lawful money—stated at length in previous reports of the Secretary—may be thus briefly restated. They increased immensely the cost of the war, and they have added largely to the expenses of the Government since the restoration of peace; they have caused instability in prices, unsteadiness in trade, and put a check upon judicious enterprises; they have driven specie from circulation and made it merchandise; they have sent to foreign countries the products of our mines, at the same time that our European debt has been steadily increasing, and has now reached such magnitude as to be a heavy drain upon the national resources and a serious obstacle in the way of a return to specie payments; they have shaken the public credit by raising dangerous questions in regard to the payment of the public debt; in connection with high taxes—to the necessity for which they have largely contributed—they are preventing ship-building, and thereby the restoration of the commerce which was destroyed by the war; they are an excuse for—if, indeed, they do not necessitate—protective tariffs, and yet fail, by their fluctuating value, to protect the American manufacturer against his foreign competitor; they are filling the coffers of the rich, but, by reason of the high prices which they create and sustain they are almost intolerable to persons of limited incomes. The language of one of the greatest men of modern times, so often, but not too often, quoted, is none too strong in its descriptions of the injustice and the evils of an inconvertible currency:

"Of all the contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind, none has been more effectual than that which deludes them with paper money. Ordinary tyranny, oppression, excessive taxation—these bear lightly on the happiness of the mass of the community compared with a fraudulent currency and the robberies committed by depreciated paper. Our own history has recorded for our instruction enough and more than enough of the demoralizing tendency, the injustice, and the intolerable oppression, on the virtuous and well-disposed, of a degraded paper currency authorized or in any way countenanced by Government."

The experience of all nations that have tried the experiment of inconvertible paper money has proved the truth of the eloquent words of Mr. Webster. If our country is in a measure prosperous with such an incubus upon it, it is because it is so magnificent in extent, so diversified in climate, so rich in soil, so abundant in minerals, with a people so full of energy that even a debased currency can only retard but not put a stop to its progress.

The Secretary still adheres to the opinion so frequently expressed by him, that a reduction of the paper circulation of the country until it appreciated to the specie standard was the true solution of our financial problem. But as this policy was emphatically condemned by Congress, and it is now too late to return to it, he recommends the following measures as the next best calculated to effect the desired result.

Agreements for the payment of coin seem to be the only ones, not contrary to good morals, the performance of which cannot be enforced in the courts. "Coin contracts" executed before the passage of the legal-tender acts, as well as those executed since, are satisfied in all the States except California by the payment of the amounts called for in depreciated notes. This shackle upon commerce, this check upon our national progress, this restriction upon individual rights, should no longer be continued. If it be admitted that the condition of the country during the war, and for a time after its close, created a necessity for laws and decisions making promissory notes (fluctuating in value according to the result of battles and of speculative combinations) the medium in which contracts should be discharged, this necessity no longer exists. Steps should now be taken to give stability to business and security to enterprise; and to this end specific contracts to be executed in coin should at once be legalized. Perhaps no law could be passed which would be productive of better results with so little private or public inconvenience. Such a law would simply enable the citizen to do what the Government is doing in its receipts for customs and in the payment of its bonded debt; it would merely authorize the enforcement of contracts voluntarily entered into according to their letter. The effect of such a law would be to check the outflow of specie to other countries by creating a necessity for the use of it at home; to encourage enterprises extending into the future by removing all uncertainty in regard to the value of the currency with which they are to be carried on. Such a law would remove a formidable embarrassment in our foreign trade, would familiarize our people again with specie as the standard of value, and show how groundless is the apprehension so generally existing that a withdrawal of depreciated notes or the appreciation of these notes to par would produce a scarcity of money, by proving that specie, expelled from the country by an inferior circulating medium, will return again when it is made the basis of contracts and is needed in their performance. Business is now necessarily speculative because the basis is unreliable. Currency, by reason of its uncertain future value, although usually plentiful in the cities, and readily obtained there at low rates on short time with ample collaterals, is comparatively scarce and dear in the agricultural districts, where longer loans on commercial paper are required. Prudent men hesitate both to lend or to borrow for any considerable period by reason of their inability to determine the value of the medium in which the loans are to be paid. With currency now worth seventy cents on the dollar, and which within six months may advance to eighty or decline to sixty, is it strange that the flow is to the business centers, where it can be loaned "on call," leaving the interior without proper supplies at reasonable rates for moving the crops and conducting other legitimate business? Is it strange that, in such an unsettled condition of the currency, gambling is active while enterprise halts, trade stagnates, and distrust and apprehension exist in regard to the future? It is not supposed that such a measure as is recommended will cure the financial evils which now afflict the country, but it will be a decided movement in the right direction, and the Secretary indulges the hope that it will receive the early and favorable consideration of Congress.

The legal-tender acts were war measures. By reference to the debates upon their passage it will be perceived that by all who advocated them they were expected to be temporary only. It was feared that irredeemable Government notes, in the unfortunate condition of the country, could only be saved from great depreciation by being made a legal tender—the great fact not being sufficiently considered that, by possessing this character, their depreciation would not be prevented, but merely disguised. Hence it was declared that they should be "lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public or private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt." They were issued in an emergency, for which it then seemed that no other provision could be made. They were, in fact, a forced loan justified only by the condition of the country, and they were so recognized by Congress and the people. By no member of Congress and by no public journal was the issue of these notes as lawful money advocated on any other ground than that of necessity; and the question arises, should they not now, or at an early day, be divested of the character which was conferred upon them in a condition of the country so different from the present. The Secretary believes that they should, and he therefore recommends, in addition to the enactment by which contracts for the payment of coin can be enforced, that it be declared that after the 1st day of January, 1870, United States notes shall cease to be a legal tender in payment of all private debts subsequently contracted; and that after the 1st day of January, 1871, they shall cease to be a legal tender on any contract, or for any purpose whatever, except Government dues, for which they are now receivable.

The law should also authorize the conversion of these notes, at the pleasure of the holders, into bonds, bearing such rate of interest as may be authorized by Congress on the debt into which the present outstanding bonds may be funded. The period for which they would continue to be a legal tender would be sufficient to enable the people and the banks to prepare for the contemplated change, and the privilege of their conversion would save them from depreciation. What has been said by the Secretary in his previous reports on the pernicious effects upon business and the public morals of inconvertible legal-tender notes, and what is said in this report upon the advantages which would result from legalizing coin contracts, sustain this recommendation. It may not be improper, however, to suggest another reason for divesting these notes of their legal tender character by legislative action. Although the decisions of the courts have been generally favorable to the constitutionality of the acts by which they were authorized, grave doubts are entertained by many of the ablest lawyers of the country as to the correctness of these decisions; and it is to be borne in mind that they have not yet been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The illustrious lawyer and statesman, whose language upon the subject of irredeemable paper money has been quoted, in the Senate of the United States on the 21st day of December, 1836, expressed the following opinion:

"Most unquestionably there is no legal tender in this country, under the authority of this Government or any other, but gold and silver, either the coinage of our own mints or foreign coins at rates regulated by Congress. This is a constitutional principle, perfectly plain and of the very highest importance. The States are expressly prohibited from making anything but gold and silver a legal tender in payment of debts, and although no such express prohibition is applied to Congress, yet, as Congress has no power granted to it in this respect but to coin money and to regulate the value of foreign coins, it clearly has no power to substitute paper or anything else for coin as a tender in payment of debts and in discharge of contracts. Congress has exercised this power fully in both its branches. It has coined money, and still coins it; it has regulated the value of foreign coins, and still regulates their value. The legal tender, therefore, the constitutional standard of value, is established and cannot be overthrown. To overthrow it would shake the whole system."

It is, by no means certain that the Supreme Court will differ from Mr. Webster upon this question, and no one can fail to perceive how important it is that the legislation recommended should precede a decision (from which there can be no appeal) that United States notes are not, under the Federal Constitution, a legal tender.

The receipts from customs for the last three years have been as follows:

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866...	$179,046,651 58
For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867...	176,417,810 88
For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868...	164,464,599 56

While it appears from these figures that the customs receipts since the commencement of the fiscal year 1865 have been, in a revenue point of view, entirely satisfactory, the question naturally arises, what do these large receipts, under a high tariff, indicate in regard to our foreign trade and to our financial relations with foreign nations.

It is impossible to ascertain with precision the amount of our securities held in Europe, nor is there any perfectly reliable data for ascertaining even what amount has gone there annually since the first bonds were issued for the prosecution of the late war. In his report of 1866 the Secretary estimated the amount of United States securities of different kinds, including railroad and other stock, held in Europe at $600,000,000. He soon after became satisfied that this estimate was too low by from one hundred to one hundred and fifty millions. It would be safe to put the amount so held at the present time, exclusive of stocks, at $850,000,000, of which not less than $600,000,000 are United States bonds, nearly all of which have left the United States within the last six years. The amount is formidable; and little satisfaction is derived from the consideration that these securities have been transferred in payment of interest and for foreign commodities; and just as little from the consideration that probably not over $500,000,000 in gold values have been received for these $850,000,000 of debt. In this estimate of our foreign indebtedness railroads and other stocks are not included, as they are not a debt, but the evidence merely of the ownership of property in the United States. Fortunately, for some years past individual credits have been curtailed, and our foreign and domestic trade in this particular has not been unsatisfactory. In addition, then, to the stocks referred to and the individual indebtedness, of the amount of which no accurate estimate can be made, Europe holds not less than $850,000,000 of American securities, on nearly all of which interest, and on the greater part of which interest in gold, is being paid. Nor, under the present revenue systems, and with a depreciated paper currency, is the increase of our foreign debt likely to be stayed. With an abundant harvest, and a large surplus of agricultural products of all descriptions, United States bonds are still creating, to no small extent, the exchange with which our foreign balances are being adjusted. We are even now increasing our debt to Europe at the rate of sixty or seventy million dollars per annum in the form of gold-bearing bonds.

The gold and silver product of California and the Territories since 1848 has been upwards of $1,300,000,000. Allowing that $100,000,000 have been used in manufactures, and that the coin in the country has been increased to an equal amount, the balance of this immense sum—$1,100,000,000—has gone to other countries in exchange for their productions. Within a period of twenty years, in addition to our agricultural products, and to our manufactures, which have been exported in large quantities, we have parted with $1,100,000,000 of the precious metals; and are, nevertheless, confronted with a foreign debt of some eight hundred and fifty millions, which is steadily increasing; and all this has occurred under tariffs in a good degree framed with the view of protecting American against foreign manufacturers. But this is not all. During the recent war most of our vessels engaged in the foreign trade were either destroyed by rebel cruisers or transferred to foreigners. Our exports as well as our imports are now chiefly in foreign bottoms. The carrying trade between the United States and Europe is almost literally in the hands of Europeans. Were it not for the remnant of ships still employed in the China trade, and the stand we are making by the establishment of a line of steamers on the Pacific, the coastwise trade, which is retained by the exclusion of foreign competition, would seem to be about all that can, under existing legislation, be relied upon for the employment of American shipping.

There are many intelligent persons who entertain the opinion that the country has been benefited by the transfer of our bonds to Europe, on the ground that capital has been received in exchange for them, which has been profitably employed in the development of our national resources, and that it matters little whether the interest upon the debt is received by our own people or by the people of other countries. This opinion is the result of misapprehension of facts, and is unsound in principle. It is not to a large extent true that capital, which is being used in developing the national resources, has been received in exchange for the bonds which are held in Europe. While many articles, such as railroad iron, machinery, and raw materials used in manufacturing—the value of which to the country is acknowledged—have been so received, a large proportion of the receipts have been of a different description. Our bonds have been largely paid for in articles for which no nation can afford to run in debt, for articles which have neither stimulated industry nor increased the productive power of the country, which have in fact added nothing to the national wealth. A reference to the custom house entries will substantiate the correctness of these statements. Two thirds of the importations of the United States consist of articles which, in economical times, would be pronounced luxuries. The war and a redundant currency have brought about unexampled extravagance, which can only be satisfied by the most costly products of foreign countries. No exception could be taken to such importations if they were paid for in our own productions. This, unfortunately, is not the fact. They are annually swelling our foreign debt without increasing our ability to pay it. How disastrous such a course of trade, if long continued, must be, it requires no spirit of prophecy to predict.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

HO. OF REPS.

Nor is it an unimportant matter that the interest upon a large portion of our securities is received by citizens of other countries instead of our own. If the interest upon a public debt is paid out where the taxes to provide for it are collected, the debt, although a burden upon the mass of tax-payers who are not holders of securities, may be so managed as not to be a severe burden upon the nation. The money which goes into the Treasury by means of taxes will flow out again into the same community in the payment of interest; and were it not for the expenses attending it, the process would not, in a purely economical view, be an exhausting one. If the bonds of the United States were equally distributed among the people of the different States there would be less complaint of the debt than is now heard. Anti-tax parties will attain strength only in those States in which few bonds are held. If the people of the West are more sensible of the burdens of Federal taxation than are those of the eastern States it is because they are not holders to the same extent of national securities. This inequality cannot of course be prevented by legal or artificial processes. The securities will be most largely held where capital is the most abundant; and they will be more equally distributed among the respective States—if not among the people—as the new States approach the older ones in wealth.

These manifest truths indicate how important it is that the debt of the United States should be a home debt; so that the money which is collected for taxes may be paid to our own people in the way of interest. In fact, a large national debt to be tolerable must of necessity be a home debt. A nation that owes heavily must have its own people for creditors. If it does not, the debt will be a dead weight upon its industry, and will be quite likely to force it eventually into bankruptcy. The United States are not only able to pay the interest on their debt, but to set a good example to other nations by steadily and rapidly reducing that debt. What is now required, as has been already intimated, are measures which will tend not only to prevent further exportation of our bonds, and in the regular course of trade to bring back to the country those that have been exported, but which will also tend to restore those important interests that are now languishing, as the result of the war and adverse legislation. The first and most important of these measures are those which shall bring about, without unnecessary delay, the restoration of the specie standard. The financial difficulties under which the country is laboring may be traced directly to the issue, and continuance in circulation of irredeemable promises as lawful money. The country will not be really and reliably prosperous until there is a return to specie payments. The question of a solvent, convertible currency, underlies all other financial and economical questions. It is, in fact, a fundamental question; and until it is settled, and settled in accordance with the teachings of experience, all attempts at other financial and economical reforms will either fail absolutely or be but partially successful. A sound currency is the life-blood of a commercial nation. If this is debased the whole current of its commercial life must be disordered and irregular. The starting point in reformatory legislation must be here. Our debased currency must be retired or raised to the par of specie, or cease to be lawful money, before substantial progress can be made with other reforms.

Next in importance to the subject of the currency is that of the revenues. Taxes are indispensable for the support of the Government, for the maintenance of the public credit, and the payment of the public debt. To tax heavily, not only without impoverishing the people, but without checking enterprise or putting shackles upon industry, requires the most careful study, not only of the resources of the country and its relations with other nations, but also of the character of the people as affected by the nature of their institutions. While much may be learned by the study of the revenue systems of European nations, which have been perfected by years of experience and the employment of the highest talent, it must be obvious that these systems must undergo very considerable modifications before they will be fitted to the political and physical condition of the United States. In a popular Government like ours, where the people virtually assess the taxes as well as pay them, the popular will, if not the popular prejudice, must be listened to in the preparation of revenue laws. Justice must, in some instances, yield to expediency; and some legitimate sources of revenue may be unavailable because a resort to them might be odious to a majority of tax-payers. The people of the United States are enterprising and self-reliant. Most of them are the "architects of their own fortunes;" few the inheritors of wealth. Engaged in various enterprises, with constantly varying results, and in sharp competition with each other, they submit reluctantly to inquisitions of tax-gatherers, which might not be obnoxious to people less independent and living under less liberal institutions. Then, too, the United States are a new country, of large extent and diversified interests; with great natural resources, in the early process of development. Not only may systems of revenue which are suited to England or Germany or France be unsuited to this country, but careful and judicious observation and study are indispensable to the preparation of tax bills suited to the peculiar interests of its different sections. It was with a view of supplying Congress with such information as was needed to secure the passage of equal and wise excise and tariff laws, which would yield the largest revenue with the least oppression and inconvenience to the people, that a revenue commission was created in 1865. The creation of this commission was the first practical movement toward a careful examination of the business and resources of the country, with a view to the adoption of a judicious revenue system. The reports of this commission were interesting and valuable, and they exhibited so clearly the necessity for further and more complete investigations that by the act of July 13, 1866, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to appoint an officer in his Department, to be styled the Special Commissioner of Revenue, whose duty it should be "to inquire into all the sources of national revenue, and the best method of collecting the revenue; the relation of foreign trade to domestic industry; the mutual adjustment of the systems of taxation by customs and excise, with a view of insuring the requisite revenue with the least disturbance or inconvenience to the progress of industry, and the development of the resources of the country," &c. Under this act Mr. David A. Wells was appointed Special Commissioner of the Revenue. With what energy and ability he has undertaken the very difficult duties devolved upon him has been manifested by the reports which he has already submitted to Congress. That which accompanies or will soon follow this communication will prove, more fully than those which have preceded it have done, the importance of the investigations in which he is engaged and the judicious labor which he is bestowing upon them. The facts which he presents and the recommendations based upon them are entitled to the most careful consideration of Congress. These reports of the Commissioner are so complete that they relieve the Secretary from discussing elaborately the questions of which they treat. His remarks, therefore, upon the internal revenues and the tariff will be general and brief.

The following is a statement of receipts from internal revenues for the last three fiscal years:

For the year ending June 30, 1866.....	$309,226,813 42
For the year ending June 30, 1867.....	295,027,537 43
For the year ending June 30, 1868.....	191,087,589 41

It thus appears that the internal revenue receipts for the year ending June 30, 1867, fell below the receipts for the year ending June 30, 1866, $43,199,275 99, and that the receipts for the year ending June 30, 1868, fell short of the receipts for 1867, $74,939,948 02. The receipts for the first four months of the present fiscal year were $48,736,848 33. If the receipts for these months are an index of those for the remaining eight, the receipts for the present fiscal year will be $146,209,044.

This large reduction of internal revenue receipts is attributable both to inefficient collections, and to a reduction of taxes. It is quite obvious that the receipts from customs cannot be maintained without an increase of exports or of our foreign debt. If the receipts from customs should be diminished, even with a large reduction of the expenses of the Government, our internal revenues must necessarily be increased. The first thing to be done is to introduce economy into all branches of the public service, not by reduced appropriations to be made good by "deficiency bills," but by putting a stop to all unnecessary demands upon the Treasury. There is no department of the Government which is conducted with proper economy. The habits formed during the war are still strong, and will only yield to the requirements of inexorable law. The average expenses of the next ten years for the civil service ought not to exceed $40,000,000 per annum. Those of the War Department, after the bounties are paid, should be brought down to $35,000,000, and those of the Navy to $20,000,000. The outlays for pensions and Indians cannot for some years be considerably reduced, but they can doubtless be brought within $30,000,000. The interest on the public debt when the whole debt shall be funded, at an average rate of interest of five per cent., will amount to $125,000,000 which will be reduced with the annual reduction of the principal.

When the internal revenue and tariff laws shall be revised so as to be made to harmonize with each other, it is supposed that $300,000,000 can annually be realized from these sources without burdensome taxation. How much shall be raised from each can be determined when the whole subject of revenue shall be thoroughly investigated by Congress, with the light shed upon it by Commissioner Wells in his exhaustive report of the present year. The Secretary does not doubt, however, that the best interests of the country will be subserved by a reduction of the tariff and an increase of excise duties.

According to this estimate the account would stand as follows:

Receipts from customs and internal revenues.....	$300,000,000
Expenditures for the civil service.....	$40,000,000
Expenditures for the War Department.....	35,000,000
Expenditures for the Navy Department.....	20,000,000
Expenditures for pensions and Indians.....	30,000,000
Expenditures for interest on the public debt.....	125,000,000
Total.....	$250,000,000

Leaving as an excess of receipts $50,000,000 to be applied to the payment of the principal of the debt. If the growth of the country should make an increase of expenditures necessary, this increase will, by the same cause, be provided for by increased receipts under the same rate of taxation; and as it is to be hoped that the regular increase of the revenues, without an increase of taxation, resulting from the advance of the country in wealth and population, will be greater than the necessary increase of expenses, there will be a constantly increasing amount in addition to that arising from a decrease of interest to be annually applied to the payment of the debt. If large additional expenditures should be unavoidable they should at once be provided for by additional taxes. What is required, then, at the present time, is a positive limitation of the annual outlays to $300,000,000, including $50,000,000 to be applied to the payment of the principal of the debt, and such modifications of the revenue laws as will secure this amount, without unwise restrictions upon commerce, and with the least possible oppression and inconvenience to the tax payers. In the foregoing estimates of resources miscellaneous receipts and receipts from sales of public lands are omitted. The miscellaneous receipts heretofore have been derived from sales of gold and of property purchased by the War and Navy Departments during the war and no longer needed. On a return to specie payments there will be no premiums on coin, very little Government property will hereafter be sold, and under the homestead law and with liberal donations of the public domain, which are likely to be made as heretofore, no considerable amount can be expected from lands. Whatever may be received from these sources will doubtless be covered by miscellaneous expenses, of which no estimate can be made.

HO. OF REPS.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

The act of March 31, 1868, exempting from taxes nearly all the manufactures of the country other than distilled spirits, fermented liquors, and tobacco, was sudden and unexpected. It not only deprived the Treasury of an immense revenue, but the reduction was so great as to leave an impression on the public mind that it would be only temporary, and that a tax in some degree equivalent to that which was removed would of necessity soon be resorted to. It is, perhaps, for this reason that this measure has failed to give relief to the public by a diminution of prices, and has benefited manufacturers rather than consumers. The frequent and important changes which have been made in the internal revenue laws, the ease with which exemptions from taxation have been obtained, and the suddenness with which taxes have been greatly augmented or reduced, have constituted one of the greatest evils of the system. Sudden changes in the revenue laws are not only destructive of all business calculations, but they excite—not unreasonably—a feeling of discontent and a sense of injustice among the people, most unfavorable to an efficient collection of taxes. While it is admitted that in a new and growing country like ours modifications of the taxes will be frequently necessary, some definite policy should at once be inaugurated in regard to our internal revenues, the general principles of which should be regarded as finally established.

Assuming that the receipts from customs will be reduced by a reduction of duties or by the effects of a return to specie payments upon importations under the present tariff, and that, consequently, there must be an increase of internal taxes, there are three sources of revenue which are likely to be considered.

First. An increase of taxes upon distilled spirits.

The idea of deriving the bulk of the revenue from this article is a very popular one; and even our unfortunate experience has only partially convinced the public of its impossibility. The late exorbitant tax on distilled spirits, intended, perhaps, not merely as a revenue measure, but as an encouragement to temperance, proved to be the most demoralizing tax ever imposed by Congress, corrupting both the manufacturers and the revenue officers, and familiarizing the people with stupendous violations of the law. The restoration of it, or any considerable increase of the present tax, would lead to a repetition of the frauds which have brought the internal revenue system into such utter disgrace.

Second. A restoration of the tax on manufactures abolished in March last.

The objections to the restoration of this tax are, that it would indicate vacillation on the part of Congress, and that this tax, principally on account of numerous exemptions, was partial and unjust. It is also apparent that, if restored, it would fail to be permanent by reason of the persistent and united hostility of a class of citizens influential and powerful, and whose influence and power are rapidly increasing.

Third. An increased and uniform tax on sales; and this the Secretary respectfully recommends.

Under the present law wholesale and retail dealers in goods, wares, and merchandise of foreign or domestic production, wholesale and retail dealers in liquors, and dealers in tobacco are subject to a similar but unequal tax upon sales. This inequality should be removed, and a tax levied upon all sales sufficient, with the revenues from other sources, to meet the wants of the Government. The reasons in favor of a tax upon sales are that it could be levied generally throughout the country, and would not be liable to the imputation of class legislation; that it would be so equally distributed as not to bear so oppressively as other taxes upon individuals or sections; and that no depression of one branch of industry which did not injuriously affect the business of the entire country could greatly lessen its productiveness.

As has been already stated, the receipts from customs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, were $179,046,651 58; for the year ending June 30, 1867, $176,417,810 88; and for the last fiscal year, $164,464,599 56. These figures show that the tariff has produced large revenues, although it is in no just sense a revenue tariff. In this respect it has exceeded the expectations of its friends, if, indeed, it has not disappointed them. It has not checked importations, and complaint is made that it has not given the anticipated protection to home manufactures, not because it was not skillfully framed to this end, but because an inflated currency—the effect of which upon importations was not fully comprehended—has, in a measure, defeated its object. It has advanced the prices of dutiable articles, and, by adding to the cost of living, has been oppressive to consumers without being of decided benefit to those industries in whose interest it is regarded as having been prepared. In his last report the Secretary recommended the extension of specific duties, but did not recommend a complete revision of the tariff, on the ground that this work could not be intelligently done as long as business was subject to constant derangement by an irredeemable currency. The same difficulty still exists, but as decided action upon the subject of the currency ought not to be longer postponed the present may not be an unfavorable time for a thorough examination of the tariff. It is obvious that a revision of it is required, not only to relieve it of incongruities and obscurity, and to harmonize it with excise taxes and with our agricultural and commercial interests, but also to adapt it to the very decided change which must take place in the business of the country upon the restoration of the specie standard. Large revenues are now derived from customs, because a redundant currency produces extravagance, which stimulates importations. If the currency were convertible, and business were regular and healthy, the tariff would be severely protective, if not in many instances prohibitory. Indeed, of some valuable articles it is prohibitory already.

There will be in the future, as there have been in the past, widely different opinions upon this long vexed and very important subject, but the indications are decided that the more enlightened sentiment of the country demands that the tariff shall hereafter be a tariff for revenue and not for protection, and that the revenues to be derived from it shall be no larger than, in connection with those received from other sources, will be required for the economical administration of the Government, the maintenance of the public faith, and the gradual extinguishment of the public debt. While the country is not at present, and may not be for many years to come, prepared for the abrogation of all restrictions upon foreign commerce, it is unquestionably prepared for a revenue tariff. The public debt is an incumbrance upon the property of the nation, and the taxes, the necessity for which it creates, by whatever mode and from whatever sources collected, are at last a charge upon the consumers. Taxes should not, therefore, be increased, nor will the tax-payers permit them to be permanently increased; for the benefit of any interest or section. Fortunately, or unfortunately, as the question may be regarded from different standpoints, the necessities of the Government will be such for many years that large revenues must be derived from customs, so that a strictly revenue tariff must incidentally benefit our home manufactures. According to the estimate made by the Secretary, an annual revenue of $300,000,000 will be required to meet the necessary demands upon the Treasury, and for a satisfactory reduction of the public debt. How much of this amount shall be derived from customs it will be for Congress to determine.

In examining this difficult question, the magnitude of our foreign debt, and the necessity not only of preventing its increase but of rapidly reducing it, must be kept steadily in view. It may be necessary that a large portion of our bonds now held in Europe be taken up with bonds bearing a lower rate of interest, payable in some European city, in order that they may be less likely to be returned to the United States at unpropitious times. Whether this is accomplished or not, it is of the last importance that our tax laws, and especially the tariff, should be so framed as to encourage exports and enlarge our commerce with foreign nations, so that balances may be in our favor, and the interest, and in due time the principal, of our foreign debt may be paid by our surplus productions. Many of the investigations of the Revenue Commissioner have been made with the view of furnishing Congress with the data necessary for a thorough examination and a wise determination of this most important question, and it is fortunate that the subsidence of political excitement removes many of the difficulties heretofore in the way of an impartial consideration of it.

The public debt on the 1st day of November, 1867, amounted to $2,491,504,450, and consisted of the following items:

Debt bearing coin interest.....	$1,778,110,991 80
Debt bearing currency interest.....	428,768,640 00
Matured debt not presented for payment.....	18,237,538 83
Debt bearing no interest.....	402,385,677 39

Total.....2,625,502,848 02
Cash in the Treasury.....133,998,398 02

Amount of debt less cash in the Treasury.....$2,491,504,450 00

On the 1st day of November, 1868, it amounted to $2,527,129,552 82, and consisted of the following items:

Debt bearing coin interest.....	$2,107,577,950 00
Debt bearing currency interest.....	114,519,000 00
Matured debt not presented for payment.....	9,753,723 64
Debt bearing no interest.....	409,151,893 92

Total.....2,641,002,572 06
Cash in the Treasury.....113,873,019 24

Amount of debt less cash in the Treasury.....$2,527,129,552 82

By a comparison of these statements it appears that the debt, between the 1st day of November, 1867, and the 1st day of November,

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

HO. OF REPS.

1868, increased $35,625,102 82. Of this increase $24,152,000 is chargeable to the Pacific railroads, and $7,200,000 to the purchase of Russian America. Within the same period there was paid for bounties $44,000,515, and at least $4,000,000 for interest on compound and seven three-tenth notes, which had accrued prior to the 1st of November, 1867. If these extraordinary advances and payments had not been made the receipts would have exceeded the expenditures $43,787,412 18. Considering the heavy reduction of internal taxes, made at the last session of Congress, and the large expenditures which have attended the military operations against the Indians on the frontier, and the maintenance of large forces at expensive points in the southern States, this statement of the amount of the debt cannot be regarded an unsatisfactory one. The bounties will, it is expected, be entirely paid within the next three months, and very little interest, except that which accrues upon the funded debt, is hereafter to be provided for. Should there be henceforth no extraordinary expenditures, and no further donations of public moneys in the form of bounties or of additional subsidies to railroad companies, with proper economy in the administration of the General Government, and with judicious amendments of the revenue laws and proper enforcement thereof, the public debt, without oppressive taxation, can be rapidly diminished and easily extinguished within the period heretofore named by the Secretary.

The ability of the United States to maintain their integrity against insurrection as well as against a foreign enemy can no longer be doubted. The question of their ability, under democratic institutions, to sustain a large national debt, is still to be decided. That this question should be affirmatively settled, it is, in the opinion of the Secretary, of the highest importance that the tax-paying voters should be encouraged by the fact that the debt is in the progress of rapid extinguishment and is not to be a permanent burden upon them and their posterity. If it be understood that this debt is to be a perpetual incumbrance upon the property and industry of the nation, it is certainly to be feared that the collection of taxes necessary to pay the interest upon it may require the exercise of power by the central Government inconsistent with republicanism and dangerous to the liberties of the people. The debt must be paid. Direct repudiation is an impossibility; indirect repudiation, by further issues of legal-tender notes, would be madness. To insure its payment without a change in the essential character of the Government every year should witness a reduction of its amount and a diminution of its burdens. The Secretary is confident that he expressed the sentiments of the intelligent tax-payers of the country when he said in his report of 1865:

"The debt is large, but if kept at home, as it is desirable it should be, with a judicious system of taxation, it need not be oppressive. It is, however, a debt. While it is capital to the holders of these securities, it is still a national debt, and an incumbrance upon the national estate. Neither its advantages nor its burdens are or can be shared or borne equally by the people. Its influences are anti-republican. It adds to the power of the Executive by increasing Federal patronage; it must be distasteful to the people, because it fills the country with informers and tax-gatherers. It is dangerous to the public virtue, because it involves the collection and disbursement of vast sums of money, and renders rigid national economy almost impracticable. It is, in a word, a national burden, and the work of removing it, no matter how desirable it may be for individual investment, should not long be postponed.

"As all true men desire to leave to their heirs unincumbered estates, so should it be the ambition of the people of the United States to relieve their descendants of this national mortgage. We need not be anxious that future generations shall share the burden with us. Wars are not at an end, and posterity will have enough to do to take care of the debts of their own creation.

"The Secretary respectfully suggests that on this subject the expression of Congress should be decided and emphatic. It is of the greatest importance in the management of a matter of so surpassing interest that the right start should be made. Nothing but revenue will sustain the national credit, and nothing less than a fixed policy for the reduction of the public debt will be likely to prevent its increase."

And in his report of 1867, when he remarked:

"Old debts are hard debts to pay; the longer they are continued the more odious they become. If the present generation should throw the burden of this debt upon the next, it will be quite likely to be handed down from one generation to another, a perpetual if not a constantly increasing burden upon the people. Our country is full of enterprise and resources. The debt will be lightened every year with great rapidity by the increase of wealth and population. With a proper reduction in the expenses of the Government, and with a revenue system adapted to the industry of the country, and not oppressing it, the debt may be paid before the expiration of the present century. The wisdom of a policy which shall bring about such a result is vindicated, in advance, by the history of nations whose people are burdened with inherited debts, and with no prospect of relief for themselves or their posterity."

In his last report the Secretary referred to the condition of the Treasury at the close of the war and at some subsequent periods, alluding especially to the emergency in the spring of 1865, arising from the very large requisitions which were waiting for payment, and the still larger requisitions that were to be provided for, to enable the War Department to pay arrearages due to the Army, and other expenses which had already been incurred in the suppression of the rebellion. In briefly reviewing the administration of the Treasury from April, 1865, he did not think it necessary to state how much of the large revenue receipts had been expended in the payment of debts incurred during the war; and he would not undertake to do it now did not misapprehension exist in the public mind in regard to the expenditures of the Government since the conclusion of hostilities, prejudicial to both the law-making and the law-executing branches of the Government.

The war was virtually closed in April, 1865. On the first day of that month the public debt amounted, according to the books and accounts of the Department, to $2,866,955,077 34. On the 1st day of September following it amounted to $2,757,689,571 43, having increased in four months $390,734,494 09. From that period it continued to decline until November 1, 1867, when it had fallen to $2,491,504,450. On the 1st day of November last it had risen to $2,527,129,552 82. By this statement it appears that between the 1st day of April, 1865, and the 1st day of September of the same year, the debt increased $390,734,494 09, and that between the 1st day of September, 1865, and the 1st day of November, 1868, it decreased $230,560,018 61; and that on the last day mentioned it was $160,174,475 48 larger than it was on the 1st day of April, 1865. Since then the Treasurer's receipts from all sources of revenue have been as follows:

For April, May, and June, 1865.....	$93,519,164 13
For the year ending June 30, 1866.....	553,032,620 06
For the year ending June 30, 1867.....	490,634,010 27
For the year ending June 30, 1868.....	405,633,083 32
June 30 to November 1, 1868.....	124,652,184 42
Total of receipts.....	1,662,476,062 20
To which should be added the increase of the debt between the 1st day of April, 1865, and the 1st day of November, 1868.....	160,174,475 48
	$1,822,650,537 68

This exhibit shows that the large sum of $1,822,650,537 68 was expended in the payment of the interest and of other demands upon the Treasury in three years and seven months, being an annual average expenditure of $508,646,661 68.

If the statement of the public debt on the 1st day of April, 1865, had included all debts due at that time, and $1,822,650,537 68 had really been expended in payment of the interest on the public debt, and the current expenses of the Government between that day and the 1st day of November last, there would have been a profligacy and a recklessness in the expenditures of the public moneys discreditable to the Government and disheartening to tax-payers. Fortunately this is not the fact. That statement—as is true of all other monthly statements of the Treasury—exhibited only the adjusted debt, according to the books of the Treasury, and did not, and could not, include the large sums due to the soldiers of the great Union Army—numbering at that time little less than a million men—for "pay" and for "bounties," or on claims of various kinds which must of necessity have been unsettled. For the purpose of putting this matter right the Secretary has endeavored to ascertain from the War and Navy Departments how much of their respective disbursements, since the close of the war, has been in payment of debts properly chargeable to the expenses of the war: The following is the result of his inquiries:

By the War Department.....	$595,431,125 90
By the Navy Department.....	85,000,000 00

It has been impossible to obtain an exact statement of the amount of such debts paid by the Navy Department, but sufficient information has been received to justify the Secretary in estimating it in round numbers at $85,000,000, which is probably an under rather than over estimate. The expenditures of the War Department have been furnished in detail, and are believed to be substantially correct.

These figures show that the money expended by the War and Navy Departments, between the 1st day of April, 1865, and the 1st day of November, 1868, on

Claims justly chargeable to the expenses of the war, amounted to.....	$630,431,125 90
To which should be added amount advanced to the Pacific roads.....	42,194,000 09
Amount paid for Alaska.....	7,200,000 00
	$679,825,125 90

Deducting this sum from the amount of the revenues, $1,662,476,062 20, and $160,174,475 48, the increase of the public debt, the remainder, $1,142,825,411 78, or an average of $318,928,021 89 per annum, is the amount actually expended in the payment of current expenses and interest.

It is thus shown that within a period of three years and seven months the revenues, or the receipts from all sources of revenue, reach the enormous sum of $1,662,496,062 20, and that $630,431,125 90 were paid on debts which were actually due at the close of the war, and for bounties which, like the pay of the Army, were a part of the expenses of the war. Adding the amount thus paid to the debt, as exhibited by the books of the Treasury on the 1st day of April, 1865, it appears that the debt of the United States at that time was $2,997,386,203 24, and that the actual reduction has been $470,256,650 42; and but for the advances to the Pacific roads, and the amount paid for Alaska, would have been $519,650,650 42.

Nothing can better exhibit the greatness of the resources of this young nation than this statement, or show more clearly its ability to make "short work" of the extinguishment of the public debt. It will be borne in mind that these immense revenues have been collected while one third part of the country was in a state of great destitution, resulting from its terrible struggle to separate itself from the Union, with its political condition unsettled and its industry in a great degree paralyzed; and while also the other two thirds were slowly recovering from the drain upon their productive labor and resources, a necessary accompaniment of a gigantic and protracted war.

The Secretary has noticed with deep regret indications of a growing sentiment in Congress—notwithstanding the favorable exhibits which have been from time to time made of the debt-paying power of the country—in favor of a postponement of the payment of any part of the principal of the debt, until the national resources shall be so increased as to make the payment of it more easy. If this sentiment shall so prevail as to give direction to the action of the Government, he would feel that a very great error had been committed, which could hardly fail to be a severe misfortune to the country. The people of the United States will never be so willing to be taxed for the purpose of reducing the debt as at the present time. Now the necessity for its creation is better understood and appreciated than it can be at a future day. Now it is regarded by a large majority of tax-payers as a part of the great price paid for the maintenance of the Government, and therefore a sacred debt. The longer the reduction of it is postponed the greater will be the difficulties in the way of accomplishing it, and the more intolerable will seem to be the burden of taxation. The Secretary, therefore, renews the recommendations made in his first report, that a certain definite sum be annually applied to the payment of the interest and the principal of the debt. The amount suggested was $200,000,000. As the debt is considerably smaller than its maximum was estimated at, the amount to be so applied annually might now safely be fixed at $175,000,000, according to the estimate already made in this report.

The subject of the currency in which the five-twenty bonds may be paid—agitated for some time past—was freely discussed during the recent political canvass, and made a question upon which parties, to some extent, were divided. The premature and unfortunate agitation and discussion of this question have been damaging to the credit of the Government, both at home and abroad, by exciting apprehensions that the good faith of the nation might not be maintained, and have thus prevented our bonds from advancing in price, as they otherwise would have advanced, after it was perceived that the maximum of the debt had been reached, and have rendered funding at a low rate of interest too unpromising to be undertaken. In his report in 1865 the Secretary used the following language:

"Before concluding his remarks upon the national debt, the Secretary would suggest that the credit of the five-twenty bonds, issued under the acts of February 25, 1862, and June 30, 1864, would be improved in Europe, and, consequently, their market value advanced at home, if Congress should declare that the principal as well as the interest of these bonds is to be paid in coin. The policy of the Government in regard to its funded debt is well understood in the United States, but the absence of a provision in these acts that the principal of the bonds issued under them should be paid in coin, while such a provision is contained in the act under which the ten-forties were issued, has created some apprehension in Europe that the five-twenty bonds might be called in at the expiration of five years, and paid in United States notes. Although it is not desirable that our securities should be held out of the United States, it is desirable that they should be of good credit in foreign markets on account of the influence which these markets exert upon our own. It is, therefore, important that all misapprehensions on these points should be removed by an explicit declaration of Congress that these bonds are to be paid in coin."

Without intending to criticise the inaction of Congress in regard to a matter of so great importance, the Secretary does not hesitate to say that if his recommendations had been adopted the public debt would have been much less than it is; and that the reduction of the rate of interest would ere this have been in rapid progress. The Secretary does not think it necessary to discuss the question in this report. His opinions upon it are well known to Congress and the people. They were definitely presented in his report for 1867, and they remain unchanged. He begs leave merely to suggest, as he has substantially done before, that alleviation of the burden of the public debt is to be obtained not in a decial of the national credit, not in threats of repudiation, not in a further issue of irredeemable notes, not in arguments addressed to the fears of the bondholders, but in a clear and explicit declaration by Congress that the national faith, in letter and spirit, shall be inviolably maintained; that the bonds of the United States, intended to be negotiated abroad as well as at home, are to be paid, when the time of payment arrives, in that currency which is alone recognized as money in the dealings of nation with nation. Let Congress say this promptly, and there can be but little doubt that the credit of the Government will so advance that within the next two years the interest on the larger portion of the debt can be reduced to a satisfactory rate. He therefore earnestly recommends that it be declared without delay, by joint resolution, that the principal of all bonds of the United States is to be paid in coin.

It is also recommended that the Secretary be authorized to issue $500,000,000 of bonds, $50,000,000 of which shall mature annually; the first $50,000,000 to be payable, principal and interest, in lawful money—the principal and interest of the rest in coin; and also such further amount of bonds as may be necessary to take up the outstanding six per cents. and the non-interest bearing debt, payable in coin thirty years after date, and redeemable at any time after ten years at the pleasure of the Government—the interest to be paid semi-annually in coin, and in no case to exceed the rate of five per cent.; provided that the Secretary may, in his discretion, make the principal and interest of $500,000,000 of these bonds payable at such city or cities in Europe as he may deem best.

The fact that, according to the recommendation, $50,000,000 of the bonds to be issued are to become due each year for ten consecutive years (at the expiration of which time all of the bonds would be under the control of the Government) would insure an annual reduction of $50,000,000 of the public debt, and impart a credit to the other bonds which would insure the negotiation of them on favorable terms.

Of the expediency of an issue of bonds corresponding to some extent in amount with those held in Europe, the interest and principal of which shall be paid in the countries where they are to be negotiated, there can be but little doubt. On this point the Secretary used the following language in his report of 1866:

"The question now to be considered is not how shall our bonds be prevented from going abroad—for a large amount has already gone, and others will follow as long as our credit is good and we continue to buy more than we can pay for in any other way—but how shall they be prevented from being thrown upon the homemarket to thwart our efforts in restoring the specie standard? The Secretary sees no practicable method of doing this at an early day, but by substituting for them bonds which, being payable principal and interest in Europe, will be less likely to be returned when their return is the least to be desired. The holders of our securities in Europe are now subject to great inconvenience and not a little expense in collecting their coupons; and it is supposed that five per cent., or perhaps four and a half per cent. bonds, payable in London or Frankfurt, could be substituted for our six per cents. without any other expense to the United States than the trifling commissions to the agents through whom the exchanges might be made. The saving of interest to be thus effected would be no inconsiderable item; and the advantages of having our bonds in Europe placed in the hands of actual investors is too important to be disregarded."

The Secretary has nothing further to say on this point than that careful reflection has only strengthened his convictions of the correctness of the views expressed in the foregoing extract.

In recommending the issue of bonds bearing a lower rate of interest, to be exchanged for the outstanding six per cents., the Secretary must not be understood as having changed his opinion in regard to the expediency or the wisdom of the recommendation in his last report:

"That the act of March 3, 1865, be so amended as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue six per cent. gold-bearing bonds, to be known as the consolidated debt of the United States, having twenty years to run, and redeemable, if it may be thought advisable, at an earlier day, to be exchanged at par for any and all other obligations of the Government, one sixth part of the interest on which, in lieu of all other taxes, at each semi-annual payment, shall be reserved by the Government, and paid over to the States according to population."

He refers to what he then said in advocacy of that recommendation as an expression of his well-considered opinions at the present time, and he is only prevented from repeating the recommendation by the fact that it met with little approval at the last session, and has not grown into favor since. He sincerely hopes that the future history of the debt will vindicate the wisdom of those who are unable to approve the proposition.

Expenditures..... $231,000,000

The receipts and expenditures under existing laws for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, are estimated as follows:

From customs.....	$160,000,000
Internal revenue.....	140,000,000
Lands.....	2,000,000
Miscellaneous sources.....	25,000,000

Receipts..... $327,000,000

The expenditures for the same period, if the expenses of the Army should be kept up to about the present average, will be as follows:

For the civil service.....	$50,000,000
Pensions and Indians.....	30,000,000
War Department.....	75,000,000
Navy Department.....	20,000,000
Interest on public debt.....	128,000,000

Expenditures..... $303,000,000

The accompanying report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue gives the necessary information in regard to the Bureau, and contains many very judicious recommendations and suggestions which are worthy the careful consideration of Congress.

The internal branch of the revenue service is the one in which the people feel the deepest interest. The customs duties are collected at a few points, and although paid eventually by the consumers, they are felt only by the great mass of the people in the increased cost of the articles consumed. Not so with the internal taxes. These are collected in every part of the Union, and their burdens fall, to a large extent, directly upon the tax payers. Assessors, collectors, inspectors, detectives—necessary instruments in the collection of the revenues—are found in every part of the country. There is no village or rural district where their faces are not seen, and where collections are not made. The eyes of the whole people are therefore directed to this system, and it is of the greatest importance that its administration should be such as to entitle it to public respect. Unfortunately this is not the case. Its demoralization is admitted; and the question arises, where is the remedy? The Secretary is of the opinion that it is to be found in such amendments to the act as will equalize the burdens of taxation, and in an elevation of the standard of qualification for revenue officers.

Upon the subject of internal taxes the Secretary has already spoken. In regard to the character of the revenue officers he has only to say that there must be a decided change for the better in this respect if the system is to be rescued from its demoralized condition. After careful reflection the Secretary has come to the conclusion that this change would follow the passage of the bill reported by Mr. JENCKES, from the joint Committee on Retrenchment and Reform, on the 14th of May last, entitled "A bill to regulate the civil service and promote the efficiency thereof." The Secretary gives to this bill his hearty approval, and refers to the speech which was made upon its introduction by the gentleman who reported it, for an able and lucid exposition of its provisions, and for a truthful and graphic description of the evils of the present system of appointments to office.

On the 5th day of October last, the day for their regular quarterly reports, the number of national banks was sixteen hundred and forty-four, seventeen of which were in voluntary liquidation:

Their capital was.....	$420,634,511 00
Their discounts.....	655,875,277 35
Their circulation.....	295,684,244 00
Their deposits.....	601,830,278 40

In no other country was so large a capital ever invested in banking, under a single system, as is now invested in the national banks; never before were the interests of a people so interwoven with a system of banking as are the interests of the people of the United States with their national banking system. It is not strange, therefore, that the condition and management of the national banks should be to them and to their representatives a matter of the deepest concern. That the national banking system is a perfect one is not asserted by its friends; that it is a very decided improvement, as far as circulation is regarded, upon the systems which it has superseded, must be admitted by its opponents. Before it was established the several States, whether in conformity with the Constitution or not, jointly with the General Government during the existence of the charter of the United States Bank, and solely after the expiration of that charter, exercised the power of issuing bills of credit, in the form of bank notes, through institutions of their own creation, and thus controlled the paper money, and thereby, in no small degree, the business and commerce of the country. In May, 1863, when the National Currency Bureau was established in Washington, some fifteen hundred banks, organized under State laws, furnished the people of the United States with a bank-note currency. In some of the States the banks were compelled to protect—partially, at least—the holders of their notes against loss by deposits of securities with the proper authorities. In other States the capital of the banks (that capital being wholly under the control of their managers) was the only security for the redemption of their notes. In some States there was no limit to the amount of notes that might be issued, if secured according to the requirements of their statutes, nor any necessary relation of circulation to capital. In others, while notes could be issued only in certain proportions to capital, there was no restriction upon the number of banks that might be organized. The notes of a few banks, being payable or redeemable at commercial centers, were current in most of the States, while the notes of other banks (perhaps just as solvent) were uncurrent beyond the limits of the States by whose authority they were issued. How valueless were the notes of many of the State banks is still keenly remembered by the thousands who suffered by their insolvency. The direct losses sustained by the people by an unsecured bank-note circulation, and the indirect losses to the country resulting from deranged exchanges, caused by a local currency constantly subject to the manipulations of money changers, and from the utter unsuitableness of such a currency to the circumstances of the country, can be counted by millions. It is only necessary to compare the circulation of the State banks with that furnished by the national banks to vindicate the superiority of the present system. Under the national banking system the Government, which authorizes the issue of bank notes, and compels the people to receive them as money, assumes its just responsibility and guarantees their payment. This is the feature which especially distinguishes it from others and gives to it its greatest value.

The object of the Secretary, however, in referring to the national banks is not to extol them, but to call the attention of Congress to the accompanying instructive report of the Comptroller of the Currency, especially to that part of it which exhibits the condition and management of the banks in the commercial metropolis, and to the amendments proposed by him to the act.

On the 5th day of October last the loans or discounts of the banks in the city of New York amounted to $163,634,070 23, only $90,000,000 of which consisted of commercial paper, the balance being chiefly made up of what are known as loans on call, that is to say, of loans on collaterals, subject to be called in at the pleasure of the banks. Merchants or manufacturers cannot, of course, borrow on such terms, and it is understood that these loans are confined mainly to persons dealing or rather speculating in stocks or coin. This statement shows to what extent the business of the banks in New York has been diverted from legitimate channels, and how deeply involved the banks have become in the uncertain and dangerous speculations of the street.

The deposits of these institutions on the day mentioned amounted to $226,645,655 80, and of their assets $113,332,689 20 consisted of certain cash items which were in fact mainly certified checks, which had been passed to the credit of depositors, and constituted a part of the $226,645,655 80 of deposits, although the banks always deduct such checks from their deposits in making up their statement for the payment of interest and their estimates for reserves. It is understood to be the practice of a number of the banks (perhaps the practice exists to a limited extent in all) to certify the checks of their customers in advance of the deposits out of which they are expected to be paid; in other words, to certify checks to be good, under an agreement between the banks and the drawers that the money to protect them shall be deposited during the day, or at least before the checks, which go through the clearing-house, can be presented for payment. The Secretary has learned with great surprise that a number of banks—generally regarded as being under judicious management—certify in a single day the checks of stock and gold brokers to many times the amount of their capitals, with no money actually on deposit for the protection of the checks at the time of their certification. A more dangerous practice, or one more inconsistent with prudent, not to say honest, banking, cannot be conceived. It is unauthorized by the act, and should be prohibited by severe penalties.

Aside from the risk incurred by this reckless method of banking, the effect of such practices is to foster speculation by creating inflation. It is, in fact, part and parcel of that fictitious credit which is so injurious to the regular business of the city, and to the business of all parts of the country, which feel and are affected by the pulsations of the commercial center. It is this very dangerous practice, combined with the more general practice of making loans "on call," which leads to unsafe extensions of credits, and makes many of the banks in New York helpless when the money market is stringent. Can anything be more discreditable to the banks of the great emporium of the country, or afford more conclusive evidence of their imprudent management, than the fact that with a capital—including their surplus and their undivided profits—of $100,000,000, the withdrawal from circulation often or fifteen millions of legal-tender notes, by combinations for speculative purposes, can create a money stringency, by which not only the stock market is broken down, but the entire business of the city, and to some extent the business of the country, is injuriously affected? If the banks were no more extended than they ought to be, or had proper control over their customers, no such combinations would be likely to be formed, or if formed they would utterly fail of their object.

These remarks do not, of course, apply to all of the banks in New York, for some of them are strictly commercial institutions, and are under the control of men who are distinguished alike for their talents and their conservatism. They are, however, applicable to them as a class, and they undoubtedly apply in some measure to many banks in other cities.

The recommendation of the Comptroller, that all national banks be prohibited by law from certifying checks which are not drawn upon deposits actually existing at the time the checks are certified to be good, is heartily concurred in.

The Secretary has long entertained the opinion that the practice of paying interest on deposits—tending, as it does, to keep the banks constantly extended in their discounts—is injudicious and unsafe. He therefore approves of the recommendation of the Comptroller that national banks be prohibited from paying interest on bank or individual balances.

The Secretary also agrees with the Comptroller in his recommendation that authority be given to him to call upon the banks for reports on days to be fixed by himself. If a reserve is necessary, it should be kept constantly on hand, and the business of the country ought not to be disturbed by the preparation of the banks for the quarterly reports.

The views of the Secretary in regard to the necessity of a central redeeming agency for the national banks have been frequently presented, and it is not necessary for him to repeat them.

There are other suggestions in the Comptroller's report deserving the attention of Congress which the Secretary lacks the time to consider. There is one subject, however, not discussed by the Comptroller, to which the Secretary invites special attention.

Although the national banking system should be relieved from the limitation now imposed upon the aggregate amount of notes that may be issued, this cannot safely be done as long as the suspension of specie payments continues. Nevertheless, measures should at once be adopted to remedy, as far as practicable, the inequality which exists in the distribution of the circulation. As the Government has, by the tax upon the notes of State banks, deprived the States of the power of furnishing facilities to their citizens, it is obviously just that those States which are thus deprived of these facilities, or which do not share equally with other States in the benefits of the national banking system, should be supplied with both banks and notes. There are two modes by which this may be accomplished: one by reducing the circulation of the banks of large capital only, the other by limiting the amount of notes to be furnished to all the banks, say to seventy per cent. of their respective capitals. The latter mode is preferable, as by it no discrimination would be made between the banks, and all would be strengthened by a reduction of their liabilities, and by a release of a part of their means now deposited with the Treasurer, which would be of material service to them in the preparation they must make for a return to specie payments. If a redeeming agency should be established, the reduction of the circulation of the existing banks could be effected as rapidly as new banks can be organized in the western and southern States where they are needed.

The new Territory of Alaska has been the object of much attention during the past year, but its distance and the uncertainty and infrequency of communication with it and our imperfect knowledge of its condition have somewhat embarrassed the Department in organizing therein a satisfactory revenue system.

Under the authority of the act of the last session the Administration, by special agency (which in the absence of the regular machinery was of necessity resorted to,) has been superseded by the appointment of a collector to reside at Sitka, who left for his post in September last, and has probably ere this entered upon the discharge of his duties.

A gentleman from this Department accompanied him to assist in establishing the collection service on a proper foundation, and in perfecting arrangements for the prevention of smuggling.

Recognizing also the vast importance of reliable information on matters not immediately connected with these objects, but having nevertheless a most important bearing upon them more or less direct, another agent, long familiar with that country, was at the same time dispatched with directions to apply himself to the ascertainment of its natural resources, the inducements and probable channels of trade, and the needs of commerce in the way of lights and other aids to navigation. He was also particularly intrusted with a supervision of the fur interests and the enforcement of the law prohibiting the killing of the most valuable fur-bearing animals.

The existence of coal at numerous points has been known for years, and some of the beds were worked by the Russians with indifferent success; none, however, has been hitherto procured on the North American Pacific coast equal to that from the Nanaimo mines, on Vancouver's Island; and this, though raised from a considerable depth, is not of superior quality. The officers of the cutters were therefore instructed to explore the coast as far as practicable for the purpose of ascertaining the supply and the quality of coal in the Territory. A number of localities producing coal were visited, including the abandoned Russian mines, but at none did the outcroppings exhibit any flattering promise except on the coast of Cook's inlet. There, near Fort Kenay, about seven hundred miles from Sitka, were found upon the cliffs numerous parallel veins extending many miles along the shore. Some of the coal taken from them proved to be superior to that from the Nanaimo mines. The indications are that the supply is abundant and the quality fair.

The protection of the fur-bearing animals is a matter of importance hardly to be overrated. In consequence of information received last spring, the captain of the Wayanda was directed to visit, as early in the season as practicable, the islands in Behring's sea, where the fur seal chiefly abounds. On his arrival at St. Paul's and St. George's Islands he found there several large parties engaged in hunting the animals indiscriminately, and in traffic with the natives in ardent spirits and other forbidden articles. Quarrels had arisen, and the natives complained that the reckless and unskillful movements of the new hunters had already driven the animals from some of their usual haunts. The captain of the cutter instituted such measures as he felt authorized to institute for the maintenance of the peace and the protection of the animals from indiscriminate slaughter.

The preservation of these animals, by the observance of strict regulations in hunting them, is not only a matter of the highest importance in an economical view, but a matter of life or death to the natives. Hitherto seals have been hunted under the supervision of the Russian company, and exclusively by the natives, who are trained from children to that occupation, and derive from it their clothing and subsistence. They have been governed by exact and stringent rules as to the time of hunting and the number and kind of seals to be taken. It is recommended that these rules be continued by legal enactment, and that the existing law prohibiting absolutely the killing of the fur seal and sea otter be repealed, as starvation of the people would result from its strict enforcement. The natives (with the exception of the Indians in the southern part of the Territory, who are fierce and warlike) are a gentle, harmless race, easy to govern, but of great enterprise and daring in the pursuit of game, many of them passing annually in their skin canoes from the main land and Aleutian Islands to the islands of St. Paul and St. George, a distance of about one hundred and fifty miles, through a strong sea, and returning with the proceeds of their hunt.

The seals are extremely timid and cautious. They approach their accustomed grounds each year with the greatest circumspection, sending advance parties to reconnoiter, and at once forsaking places where they are alarmed by unusual or unwelcome visitors. They have been in this way driven from point to point, and have taken refuge in these remote islands, whence, if they are now driven, they must resort to the Asiatic coast. There can be no doubt that, without proper regulations for hunting, these valuable animals, and the more valuable but less numerous sea-otters, a very profitable trade will very soon be entirely destroyed.

The United States cannot of course administer such a trade as a Government monopoly, and the only alternative seems to be to grant the exclusive privilege of taking these animals to a responsible company for a series of years, limiting the number of skins to be taken annually by stringent provisions. A royalty or tax might be imposed upon each skin taken, and a revenue be thus secured sufficient to pay a large part of the expenses of the Territory.

Our relations with the Hudson Bay Company, and the regulation of the transit of merchandise between their interior trading posts and the sea-coast, by way of Stikine river, will doubtless require early attention, but at present the Secretary is not sufficiently advised to offer any recommendations upon the subject.

The recent political changes in Spain, and the indications of a more liberal commercial policy on her part, before the revolution took place, add force to the remarks and recommendation of the Secretary in his last report in regard to our commercial relations with that country. He again strongly recommends the repeal of the acts of July 13, 1832, and June 30, 1834, so that Spanish vessels may be subject to our general laws, which are ample to afford protection against unfriendly Spanish legislation, and are free from the innumerable difficulties of administration which exist under these special enactments.

The Secretary asks attention to the necessity of more exact and stringent laws respecting the carriage of passengers, and also of such legislation as shall settle, so far as they can be settled in this manner, some of the vexed questions arising under steamboat laws.

It is necessary merely to repeat, what has been at other times stated, in regard to the insufficiency of the tax fund to meet the necessary expenses of the marine hospitals, notwithstanding the economy which, during the past year, has reduced the expenditures more than twelve thousand dollars. It is impossible to ignore the fact that these hospitals are and must be, unless the rate of the tax is largely increased, a constant drain upon the Treasury.

The revenue-cutter service now comprises twenty-five steamers and seventeen sailing vessels. Of the six steamers on the lakes all but one are at present, agreeably to the views of

HO. OF REPS.

Congress, out of commission, the Sherman alone being in active service.

Five of the steamers on the sea-coast are small tugs, from forty to sixty tons burden, the utility and efficiency of which at the leading ports—as substitutes for the ordinary row-boats on the one hand, and for the light cutters on the other, both in the harbor duties of inspection and police, and in the prevention and detection of smuggling—have been so thoroughly tested by experience that it is thought they should be employed still more extensively than they are now. Upon the lakes in particular they would be of the greatest value, and they should be substituted for the large steamers now there, which should, with one exception, be sold, as they are depreciating in value and are a useless expense. The exception is the S. P. Chase, which is of such dimensions that she might be brought to the sea-coast, where she could be used to advantage. This would probably be preferable to a sale of her where she lies. The schooner Black, being old and not fit for further service, has been sold. The Morris, also, is about to be disposed of for the same reason. The steamer Nemaha, stationed at Norfolk, has been destroyed by accidental fire.

On the Pacific coast are the Wayanda, in Alaska, and the Lincoln, at San Francisco, both in excellent condition; the schooner Reliance, recently ordered to Sitka, is also in good order. The schooner Lane, at Puget sound, is old and unfit for the requirements of that station.

The addition of several thousand miles of sea-coast, by the purchase of Alaska, renders the cutter force in the Pacific inadequate for even the ordinary duties pertaining to the service, without regard to the additional demands upon it for the protection of the fur-bearing animals. The recommendation heretofore made that two first-class steamers be built or purchased for the western coast is therefore renewed. A steam cutter is also needed for Charleston, and one for the coast of Texas.

In his report for the year 1866, the Secretary called the attention of Congress especially to the condition of the shipping interest of the United States. In his report of last year he again referred to it in the following language:

"The shipping interest of the United States, to a great degree prostrated by the war, has not revived during the past year. Our ship-yards are, with rare exceptions, inactive. Our surplus products are being obidly transported to foreign countries in foreign vessels. The Secretary is still forced to admit, in the language of his last report, 'that with unequalled facilities for obtaining the materials, and with acknowledged skill in ship-building, with thousands of miles of sea-coast, indented with the finest harbors in the world, with surplus products that require in their transportation a large and increasing tonnage, we can neither profitably build ships nor successfully compete with English ships in the transportation of our own productions.'

"No change for the better has taken place since that report was made. On the contrary, the indications are that the great ship-building interest of the eastern and middle States has been steadily declining, and that consequently the United States is gradually ceasing to be a great maritime power. A return to specie payments will do much, but will not be sufficient to avert this declension and give activity to our ship-yards. The materials which enter into the construction of vessels should be relieved from taxation by means of drawbacks; or if this may be regarded as impracticable, subsidies might be allowed as an offset to taxation. If subsidies are objectionable, then it is recommended that all restrictions upon the registration of foreign-built vessels be removed, so that the people of the United States, who cannot profitably build vessels, may be permitted to purchase them in the cheapest market. It is certainly unwise to retain upon the statute-books a law restrictive upon commerce when it no longer accomplishes the object for which it was enacted."

What was said by the Secretary in 1866 and 1867 upon this subject is true at the present time; and he therefore feels it to be his duty to repeat his recommendations. The shipping interest was not only prostrated by the war, but its continued depression is attributable to the financial legislation and the high taxes consequent upon the war. The honor and the welfare of the country demand its restoration.

Accompanying this report there is a very accurate and instructive chart, prepared by Mr. Nimmo, jr., a clerk in this Department, which presents, in a condensed form, the progress of ship-building in the United States from 1817 to 1868.

Since the abrogation of the treaty of June 4, 1854, between the United States and Canada, no favorable opportunity for a reconsideration of the commercial relations of the two countries has been presented. Canada has yet to consolidate a political confederation with the other English colonies and possessions on this continent, and until the hostility of Nova Scotia to that measure is removed, and the concurrence of Northwest British America is secured, the authorities at Ottawa are in no situation to make an adequate proposition to the United States, in exchange for the great concession of an exceptional tariff, on our northern frontier, in favor of the leading Canadian staples. On the other hand, until the United States shall have fully matured a satisfactory system of duties, external as well as internal, the Secretary would be indisposed to favor any special arrangement which would remove any material branch of the revenue system from legislative control. Meanwhile a Canadian policy for the enlargement of the Welland and St. Lawrence canals to dimensions adequate to pass vessels of one thousand tons burden from the upper lakes to the Atlantic, will doubtless be regarded as indispensable to any substantial renewal, by treaty or legislation, of the former arrangement. The discussions and experience of the last twelve months are regarded by the Secretary as warranting an authoritative comparison of views between the representatives of Great Britain and Canada and the Government of the United States, and in that event this Department will cheerfully contribute, by all appropriate means, to comprehensive measures which shall assimilate the revenue systems of the respective countries, make their markets mutually available, and for all commercial or social purposes render the frontier as nearly an imaginary line as possible. There certainly seems no just reason why all the communities on the American continent might not imitate the example of the Zollverein of the German States.

The progress of the Coast Survey has been satisfactory and commensurate with the appropriations, as will be seen from the annual report of the Superintendent of that work. During the past year surveys have been in progress in the following localities, named in geographical order, namely: on the coast of Maine, in Penobscot bay and on the islands lying within its entrance; on the shores of St. George's and Medoniak rivers; in Muscougus bay; on the estuaries of Quolog bay, and in the vicinity of Portland; completing all the in-shore work between the Penobscot and Cape Elizabeth; in Massachusetts, between Barnstable and Monomay, completing the survey of Cape Cod; in Rhode Island, on the western part of Narragansett bay; in New York, at Rondout and in the Bay of New York; in New Jersey, on the coast near the head of Barnegat bay; in Maryland and Virginia, on the Potomac river and the southern part of Chesapeake bay; in North Carolina, in Pamlico sound and on its western shore, including Neuse and Bay rivers, and off the coast north of Hatteras; in South Carolina, on the estuaries of Port Royal sound; in Georgia, on St. Catherine's, Doboy, and St. Andrew's sounds; in the Florida straits and in the bay between the keys and main shore of Florida; on the coast between Pensacola and Mobile entrances; at the passes of the Mississippi, and in Galveston, Matagorda and Corpus Christi bays, on the coast of Texas; in California surveying parties have been at work on the coast between Buenaventura and Santa Barbara, at Point Sal, and on the peninsula of San Francisco; in Oregon, on Yaquina bay, Columbia and Uehaleur rivers; in Washington Territory, on Puget straits and in Puget sound.

In the Coast Survey Office forty-eight charts have been entirely or partially engraved during the year, of which nineteen have been published. Regular observations of the tides at seven principal stations have been kept up, and tide tables for all parts of the United States for the ensuing year have been published. A new edition of the Directory or Coast Pilot for the western coast has been prepared, and a preliminary guide for the navigation of the northwestern coast has been compiled.

This brief glance at the operations of the Coast Survey during the past year shows the great scope of that work, which has justly earned a large measure of public favor. Its importance to the commerce and navigation of the country are now well understood, nor can its incidental contributions to science fail to be appreciated by the representatives of the people. The work should be pressed steadily forward, with means sufficient for the most effective working of the existing organization, so that it may embrace, at no distant period, the whole of our extended coast line within its operations, including the principal harbors in our newly-acquired territory of Alaska.

The report of the Light-House Board is, as usual, an interesting one. No bureau of the Treasury Department is conducted with more ability or with a more strict regard to the public interests than this.

In view of the extension of the light-house system, consequent upon the increase of the commerce of the country and the acquisition of sea-coast territory, it is respectfully submitted that some authoritative definition of the limit to which aids to navigation shall be extended by the General Government should be established.

It may well be doubted whether the General Government should be called upon to do more than to thoroughly provide the sea and lake coasts with lights of high order, both stationary and floating, and so to place lights of inferior order as to enable vessels to reach secure anchorages at any season of the year.

The act of Congress, approved August 31, 1852, establishing the Light-House Board, directs that the coasts of the United States shall be divided into twelve districts. It is recommended that authority be given to increase the number of districts to fourteen.

The business of the bureau would be facilitated if Congress should confer the franking privilege upon the Light-House Board in the same manner and upon the same terms as it is now exercised by the several bureaus of the Treasury Department.

The attention of Congress is called to the annual report of the Director of the Mint, which contains the usual statistics of the coinage of the country, and various suggestions and recommendations which are worthy of consideration.

The total value of the bullion deposited at the Mint and branches during the fiscal year was $27,166,318 70, of which $25,472,894 82 was in gold, and $1,693,423 88 in silver. Deducting the redeposit, the amount of actual deposit was $24,591,325 84.

The coinage for the year was: in gold coin, $18,114,425; gold bars, $6,026,810 06; silver coin, $1,136,750; silver bars, $456,236 40; nickel, copper, and bronze coinage, (one, two, three, and five cent pieces,) $1,713,385; total coinage, $20,964,560; total bars stamped, $6,483,046 54.

The gold deposits of domestic production were: at Philadelphia, $1,300,338 53; at San Francisco, $14,850,117 84; at New York, $5,409,996 55; at Denver, $357,935 11. The silver deposits were: at Philadelphia, $67,700 70; at San Francisco, $651,239 05; at New York, $262,312 96; at Denver, $5,082 67.

The gold and silver deposits of foreign production were $1,686,602 35. The amount of gold coined at Philadelphia was $3,864,425; at San Francisco, $14,979,558 52; of silver, at Philadelphia, $314,750; at San Francisco, $822,000; of nickel, copper, and bronze, at Philadelphia, $1,713,885. Total number of pieces struck, 49,735,840.

The branch mint at Denver has never coined money, and its expenses are entirely out of proportion to its business. The law under which it was organized should be repealed, and the institution reorganized as an assay office.

During the past year the branch mint building at Carson City, Nevada, has been completed, and the necessary machinery and fixtures have been forwarded. It will be ready for work early next season.

The Mint at Philadelphia and the branch mint at San Francisco have the confidence of the people and of the Government, and when the new mint building in San Francisco is erected these mints will be of ample capacity to supply coinage for the whole country. The business of coinage requires large and expensive establishments, under charge of men of science and of undoubted integrity; and such can be successfully maintained only at commercial centers, where bullion of different degrees of fineness is continually offered for manipulation. The establishment of additional branch mints is, therefore, unnecessary, and would be injudicious.

The entire deposits at the branch mint in San Francisco were formerly in unparted bullion; now nearly two thirds of the amount is deposited in bars, refined by private establishments. The law requires that the parting charge shall equal the actual cost of the process; but the experience of the past four years shows that not less than $30,000 annually may be saved to the Government by discontinuing the business of refining upon the Pacific coast; and it is, therefore, recommended that the Secretary be authorized to exchange the unparted bullion deposited at the mint for refined bars whenever in his opinion it may be for the public interest to do so.

It is also recommended that authority be given for the redemption of the one and two cent pieces by the Treasurer, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Department.

On the 1st day of April last Mr. R. W. Raymond was appointed commissioner of mining statistics, in place of Mr. J. Ross Browne, now commissioner to China.

Mr. Raymond was instructed to continue the work so ably commenced by his predecessor, and his report will show with what diligence and ability he is performing the duties assigned to him. The Secretary invites the attention of Congress to this report, and asks for the recommendations which it contains due consideration.

The following extract from the Secretary's report of 1867 presents, in language which he cannot make more explicit, his present views:

"The Secretary respectfully recommends the reorganization of the accounting offices of the Treasury Department, so as to place this branch of the public service under one responsible head, according to what seems to have been designed in the original organization of the Department, and followed until the increase of business led to the creation of the office of Second Comptroller, and subsequently to that of Commissioner of Customs. There are now three officers controlling the settlement of accounts, each independent of the others, and, as a consequence, the rules and decisions are not uniform where the same or like questions arise. In the judgment of the Secretary the concentration of the accounting-offices under one head would secure greater efficiency, as well as greater uniformity of practice, than can be expected under a divided supervision. It is believed, also, that it would be advantageous to relieve the Commissioner of Customs of the duty of settling accounts, and to confine his labors to the supervision of the revenue from customs, now sufficiently large to demand his whole time. It is therefore recommended that the office of Chief Comptroller be created, having general supervision of the accounting officers and appellate jurisdiction from their decisions; to which should be transferred the duty of examining and countersigning warrants on the Treasury, and of collecting debts due the Government, now constituting a part of the duties of the First Comptroller; and that the adjustment of accounts pertaining to the customs be restored to the latter office.

"The Secretary also renews the recommendation contained in his last annual report, of a reorganization of the bureaus of the Department, and most respectfully and earnestly solicits for it the favorable action of Congress. The compensation now paid is inadequate to the services performed, and simple justice to gentlemen of ability and character of those employed in the Department, requires a liberal addition to their present compensation. Since the rates of compensation now allowed were established, the duties, labors, and responsibilities of the bureaus have been largely increased, and the necessary expenses of living in Washington have been more than doubled."

The Secretary also again recommends that a change be made in regard to the adjustment and settlement of accounts in the office of the Third Auditor; that a period be fixed within which war claims shall be presented, and that measures be adopted to perpetuate testimony in cases of claims that are disallowed.

The able report of the Treasurer gives a detailed account of the operations of the Treasury during the last fiscal year, and contains many valuable suggestions for the consideration of Congress.

The report of the supervising architect gives full and detailed accounts of the progress that has been made in the construction of public buildings.

The reports of the heads of all the respective bureaus will be found to be of unusual interest, containing, as they do, accurate information in regard to the affairs of the Government in this interesting period of its history.

Mr. S. M. Clark having resigned the office of superintendent of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, Mr. G. B. McCartee has been placed temporarily in charge of it. As the past management and present condition of this bureau are now under investigation by the joint Committee on Retrenchment and Reform, the Secretary feels at liberty only to say, at this time, that, from the examinations which he has caused to be made by officers and clerks of this Department, he feels justified in remarking that the reports which have been at various times put in circulation in regard to overissues of notes or securities, and of dishonesty in the administration of the bureau, are unfounded.

A systematic effort is being made to reduce the expenses of the administration of the customs service, and with considerable success. The process is necessarily slow and beset with difficulties; but material reduction has been already made, and still greater is in progress.

During the war the business of the Treasury Department was so largely and rapidly increased, and so many inexperienced men were necessarily employed, that perfect order and system could not be enforced. Many accounts were unsettled, and some branches of business had fallen into confusion. Much attention has been given by the Secretary "to straightening up" the affairs of the Department. He is now gratified in being able to say that order and system have been introduced where they were found to be needed; that the bureaus are in good working order; and that the "machinery" of the Department is in as satisfactory condition as perhaps it can be under existing laws. The result of the examinations which he has caused to be made has excited his admiration of the wisdom displayed by Mr. Hamilton in the system of accounting which he introduced, and most favorably impressed him with the value of the services of the men who, poorly paid, and little known beyond the walls of the Treasury building, have for years conducted, with unflinching fidelity, the details of a business larger and more complicated than was ever devolved upon a single Department by any Government in the world.

In concluding this communication it may not be inappropriate for the Secretary, in a few brief words, to review some points in the general policy of the administration of the Treasury for the past four years.

The following statement—published in the last Treasury report—exhibits the condition of the Treasury on the 1st of April, 1865:

Funded debt.....	$1,100,361,241 80
Matured debt.....	349,420 09
Temporary loan certificates.....	52,452,328 29
Certificates of indebtedness.....	171,790,000 00
Interest-bearing notes.....	526,812,800 00
Suspended or unpaid requisitions.....	114,256,548 93
United States notes, legal tenders.....	433,180,589 00
Fractional currency.....	24,234,094 07
Cash in the Treasury.....	2,423,437,002 18
	56,481,924 84
Total.....	$2,366,955,077 34

By this statement it appears that, with $56,481,924 84 in the Treasury, there were requisitions waiting for payment (the delay in the payment of which was greatly discrediting the Government) to the amount of $114,256,548 93; that there were $52,452,328 29 of temporary loan certificates liable to be presented in from ten to thirty days' notice, and $171,790,000 of certificates of indebtedness which had been issued to contractors for want of the money to pay the requisitions in their favor, and which were maturing daily. At the same time the efforts to negotiate securities were not being attended with the usual success, while the expenses of the war were not less than $2,000,000 per day. The vouchers issued to contractors for the necessary supplies of the Army and Navy—payable one half in certificates of indebtedness and the other half in money—were being sold at a discount of from ten to twenty per cent., indicating by their depreciation how low was the credit of the Government and how uncertain was the time of payment.

The fall of Richmond and the surrender of the army of Virginia under General Lee (which virtually closed the war) had not the effect of relieving the Treasury. On the contrary, its embarrassments were increased thereby, inasmuch as it seemed to leave the Government without excuse for not paying its debts, at the same time that popular appeals for subscriptions to the public loans were divested of much of their strength. As long as the Government was in danger by the continuation of hostilities the patriotism of the people could be successfully appealed to for the purpose of raising money and sustaining the public credit, without which the war could not be vigorously prosecuted. When hostilities ceased, and the safety and unity of the Government were assured, self-interest became again the controlling power. It will be remembered that it was then generally supposed that the country was already fully supplied with securities, and that there was also throughout the Union a prevailing apprehension that financial disaster would speedily follow the termination of the war. The greatness of the emergency gave the Secretary no time to try experiments for borrowing on a new security of long time and lower interest, and removed from his mind all doubts or hesitation in regard to the course to be pursued. It was estimated that at least $700,000,000 should be raised, in addition to the revenue receipts, for the payment of the requisitions already drawn and those that must soon follow—preparatory to the disbandment of the great Union Army—and of other demands upon the Treasury. The anxious inquiries then were, by what means can this large amount of money be raised? and not what will be the cost of raising it. How can the soldiers be paid and the Army be disbanded, so that the extraordinary expenses of the War Department may be stopped? and not what rate of interest shall be paid for the money. These were the inquiries pressed upon the Secretary. He answered them by calling to his aid the well-tried agent who had been employed by his immediate predecessors, and by offering the seven-and-three-tenth notes—the most popular loan ever offered to the people—in every city and village, and by securing the advocacy of the press throughout the length and breadth of the land. In less than four months from the time the work of obtaining subscriptions was actively commenced the Treasury was in a condition to meet every demand upon it.

But while the Treasury was thus relieved the character of the debt was by no means satisfactory. On the 1st day of September it consisted of the following items:

Funded debt.....	$1,109,568,191 80
Matured debt.....	1,503,020 09
Temporary loan.....	107,148,713 16
Certificates of indebtedness.....	85,093,000 00
Five per cent. legal-tender notes.....	33,954,230 00
Comp'd-interest legal-tender notes.....	217,024,160 00
Seven-thirty notes.....	830,000,000 00
United States notes, legal tenders.....	433,160,569 00
Fractional currency.....	26,344,742 51
Suspended requisitions uncalled for.....	2,111,000 00

Total.....	2,845,907,626 56
Deduct cash in Treasury.....	88,218,055 13

Balance.....$2,757,689,571 43

From this statement it will be perceived that $1,276,884,123 25 of the public debt consisted of various forms of temporary securities; $433,160,569 of United States notes—the excess of which over $400,000,000 having been put into circulation in payment of temporary loans—and $26,344,742 of fractional currency. Portions of this temporary debt were maturing daily, and all of it, including $18,415,000 of the funded debt, was to be provided for within a period of three years. The seven-thirty notes were, by law and the terms of the loan, convertible at maturity at the will of the holder, into five-twenty bonds, or payable like the rest of these temporary obligations in lawful money.

It was of course necessary to make provision for the daily maturing debt, and also for taking up, from time to time, such portions of it as could be advantageously converted into bonds, or paid in currency, before maturity, for the purpose of avoiding the necessity of accumulating large sums of money, and of relieving the Treasury from the danger it would be exposed to if a very considerable portion of the debt were permitted to mature, with no other means for paying it than that afforded by sales of bonds, in a market too uncertain to be confidently relied upon in an emergency. In addition to the temporary loan, payment of which could be demanded on so short a notice as to make it virtually a debt payable on demand—the certificates of indebtedness, which were maturing at the rate of from fifteen to twenty millions per month, the five per cent. notes which matured in January following, and the compound-interest notes, which were payable at various times within a period of three years—there were $830,000,000 of seven-thirty notes which would become due as follows, namely:

August 15, 1867.....	$300,000,000
June 15, 1868.....	300,000,000
July 15, 1869.....	230,000,000

As the option of conversion was with the holders of these notes, it depended upon the condition of the market whether they would be presented for payment in lawful money or to be exchanged for bonds. No prudent man intrusted with the care of the nation's interest and credit would permit two or three hundred millions of debt to mature without making provision for its payment; nor would he, if it could be avoided, accumulate large sums of money in the Treasury which would not be called for if the price of bonds should be such as to make the conversion of the notes preferable to their payment in lawful money. The policy of the Secretary was, therefore, as he remarked in a former report, determined by the condition of the Treasury and the country, and by the character of the debt. It was simply, first, to put and keep the Treasury in such condition as not only to be prepared to pay all claims upon presentation, but also to be strong enough to prevent the success of any combinations that might be formed to control its management; and, second, to take up quietly in advance of their maturity by payment or conversion such portions of the temporary debt as would obviate the necessity of accumulating large currency balances in the Treasury, and at the same time relieve it from the danger of being forced to a further issue of legal-tender notes or to a sale of bonds at whatever price they might command.

In carrying out this policy, it seemed also to be the duty of the Secretary to have due regard to the interests of the people, and to prevent, as far as possible, the work of funding from disturbing legitimate business. As financial trouble has almost invariably followed closely upon the termination of protracted wars, it was generally feared, as has been already remarked, that such trouble would be unavoidable at the close of the great and expensive war in which the United States had been for four years engaged. This, of course, it was important to avoid, as its occurrence might not only render funding difficult, but might prostrate those great interests upon which the Government depended for its revenues. It was, and constantly has been, therefore, the aim of the Secretary so to administer the Treasury, while borrowing money and funding the temporary obligations, as to prevent a commercial crisis, and to keep the business of the country as steady as was possible on the basis of an irredeemable and constantly fluctuating currency. Whether his efforts have contributed to this end or not, he does not undertake to say; but the fact is unquestioned, that a great war has been closed; large loans have been effected; heavy revenues have been collected, and some thirteen hundred million dollars of temporary obligations have been paid or funded, and a great debt brought into manageable shape, not only without a financial crisis but without any disturbance to the ordinary business of the country. To accomplish these things successfully, the Secretary deemed it necessary, as has been before stated, that the Treasury should be kept constantly in a strong condition, with power to prevent the credit of the Government and the great interests of the people from being placed at the mercy of adverse influences. Notwithstanding the magnitude and character of the debt, this power the Treasury has for the last three years possessed; and it has been the well-known existence, rather than the exercise of it, which has, in repeated instances, saved the country from panic and disaster. The gold reserve, the maintenance of which has subjected the Secretary to constant and bitter criticism, has given a confidence to the holders of our securities, at home and abroad, by the constant evidence which it exhibited of the ability of the Government, without depending upon purchases in the market, to pay the interest upon the public debt, and a steadiness to trade, by preventing violent fluctuations in the convertible value of the currency, which have been a more than ample compensation to the country for any loss of interest that may have been sustained thereby. If the gold in the Treasury had been sold down to what was absolutely needed for the payment of the interest on the public debt, not only would the public credit have been endangered, but the currency, and consequently the entire business of the country would have been constantly subject to the dangerous power of speculative combinations.

Of the unavailing effort that was made by the Secretary to contract the currency, with the view of appreciating it to the specie standard, he forbears to speak. His action in respect to contraction, although authorized, and for a time sustained, was subsequently disapproved (as he thinks unwisely) by Congress. This is a question, however, that can be better determined hereafter than now.

Complaint has been made that, in the administration of the Treasury Department since the war, there has been too much of interference with the stock and money market. This complaint, when honestly made, has been the result of a want of reflection, or of imperfect knowledge of the financial condition of the Government. The transactions of the Treasury have from necessity been connected with the stock and money market of New York. If the debt after the close of the war had been a funded debt, with nothing to be done in relation to it but to pay the accruing interest, or if business had been conducted on a specie basis, and consequently been free from the constant changes to which it has been and must be subject—as long as there is any considerable difference between the legal and commercial standard of value—the Treasury could have been managed with entire independence of the stock exchange or the gold room. Such, however, was not the fact. More than one half of the national debt, according to the foregoing exhibits, consisted of temporary obligations, which were to be paid in lawful money or converted into bonds; and there was in circulation a large amount of irredeemable promises constantly changing in their convertible value. The Secretary, therefore, could not be indifferent to the condition of the market, nor avoid connection with it, for it was in fact with the market he had to deal. He would have been happy had it been otherwise. If bonds were to be sold to provide the means for paying the debts that were payable in lawful money, it was a matter of great importance to the Treasury that the price of bonds should not be depressed by artificial processes. If the seven-thirty notes were to be converted into five-twenty bonds, it was equally important that they should sustain such relations to each other, in regard to prices, that conversions would be effected. If bonds were at a discount the notes would be presented for payment in legal tenders; and these could only be obtained by further issues or the sale of some kind of securities. For three years, therefore, the state of the market has been a matter of deep solicitude to the Secretary. If he had been indifferent to it, or failed carefully to study the influences that controlled it, or had hesitated to exercise the power with which Congress had clothed him, for successfully funding the temporary debt by conversions or sales, he would have been false to his trust. The task of converting a thousand millions of temporary obligations into a funded debt, on a market constantly subject to natural and artificial fluctuations, without depressing the prices of bonds, and without disturbing the business of the country, however it may be regarded now when the work has been accomplished, was, while it was being performed, an exceedingly delicate one. It is but simple justice to say that its successful accomplishment is, in a great measure, attributable to the judicious action of the Assistant Treasurer at New York, Mr. Van Dyck.

Similar complaint has also been made of the manner in which gold and bonds have been disposed of, by what has been styled "secret sales;" and yet precisely the same course has been pursued in these sales that careful and prudent men pursue who sell on their own account. The sales have been made when currency was needed, and prices were satisfactory. It was not considered wise or prudent to advise the dealers precisely when and to what amount sales were to be made, (no sane man operating on his own account would have done this,) but all sales of gold have been made in the open market, and of bonds by agents or the Assistant Treasurer in New York, in the ordinary way, with a view of obtaining the very best prices, and with the least possible disturbance of business.

In the large transactions of the Treasury agents have been indispensable, but none have been employed when the work could be done equally well by the officers of the Department. Whether done by agents or officers the Secretary has no reason to suppose that it has not been done skillfully and honestly, as well as economically. He is now gratified in being able to say that unless a very stringent market, such as was produced a few weeks ago by powerful combinations in New York, should send to the Treasury large amounts of the three per cent. certificates for redemption, no further sales of bonds are likely to be necessary. Until, however, the receipts from internal revenues are increased the necessities of the Government will require that the sales of gold shall be continued. These sales are now being made by advertisements for sealed bids instead of the agencies heretofore employed. The result, so far, has not been entirely satisfactory, but a proper respect for what, according to the tone of the press appeared to be the public sentiment, seemed to require it. The new mode will be fairly tested, and continued if it can be without a sacrifice of the public interest.

The Secretary has thus referred to a few points in his administration of the Treasury, for the purpose of explaining some things which may have been imperfectly understood, and not for the purpose of defending his own action. Deeply sensible of the responsibilities resting upon him, but neither appalled nor disheartened by them, he has performed the duties of his office according to the best of his judgment and the lights that were before him, without deprecating criticism, and plainly and earnestly presented his own views without seeking popular favor. It has been his good fortune to have had for his immediate predecessors two of the ablest men in the country, to whose judicious labors he has been greatly indebted for any success that may have attended his administration of the Treasury. Nor is he under less obligation to his associates, the officers and leading clerks of the Department, whose ability and whose devotion to the public service have commanded his respect and admiration.

Report of the Secretary of the Navy.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,

December 7, 1868.

SIR: I respectfully submit the annual report of the Navy Department and of that branch of the public service during the past year.

EXHIBIT OF THE NAVAL FORCE.

The number of vessels in squadron service, as cruisers, storeships, and returning, is 42, carrying 411 guns; a reduction during the year of 14 vessels, carrying 96 guns. The number of vessels of all descriptions in use, as cruisers, storeships, receiving ships, tugs, &c., is 81, carrying 693 guns; a reduction from last year of 22 vessels, carrying 205 guns. The total number of vessels borne upon the Navy list is 206, carrying 1,743 guns; a reduction during the year of 82 vessels, carrying 126 guns. The following tables exhibit the present employment and condition of the naval force:

	No.	Guns.
Cruising vessels in squadron service.....	35	356
Vessels returning from squadrons.....	3	24
Storeships for squadrons.....	4	21
Special and lake service.....	3	19
Apprentice ship.....	1	11
Practice vessels, and in use at Naval Academy.....	10	115
Receiving ships.....	6	92
Quarters for officers at League Island and marine barracks, Norfolk.....	2	27
Tugs at navy-yards and stations, powder boats, &c.....	17	18
Total in use.....	81	693

THE SQUADRONS.

The organization of the squadrons remains essentially the same as when I made my last annual report. Some changes of commanding officers and of vessels have taken place, and the force of each squadron has, in consequence of the limited number of seamen allowed by the act of 17th of June last, been necessarily reduced.

At the commencement of the rebellion the naval force on foreign stations was recalled to assist in establishing and enforcing the blockade, leaving the commerce and persons of our citizens abroad greatly exposed. On the restoration of peace the Department immediately took measures to reestablish the squadrons which had been broken up, and a course of active cruising was ordered by which the flag, so long withdrawn, might be promptly exhibited in every important port where the commerce of our country had penetrated. This order has been efficiently and satisfactorily carried into effect by the distinguished naval officers selected for service on foreign stations, and at no previous period in our history have the power and prestige of the American Navy and name been more honored and respected.

If our commerce and shipping interests have not recovered from the depression consequent upon the war, and are not as expanded as formerly, it is from no inattention or neglect on the part of the Navy. Since the squadrons were reorganized, our countrymen and their interests abroad have been as vigilantly guarded and protected on every sea and at every accessible point as at any former period. It has been the purpose of the Department to have one or more of our naval vessels visit annually every commercial port where American capital is employed, and that a man-of-war should not be long absent from the vicinity of every merchant ship that might need assistance or protection.

To accomplish this purpose and meet the requirements of the Department, great activity and vigilance were necessary with our limited Navy, numbering in men and ships less than one fourth the effective force of any one of the principal maritime powers. Yet the work has been performed with energy and zeal, and the views of the Department well sustained.

EUROPEAN SQUADRON.

Admiral D. G. Farragut, who was in command of the squadron at the date of my last report, returned to New York in the flag-ship on the 10th of November, leaving the squadron in temporary charge of Commodore A. M. Pennock. The Franklin is to return with Rear Admiral William Radford, who has been designated to command the squadron, which is composed of the following vessels:

Franklin (flag-ship).....	39	guns.
Ticonderoga.....	9	"
Swatara.....	10	"
Frolic.....	5	"
Guard (storeship).....	3	"

The Canandaigua is on her way to the United States from this squadron.

Admiral Farragut has visited during the year Holland, Belgium, England, Scotland, France, Portugal, Spain, Italy, Austria, Prussia, Greece, Turkey, and Morocco. His reception in every place which he has visited was equally flattering with his reception the preceding year in the north of Europe, and cannot be less acceptable to the Government and people of the United States. While honoring that distinguished officer, the sovereigns and other high officials of these Powers have availed themselves of the occasion to compliment, in friendly terms, the nation he represents. It is a gratification to remark, while noting the movements of this officer and his squadron, that in no instance has an appeal been made for his interference in any manner to relieve or extend aid to our countrymen scattered along the shores where the flag has been exhibited, nor has any application been made to him to assert and vindicate their rights. Throughout Europe the rights of American citizens are respected, and wherever the flag has been carried by the Navy the privileges to which they are entitled and which are guaranteed by treaty stipulations and international law have been asserted and maintained.

He left Lisbon in November, 1867, where the usual courtesies had been exchanged, and where, by invitation, Admiral Farragut, with many of his officers, had been received by the king and queen of Portugal and Don Fernando, and proceeded along the coasts of Spain, France, and Italy, touching at Gibraltar, Carthage, Port Mahon, Toulon, Villefranche, and Spezzia, at each of which places he was the recipient of many courtesies and attentions, civil and naval. On the occasion of an excursion to Madrid he was cordially welcomed by the queen and king consort and other high officials.

At Port Mahon, where he arrived in December, his reception was peculiarly gratifying; each village in Minorca through which he passed was profuse in compliments, and in many instances sent out deputations to meet him as a descendant of one of their ancient families, his father having been a native of and emigrant from Ciudadela, in that island.

When the Franklin was at Spezzia, Admiral Farragut visited Florence, Venice, and Genoa. He dined at Florence with his Majesty Victor Emmanuel, and was entertained by many distinguished officials, both of Italy and other countries, at each of the places named. From Spezzia he proceeded to Naples, where he arrived in March.

While on a visit to Rome, Admiral Farragut was received by the prime minister and presented to his holiness the Pope. He left Naples April 6, and, touching at Messina and Syracuse, arrived at Malta on the 12th. He was there joined by the Ticonderoga and Frolic, and his departure on the 18th was marked by unusual honors. The squadron was followed to sea by Vice Admiral Paget, commanding her Britannic Majesty's fleet in the Mediterranean, in his flag-ship, the Caledonia, which passed close alongside, the crews manning the rigging and cheering, and the band playing "Hail Columbia." The other vessels of the fleet passed successively, extending similar courtesies. When all had passed, Admiral Paget hoisted the American flag at the main and fired a salute of seventeen guns. These courtesies were acknowledged by the crew of the Franklin, who manned the yards, the band playing "God save the Queen," and the salute was returned.

Admiral Farragut returned to Lisbon on the 28th of April, and after taking in supplies, proceeded to Holland. He arrived at Flushing in June, where he remained until the 21st. With a number of his officers he visited, on invitation, his Majesty King Leopold, at Brussels, and dined with him. Subsequently, his Majesty, accompanied by the queen and attendants, was received on board the Franklin at Ostend. From Brussels he made a short tour to Liege and Essen, and proceeded from thence to Southampton, where he left the Franklin, and made a tour to the north, passing through London, York, Newcastle, Edinburgh, and Glasgow, and rejoined the Franklin in July. On this tour he received every attention from the authorities of the respective places visited, and inspected the dock-yards and other establishments of interest to naval officers.

On the 10th of July the Franklin was visited officially by the Duke of Edinburgh, captain of her Britannic Majesty's ship Galatea, and on the 12th Admiral Farragut and other officers dined with him, many distinguished persons of England being present. The Prince of Wales and his brother, the Duke of Edinburgh, visited the Franklin on the 14th. On the 17th Admiral Farragut called on her Majesty the queen, at Osborne House. On the 18th the corporate authorities and others of Southampton visited the Franklin, and on the 19th she sailed from Cowes for Syra, at which place she arrived on the 4th of August.

Here Admiral Farragut transferred his flag to the Frolic and proceeded to Constantinople. The Franklin sailed for Smyrna. He reached the Dardanelles on the 6th of August, and having received a firman from the Sultan, anchored in the Bosphorus, off Constantinople, on the 8th. On the 13th of August, accompanied by a large number of officers of the Navy, he was received by his Majesty the sultan, Abdul Aziz, in his palace on the Asiatic shore, and on a subsequent day called on the viceroy of Egypt, then on a visit to Constantinople. The Franklin having been detained several days at the Dardanelles awaiting a firman, anchored off Constantinople on the 21st. Here he was entertained by the grand vizier and other officials. He left the Bosphorus on the 29th, and anchored in the harbor of Piræus, Greece, on the 31st of August.

At Athens he was presented to the king and queen, and upon invitation of the king was present at the baptism of the young prince, and attended a banquet at the palace. The Franklin was visited by the king, the Grand Duchess Alexandra Josephina, and the Grand Duke Constantine, (mother and brother of the queen,) with their respective suites; also by the Greek officials and the diplomatic corps.

On the 10th of September he left Piræus, and on the 14th arrived off Trieste, where official calls were exchanged and other courtesies extended. He sailed from Trieste on the 27th, anchored off Gibraltar October 9th, and left for New York on the 18th.

Thus terminated one of the most marked and interesting cruises in naval history, which cannot fail to prove of national benefit, during which extraordinary courtesies and entertainments were everywhere received and reciprocated.

The principal points of the west coast of Africa, as far as St. Paul de Loando and the neighboring groups of islands which lie within the limits of the European squadron, have been visited by the Swatara. She left Lisbon February 5, and returned to that port April 27, having touched at Porto Grande, Porto Praya, Grand Canary, Teneriffe, Madeira, Mombia, Cape Palmas, El Mina, Fernando Po, Jella Coffee, and St. Thomas. Commander Jeffers reports that the slave trade is entirely suspended.

The vessels of this squadron have, during the year, in addition to the ports mentioned, visited Valencia, Tarragona, Barcelona, Malaga, Leghorn, Palermo, Civita Vecchia, Tarranto, Ancona, Venice, Brindisi, Candia, Scio, Marseilles, Havre, Cherbourg, Brest, Bordeaux, Pauillac, Basque Roads, Cadiz, Ferrol, Hamburg, Bremerhaven, Antwerp, Plymouth, and various ports on the Irish coast.

ASIATIC SQUADRON.

Rear Admiral Henry H. Bell, who was in command of this squadron at the date of my last report, was drowned at Osaka on the 11th of January by the upsetting of a boat in which he was crossing the bar. The command devolved upon Commodore John R. Goldsborough, as senior officer, until the arrival of Rear Admiral S. C. Rowan, who sailed from New York in the Piscataqua on the 16th of December, and assumed command at Singapore on the 18th of April.

The squadron is composed of the following vessels:

Piscataqua , (flag-ship).....	23 guns.
Oneida	8 "
Iroquois	6 "
Ashuelot	10 "
Monocacy	10 "

The Shenandoah is on her way home from this squadron under orders issued in June last. The Hartford arrived at New York in August.

The United States minister, Mr. Van Valkenburg, was of opinion that our Government should be represented by a strong naval force on the occasion of the opening of the ports of Osaka and Hiogo. Rear Admiral Bell concurred in this opinion and assembled as many vessels of the squadron off Hiogo as were available, including the Hartford, Iroquois, Monocacy, Aroostook, Oneida, and Shenandoah. The latter vessel conveyed the United States minister from Yokohama to consummate the terms of the treaty. No serious trouble was apprehended, but certain discontented factions were known to exist. It was thought, therefore, that the display of foreign power would prove a wholesome restraint on the turbulent and disaffected.

Agreeably to arrangements, Osaka and Hiogo were quietly opened to foreigners on the 1st of January. The event was celebrated by the American and British vessels at those places, their mastsheads being dressed with the respective national flags and the Tycoon's flag at the main. Every vessel simultaneously fired a salute of twenty-one guns, which the Japanese promptly returned at both places.

Although the opening of these ports had been harmonious, affairs bore an aspect so unsettled that Rear Admiral Bell determined to delay his departure, and three days after sending dispatches to the Department announcing this purpose he was drowned by the swamping of his boat off Osaka.

This melancholy event, made the more afflictive by the drowning at the same time of Lieutenant Commander J. H. Reed and ten of the crew of the admiral's barge, occurred on the morning of January 11. His communication with the shore had been interrupted for several days by a storm, and he left his ship as soon as it abated for the purpose of visiting the United States minister. But his barge was capsize by a strong wind and heavy sea on the bar in sight of most of his command. Every effort was made by boats dispatched from the vessels present to rescue the unfortunate party, but only three of the boat's crew were saved. The bodies of the lost were all subsequently recovered.

The harmony which prevailed at the opening of the new ports was of short duration. Difficulties, originating in the innovations on ancient customs and opposition to intercourse with foreigners, appeared among the Japanese, and soon broke out in hostilities.

On the 27th of January the contending parties came in conflict at Osaka. The Tycoon, who favored the extension of commercial intercourse, was defeated; and during the night of January 31 sought shelter with some of his principal adherents on board the Iroquois, which was in the harbor. Protection was given him until daylight, when he was transferred to one of his own vessels of war.

On the 1st of February the several foreign ministers were compelled to abandon Osaka, and were received and conveyed in the Iroquois to Hiogo, where they established their legations. On the 4th of February an assault was made in the streets of Hiogo by a detachment of Japanese troops on the foreign residents, during which one of the crew of the Oneida was seriously wounded by a musket ball. In consequence of these outbreaks, which threatened the safety of the foreign population, the naval forces present made a joint landing and adopted measures to protect the foreign settlement. But on the 8th of February an envoy from the Mikado arrived at the United States legation with information of a change of Government. Assurance was given that foreigners would be protected, whereupon a settlement was made and the forces withdrawn. The Japanese officer who had command of the detachment of troops, and ordered them to fire on the foreigners at Hiogo, was subsequently executed in the presence of a number of the officers of the vessels of war.

Rear Admiral Rowan reached Yokohama on the 24th of June, and found the open ports in possession of the Mikado party. The foreign naval forces, in pursuance of agreement in conference, have jointly occupied Yokohama for the defense of the foreign settlement. No serious disturbances had taken place there at the date of the last accounts, and Rear Admiral Rowan was awaiting the progress of events between the contending parties.

After the death of Rear Admiral Bell, Commodore Goldsborough transferred his flag to the Hartford, and left Nagasaki on the 1st of February for Hong-Kong, on his way to Singapore and the United States. At Hong-Kong he paid an official visit to the Chinese viceroy at Canton, who rules over the two extensive and populous sea-coast provinces, Kwantung and Fokien. The reception was cordial and gratifying; and to check, in some measure, the frequent piracies the viceroy promised to issue a proclamation prohibiting fishing junks from carrying an extra number of men, or arms, or munitions of war.

The limits of this squadron are extensive, and the service required is of a varied character. In December the Monocacy examined the track of steamers between Nagasaki and Osaka through the inland sea, the waters navigated by the auxiliary steamers of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, for the purpose of determining on the proper sites for light-houses. During the same month the Ashuelot went to Taku, where the passage of the United States minister, Mr. Burlingame, had been obstructed by the rebels. The minister and family were received on board and conveyed to Shanghai. In June the Unadilla visited Bangkok, in Siam, and delivered a present of arms to the prime minister. Courtesies were exchanged with the king, the crown prince, the prime minister, and other officials.

In April the Shenandoah was sent to Corea to make another attempt to rescue the crew of the schooner General Sherman, which had been destroyed by the Coreans some eighteen months previously, it having been stated upon apparently good authority that some of them were still alive and in captivity. From all the information that Commander Febiger could gather he concluded that none of the crew or passengers of the schooner were living. He succeeded, however, in obtaining a fair survey of the Ping Yang river and its approaches, and in securing other useful data.

The Aroostook, Lieutenant Commander Beardslee, conveyed the consuls for Amoy and Foo-Choo to Formosa in April, to enable them to visit the various ports on that island coming under their charge. The savages inhabiting the lower part of this island, it will be recollected, murdered the shipwrecked officers and crew of the American bark Rover. Satisfied from inquiry that no foreigners were in captivity on the island, Lieutenant Commander Beardslee obtained assurances from the natives of kind treatment to, and restoration of, any persons who may hereafter be shipwrecked upon the island. This arrangement was effected mainly through the instrumentality of General Le Gendre, United States consul at Amoy, who, accompanied by an expedition furnished by order of the captain general of the Foukien province, visited the island in the fall of 1867, and had an interview with the savage chief and made agreements with him for the future. The consul general states that but for the exhibition of the naval power of the United States the previous June he could have accomplished nothing.

The light-draught steamers Aroostook, Undilla, and Maumee, which were sent to the Asiatic squadron principally to cruise for the suppression of piracy, were assigned to localities where such crimes had been most frequent, and have been almost constantly engaged in this special duty. It is believed that their presence, with that of the small gunboats of different nationalities, has in a great measure suppressed the crime.

Although the squadron has been mainly in Japanese waters, the principal commercial ports in China have been visited, and all needed protection given to American interests.

NORTH ATLANTIC SQUADRON.

Rear Admiral James S. Palmer, who was in command of this squadron at the date of my last report, died of yellow fever at St. Thomas on the 7th of December. The flag-ship Susquehanna being infected with the disease was, on her return to New York, placed out of commission, and, until the Contoocook was ready for sea, the Wampanoag was used as a flag-ship. Rear Admiral H. K. Hoff hoisted his flag on board the latter vessel on the 22d of February. The squadron is now composed of the

Contoocook , (flag-ship).....	13 guns.
Saco	10 "
Penobscot	9 "
Yantic	9 "
Gettysburg	9 "
Nipsic	6 "

The rear admiral commanding has, in the flag-ship, visited many of the important points within the limits of his command. During the months of May and June he was at St. Thomas, Santa Cruz, Point-à-Pitre, St. Pierre, La Guayra, Aspinwall, Port-au-Prince, and Key West. He is now making a second cruise through the West India islands, and at last advices was at Havana. The other vessels of the squadron have been actively employed, and have given assistance to our merchantmen and protection to our citizens whenever needed.

A vessel continues to be constantly stationed at Aspinwall for the protection of our citizens and treasure in transitu between that place and Panama. In April, upon application of the agents of the steamship company, a force was landed from the Penobscot to guard the passengers and treasure, the streets being filled with excited and lawless individuals, the police and native troops having been sent to Chiriqui in consequence of the death of the president of the republic. There was no conflict, however, and when the anticipated trouble had passed the force disembarked.

The disturbed condition of Hayti has called for more than ordinary attention to American interests on that island. Instructions have from time to time been issued to the admiral in command to watch the progress of events, and be prepared at all times to afford necessary protection to our citizens. In pursuance of these directions the Contoocook, De Soto, Shawmut, Saco, Penobscot, Gettysburg, and Nipsic, have, at different times, been in Haytian waters, and some of them have remained there for weeks successively. The naval officers in command have exercised prudence, observed neutrality, and exchanged the customary courtesies with the authorities.

In March last the De Soto, Commodore Boggs, was ordered to Venezuela to coöperate with our minister in securing the release, and indemnity for their detention, of a part of the crew of the American whaling schooner Hannah Grant, who had been captured on the peninsula of Paraguana, and carried as prisoners to Coro. At Curaçoa Commodore Boggs learned of the release of the crew of the schooner, but he very properly proceeded to La Guayra, and in company with Mr. Stillwell, the United States minister, visited Caracas and had an interview with the vice-president and other authorities of the republic. The Saco, Commander Wilson, took on board at St. Thomas the master of the Hannah Grant, and after restoring him to his position at Kingston, proceeded to Venezuela. The question at that stage became one of indemnity, subject to adjustment through other channels. No further occasion for naval action was therefore necessary, and the force was withdrawn.

In June a display of naval force in the gulf was considered necessary in consequence of reports that a hostile expedition against Mexico was concentrating near New Orleans. No occasion for action, however, manifested itself.

SOUTH ATLANTIC SQUADRON.

The South Atlantic squadron, under command of Rear Admiral Charles H. Davis, is composed of the following vessels:

Guerriere , (flag-ship).....	21 guns.
Pawnee	11 "
Quinnebaug	6 "
Wasp	3 "
Kansas	8 "

Two vessels were ordered home in consequence of the reduction of the naval force by act of Congress. The Huron arrived at New York in October and the Shamokin is daily expected at Philadelphia.

The continuation of the war between the allied Powers and Paraguay has rendered it advisable to keep some portion of the force within as convenient reach as practicable of military operations. Other points, however, within the limits of the command have not been neglected, but our interests have received attention and ample protection. The flag has been shown at Bahia, Rio de Janeiro, St. Catharines, San Carmen, Itha Grande, Falkland islands, Montevideo, Buenos Ayres, and other points on the coast of South America; at Rosario, Curupaity, Corrientes, and other places on the La Plata, Parana, and Paraguay rivers; and at Cape Town, Little Fish Bay, Benguela, St. Paul de Loando, Ambriz, Kinsembo, Kabend, Malemba, Landano, Black Point Bay, and Mayumba, on the southwest coast of Africa.

The presence of naval vessels has generally been all that was necessary for the security of American citizens and their property; but on two occasions it was deemed advisable to land a part of the force at Montevideo. On the 7th of February, in concert with the commanders of other squadrons, and at the request of Governor Flores, fifty seamen and marines were landed for the protection of foreign residents and the custom-house. On the succeeding day, affairs having quieted, the detachment was withdrawn. On the 19th of the same month another force was landed and remained on shore until the 26th, in consequence of disturbances occasioned by the assassination of General Flores.

Early in the year, at the request of the Secretary of State, the Wasp was dispatched to the capital of Paraguay for the purpose of bringing away our minister resident, Mr. Washburn. When she arrived at the seat of war in the Parana river the passage of the vessel through the blockading fleet was refused by the Brazilian authorities, and after waiting some months, and failing to convince them of the right of a neutral man-of-war to ascend the river as far as Asuncion for the purpose stated, that vessel returned to Montevideo. In August the Brazilian authorities withdrew their objection, and the Wasp again ascended the river, which is of difficult navigation, owing to its tortuous course and shifting sand-bars. Only the smaller class of naval vessels can ascend to Asuncion, on the Parana river, in the interior of South America, nine hundred and thirty miles from Montevideo. On the 10th of September, at Villeta, (below Asuncion,) the Wasp took on board Mr. Washburn and family, and conveyed him to Buenos Ayres. Rear Admiral Davis, at the date of his latest dispatches, was preparing to accompany the newly-accredited minister of the United States, General McMahon, to Paraguay.

The authorities of St. Catharines, of Bahia, and of Uruguay have been respectively received on board the flag-ship, and intercourse with them, and indeed with all the South American States, has been of the most friendly and gratifying character.

NORTH PACIFIC SQUADRON.

On the 6th of August last Rear Admiral H. K. Thatcher, who had been in command of this squadron for two years, was relieved by Rear Admiral Thomas T. Craven. The squadron comprises:

Pensacola (flag-ship).....	20 guns.
Mohongo	10 "
Lackawana	7 "
Saginaw	6 "
Resaca	8 "
Ossipee	6 "
Jamestown	15 "
Cyane (storeship).....	18 "

These vessels have, during the year, given much of their attention to the west coast of Mexico and the ports in the Gulf of California, where their presence has had a salutary influence. Rear Admirals Thatcher and Craven have each in his flag-ship visited that portion of the station; and the following places have been visited, some of them repeatedly, by the several vessels: Mazatlan, Guaymas, Acapulco, San Blas, Manzanilla, La Paz, Cinaloa River, Jicabampo, and Boca Mucale.

The commercial ports of the Central American States of Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and San Salvador have been visited by the Saranac, Mohican, and Ossipee. Our flag has been received with manifestations of pleasure by both the authorities and people. They all respect our rights and those of our countrymen residing there.

A vessel of this squadron continues to be stationed at Panama, for the protection of our interests on the Isthmus. The Cyane, now there, answers the double purpose of a guard and store vessel, and is able ordinarily to afford ample protection to American interests. In March last there were threatened difficulties which rendered the display of additional force desirable, and the Saranac was accordingly dispatched to that point, but happily the political disturbance on that occasion passed without any necessity for interference.

In June last Rear Admiral Thatcher, in the flag-ship, visited the northwestern coast, touching at Port Townsend and Esquimaux. Several vessels of the squadron have visited the newly-acquired territory of Alaska. The Ossipee conveyed the commissioners from San Francisco to Sitka, and was present and participated in the ceremonies incident to the transfer of the flag. The Resaca and Jamestown, although sent there primarily for the influence of the cold climate in disinfecting them of yellow fever, afforded such protection to our citizens as was desired. In April last the Saginaw was dispatched to Alaska, where she remained several months, for the purpose of making explorations and surveys, and of determining the most suitable harbors and anchorages on the coast and in the adjacent islands. The Suwanee, under orders for the same point, was wrecked on the 9th of July, by running on a hidden rock in Shadwell Passage, while in charge of a coast pilot. The officers and crew succeeded in landing on the nearest beach. Rear Admiral Hastings, commanding her Majesty's Pacific squadron, and Commander Porcher, of her Majesty's steamer Sparrowhawk, were prompt to render valuable assistance on the occasion. The vessel soon broke up, but Rear Admiral Thatcher, who was at the time at Esquimaux, made the best practicable terms for saving the engines and other articles.

The Lackawanna, which had been at the Sandwich Islands more than a year, was in May relieved by the Mohongo. Our commercial and whaling interests fully justify the constant presence of one or more of our vessels in that quarter—a fact which will be appreciated when it is known that at one time in November, 1867, forty-two American flags were flying from that number of whaling and merchant vessels in the harbor of Honolulu, while but six flags of all other nations could be seen. In July last his Majesty the king of the Sandwich Islands, attended by a portion of his cabinet and his personal staff, visited the Mohongo, and was received with the honors due to his position.

SOUTH PACIFIC SQUADRON.

Rear Admiral Thomas Turner succeeded Rear Admiral Dahlgren in command of this squadron on the 14th of July last. It is composed of the following vessels:

Powhatan, (flag-ship).....	17 guns.
Tuscarora.....	10 "
Kearsarge.....	7 "
Dakota.....	7 "
Nyack.....	6 "
Onward.....	—

The vessels of this squadron have carried the flag into all the principal commercial ports from Panama to Valparaiso, and have rendered such protection to American interests as was needed. On the night of the 10th of January last General Prado, ex-president of Peru, and other officers came alongside the Nyack and requested asylum from personal violence, which he apprehended from the revolutionary party. He also requested transportation to Chili. His requests were complied with, and he was safely landed at Valparaiso.

Australia and the various groups of islands in the South Pacific have not been visited, the disturbed condition of political affairs and disasters from physical convulsions in South America having rendered it advisable that the vessels of the squadron should remain on that coast.

Two vessels, the Wateree and the Fredonia, have been lost by earthquake.

INJURY AND DESTRUCTION OF VESSELS BY EARTHQUAKES.

A violent earthquake, which occurred in the harbor of St. Thomas and in that vicinity on the afternoon of November 18, 1867, caused the stranding of the United States steamer Monongahela, and two other vessels of the squadron barely escaped serious injury. The De Soto, in the harbor of St. Thomas, was swept from her moorings by the force of the waves, both chains snapping, and was thrown violently upon the iron piles of a new wharf, but fortunately the next wave carried her again into deep water, and she sustained but little injury. The Susquehanna, in the same harbor, succeeded in getting away from her dangerous position without damage.

The Monongahela, which at the time was anchored off Frederickstadt, Island of St. Croix, was carried by a wave over the warehouses and into one of the streets of the town. She came back with the returning sea and was left on a coral reef at the water's edge. Fortunately but five of her crew were lost, and no very serious injury was sustained by the ship. As it was deemed practicable to re-launch her, the officers and crew remained by the vessel. On learning the facts the United States bark Purveyor was put in commission at New York, provided with all necessary appliances for launching, and on the 17th of January left for St. Croix, where she arrived on the 31st, and the party, under the supervision of Naval Constructor Davidson, commenced preparations for getting the Monongahela afloat. The first attempt failed, but on the 10th of May a successful effort was made. She was safely launched, and left St. Croix on the 13th of June, arrived at New York the 29th, and was put out of commission July 8.

On the 13th of August last a violent earthquake visited the western coast of South America, by which two of the vessels of the South Pacific squadron were lost to the service. The store-ship Fredonia had, in consequence of the prevalence of yellow fever at Callao, been moved up to Arica, and was there with the Wateree quietly riding at anchor. A short time after the shock of the earthquake was felt the sea receded, leaving the Fredonia on the bottom, and a moment after the waters rolled in with such power as to break her to fragments. Twenty-seven officers and men were drowned, three officers who were on shore and two seamen who were rescued being all that were saved.

The Wateree was thrown ashore and left high and dry about five hundred yards from high-water mark. She was badly strained, and her position was such that the expense of any attempt to launch her would have exceeded the value of the vessel. Under these circumstances it was deemed for the best interests of the Government to sell her, and the necessary directions were accordingly given. But a single man was lost from the vessel, a seaman in charge of the captain's gig on the beach, who was carried out to sea by the waves.

Rear Admiral Turner was at Callao, in his flag-ship, the Powhatan, when this calamity occurred, and as a matter of security steamed out of the harbor until the next morning. On learning of the disastrous results of the earthquake at Arica, he proceeded to that point. The Powhatan, on application of the authorities of Peru, was permitted to convey surgeons, nurses, &c., for the relief of the thousands of sufferers at Arica. The commanding officer of the Wateree also furnished such aid as he could to the destitute inhabitants, with provisions from the ship's supply. The senior officer at Valparaiso promptly responded to an application of the Chilean Government, by placing the Tuscarora at the service of the authorities to convey provisions and other necessities to the sufferers along the coast.

NAVY-YARD FACILITIES.

In the event of a war with any maritime Power our battles are to be fought upon the sea and not upon the land—by our fleets, not by our armies. No nation of Europe can transport any considerable military force to our shores, but should it be attempted, they would be met upon the ocean and there arrested by our Navy, if it is maintained in a condition at all commensurate with our maritime ability, and such as common prudence admonishes us to have always ready to be put in commission. Our floating bulwarks, not less than our harbor fortifications, should receive attention; for, though peace now prevails, and we hope and expect its continuance, there may be war in the not remote future, for which a wise and prudent Government should be always prepared.

We are also admonished by the experience of the past that among contending belligerents the rights of neutrals are not always respected; and the best guarantee against aggression is a timely exhibition of our ability to maintain the honor and rights of the country.

Unfortunate would be our condition should the country be suddenly involved in hostilities with one of the principal maritime Powers were we no better prepared than when the late rebellion commenced. Our navy-yards and establishments were then wholly inadequate to our wants, and a large portion of the work was consequently executed, often at great disadvantage and with great delay, by private parties. This defect has been but partially remedied, for, notwithstanding our experience and the improvements which have been made, none of the navy-yards possess the area and appliances, nor have they the necessary establishments and machinery for manufacturing engines and armature, nor are we providing from the abundant means which the country possesses the materials that should be collected in anticipation of the national wants.

In none of our navy-yards is there more than a single dry-dock, and there are but six in all—three built of stone and three floating docks. In the event of a maritime war this deficiency would be seriously felt—perhaps to a greater extent than any other of our pressing wants—and it is worthy of consideration whether steps should not be taken without delay to place our naval establishments in this respect in a condition approaching, at least, our relative importance with other naval Powers. The dock-yards at Cherbourg and Toulon in France, and at Portsmouth in Great Britain, each contain a greater number of dry-docks than all our yards combined; and some of the other dock-yards of these Powers are but slightly inferior to those named. While Great Britain, France, and other maritime Powers are increasing their dry-dock facilities, already far greater than ours, we are doing nothing in this direction.

These and kindred subjects have been adverted to in preceding reports, and need not be recapitulated in detail, but could not be wholly omitted.

REDUCTION OF THE FORCE IN NAVY-YARDS.

A reduction of the working force in the navy-yards was commenced soon after the close of the war by gradually dismissing the most inefficient and unreliable mechanics and laborers, and retaining only the experts and most faithful hands for continued permanent employment. This arrangement, while it relieved the Department of the least profitable employees, secured a body of skillful mechanics on whom the Government could always depend, and who would form a nucleus to initiate others in any emergency. Hulls which had been commenced in the navy-yards during the war were in progress of construction and yet unfinished at its close, for which engines were building under contracts. To employ a small force of the best mechanics to complete in due time the work on these vessels was considered true economy, and for the best interests of the Government in all respects. But the action of Congress has necessitated a further reduction, so that but a remnant of that body of superior mechanics who were employed during the war remains, and they are engaged almost exclusively in the repair and refitment of vessels. These reductions have introduced changes, and suggestions for improvements in other particulars have led to reforms, and a reorganization of the management and government of the several navy-yards. Of the large gangs of workmen that were employed in each of the mechanical departments so few are retained in any of the branches that masters to supervise the workmen are no longer required, and they have accordingly been gradually dispensed with as the work has diminished. Foremen and quarter-men, who are skillful mechanics, now perform the service which was assigned to masters when the yards were filled with mechanics.

These reforms, and a more correct distribution of navy-yard duties among the several bureaus, which constitutes an essential feature in the reorganization, whereby a more close and rigid accountability prevails, have saved annually many thousand dollars to the Government at each of the navy-yards.

Congress, by reducing the day's labor of those who work for the Government to eight hours instead of ten, has imposed on the Department, as a necessity, the employment of a larger number of hands to execute the same amount of work; and if it was intended that the per diem compensation for a working day of ten hours in outside establishments should, under the statute, fix the rate of wages in navy-yards, twenty per cent. is added to the cost of labor.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Report of the Secretary of the Navy.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

The estimates for labor for the current year were based on the standard which had always previously been recognized and observed, but Congress, while diminishing the appropriations below the estimates, also lessened the amount of labor to be daily rendered by each individual workman. While, therefore, the Department is furnished with less means, it is compelled to employ one-fifth more laborers than in preceding years for the same amount of work.

To preserve and protect the vessels and other property at our navy-yards is a duty prompted by economy and dictated by a proper regard for the public interest. Work should not be wholly suspended on the ships which have been commenced and are yet unfinished; but they should be completed and gradually launched, and brought into service as they may be wanted. If properly protected they can remain on the stocks for years without injury, after the hulls are finished. Each vessel, when she returns from a cruise, should be at once repaired and placed in an efficient condition. Hulls and engines, after long service in different climates, become worn and injured, and, if neglected, will rapidly decay. It cannot be true economy to withhold appropriations essential for full and thorough repairs, for completing improvements which have been commenced, and for protecting and affording facilities necessary to the good order, proper condition, and efficiency of the navy-yards and navy establishments. In some respects the public interest has been made to suffer from neglect or refusal to make sufficient appropriations for the purposes herein indicated, and it is earnestly recommended that such omission be hereafter avoided.

NAVAL ACADEMY.

Vice Admiral Porter continues in charge of the Naval Academy. The high standing of the institution continues to be maintained, and the officers yearly added to the service possess the advantage of excellent academic culture with professional discipline. The number of graduates at the close of the last academic year was seventy-nine; the number of admissions the present year, forty-nine; total number of midshipmen now at the Academy, two hundred and eighty-six. At the commencement of their practice cruise the current year the midshipmen visited the Military Academy at West Point, where they spent several days in competing exercises and in the interchange of hospitalities. Two of the vessels, the Savannah and Macedonian, then sailed for the Azores, touched at Madeira on their way home, and arrived at Annapolis on the 20th of August. The Dale returned and cruised in Chesapeake bay with the midshipmen who entered in June, and who compose the present fourth class.

Since the passage of the act of March 2, 1865, until the formation of the present class, I have appointed no midshipmen from the States which were excluded from representation; but the admission of Representatives during the current year, though at a late period, has led to the recommendation and appointment of several midshipmen from those States.

The Academy grounds have been enlarged during the year by the purchase of a portion of the farm known as "Strawberry Hill," and a conditional agreement has been made for securing the remainder of this property should Congress make the necessary appropriation.

NAVAL APPRENTICES.

The act of June 17, 1868, limits the number of persons authorized to be enlisted into the Navy, including apprentices and boys, to eight thousand five hundred, and no more. This limitation, which is actually below the maximum which existed prior to the war, has compelled the Department to reduce the number of naval apprentices. A discontinuance of general enlistments was ordered immediately on the passage of the act, and discharges have taken place to such an extent as to require the Department to put one of the school-ships out of commission. The necessity for this step is to be regretted, because a policy had been adopted for the future of the Navy which, if properly encouraged and sustained, would have furnished both the naval and commercial marine with a body of mariners of unsurpassed excellence. In preceding reports I have stated very fully the plan and purpose which seemed to be necessary, in order to supply the Government and country with seamen to man our ships, and Congress until the present year was understood to have approved the object. Those familiar with the subject are aware that the naval changes which have taken place and are in progress by the introduction of steam, together with the fact of greater inducements to engage in other pursuits, are diminishing the class of man-of-war's men on which we have hitherto depended, and who are fast disappearing.

In point of economy as well as of efficiency it is not to be questioned that the apprentice system, well regulated and maintained, would be of immense benefit to the Government and country. Commencing their profession in early life, apprentices would receive a thorough nautical education, qualifying them to discharge, at the age of eighteen, all the duties of ordinary seamen, and disciplined and trained to the performance of their duties they would become experts, and able to render invaluable service.

I am unable to perceive reasons for including naval apprentices within the established number of persons employed in the naval service, and the effect must necessarily be to limit their number, and check a system so auspiciously commenced, if it does not wholly defeat the great object intended.

SURVEY OF THE NORTH PACIFIC.

In view of the rapidly increasing intercourse between western America and Asia, of the growing commerce of the Pacific States, and of the important and various interests which are springing up in connection with our recent extensive acquisitions, it is important that a more complete and systematic survey should be made of the North Pacific ocean. The naval vessels on the station continue to perform some useful but necessarily limited and irregular surveys over that extensive and partially explored field, but the period has arrived when something more effective should be done. Our rising States on the Pacific, our increasing intimacy with the islands of that ocean, our growing trade with China and Japan, and the vast and varied interests and plans of commercial enterprise which are opening from the Indian ocean to the islands on the north, demand of us our proper contribution to the cause of navigation and nautical science. In a region where we have such a length of coast line, such large possessions, and such a wonderfully expanding commerce, inviting the enterprise and capital of our citizens, the United States are interested beyond any other Power in giving security to the mariners who traverse that ocean.

Attention is especially invited to Brooks or Midway Islands, discovered a few years ago and recently surveyed by order of this Department. The charts of the survey represent two islands inclosed in a lagoon, forming a perfectly secure harbor, accessible to vessels drawing less than twenty feet, and affording an abundant supply of pure, fresh water. These islands, which are uninhabited and unoccupied, are situated about midway between California and Eastern Asia, on the track of the mail steamships, and furnish the only known refuge for vessels passing directly between the two continents.

It is represented by the naval officers who made the survey, and also by Rear Admiral Thatcher, lately in command of the North Pacific squadron, that the bar at the entrance of the harbor might be deepened at a very small expense, and a port vastly superior to Honolulu be thus opened to mariners, where a depot might be established for the supply of provisions, water, and fuel to the ocean steam lines, and a refuge afforded to merchant ships navigating that ocean. The importance of taking possession of these islands and making the proposed improvements can scarcely be over-estimated, and should not be delayed.

IRON-CLADS.

The Department has continued previous arrangements for the custody and preservation of the iron-clad fleet which it has on hand. These vessels can be serviceable only in time of war, and the probabilities are that with a prolonged peace they will, from corrosion and other causes, greatly deteriorate and not unlikely become useless before they will be needed for service. In the meantime their keeping and proper care are attended with considerable annual expense, and at no very distant period a large outlay, almost equal to the construction of new vessels, will be required to put them in sailing and fighting condition.

Since the passage of the joint resolution authorizing their sale but two have been disposed of—the Catawba and Onetota, of a class of eight vessels similar in all respects—at their appraised value, $755,000, which has been paid into the general Treasury, as directed, and not applied to the purposes of this Department. Exception was taken to this sale and transfer, and Congress, through a committee, ordered an investigation. Delay and embarrassment followed to the annoyance of the foreign Government which was indirectly the purchaser, and the effect has been to deter other Powers from offering to make purchases, and such of our countrymen as interested themselves to effect sales, as a business operation, have apparently abandoned their efforts.

It has been and still is the opinion of the Department that the true policy of the Government is to dispose, if possible, of all the vessels of the classes whose sale has been authorized by Congress. To keep them entails a large annual expense upon the Government, and in a few years if unused they will become valueless as vessels of war, and will have to be broken up and disposed of as old material. It is worthy of consideration, therefore, whether they should not be sold, if opportunity offers, at less than their present appraisal.

PROMOTION OF OFFICERS.

The act of April 21, 1864, provides that "no line officer upon the active list below the grade of commodore, nor any other naval officer, shall be promoted to a higher grade until his mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform all his duties at sea shall be established to the satisfaction of a board of examining officers, to be appointed by the President of the United States," and unless he has "been examined by a board of naval surgeons and pronounced physically qualified to perform all his duties at sea." If not recommended for promotion by both of these boards the act directs that he "shall be placed upon the retired list."

Under the provisions of this act, young officers in the early stages of their active professional career are in some instances placed on the retired list and thus become pensioners for life, after having received an education at the public expense, without rendering any equivalent service. No discretionary power is conferred on the Secretary or President to permit a second examination, even if the officer shall have subsequently overcome the cause of failure, nor can any relief be granted, for the act is mandatory.

It may well be questioned whether any officer below the grade of lieutenant commander should be placed on the retired list for mental or professional disqualification, which is often the result of indolence or incapacity. In the case of an officer sent before a retiring board and who may be found incapacitated for active service, if it be shown that the disability or incompetency does not "result from long and faithful service, from wounds or injury received in the line of duty, from sickness or exposure therein, or from any other incident of service," the "officer may be retired upon furlough pay, or he shall be wholly retired from the service with one year's pay, at the discretion of the President." Were this rule made applicable to those officers in the lower grades who may fail to pass their examination for promotion no injustice would be done, and the Government would be relieved from the expense of pensioning for life incompetent and useless officers by wholly retiring them from the service on such failure, or on a second failure after a reasonable time for another examination.

LEAGUE ISLAND.

On the 17th of April last a proposed form of deed of this property, with accompanying papers, was received from the city of Philadelphia and transmitted to the Attorney General for examination, as required by statute. The investigation of the various titles involved has necessarily been protracted, and one or two points suggested by the Attorney General yet remain to be reported upon. It is thought that but a short time will elapse before the title will be perfected and the land become the property of the United States.

SITE ON THE THAMES RIVER FOR NAVAL PURPOSES.

In my last annual report it was stated that a tract of land, having a water front of not less than a mile on the Thames river, near New London, Connecticut, had been selected for transfer to the United States, under the provisions of a clause in the act making appropriations for the naval service, approved March 2, 1867. The deeds of the property were offered to the Government by the Governor of Connecticut on the 22d of May, and after examination by the Attorney General, as provided by law, were formally accepted on the 27th of June, 1868.

The act directing its acceptance provides that the property shall "be held by the United States for naval purposes," and good faith requires that action should be taken looking to its occupancy by some branch of the service. An appropriation will be needed for inclosing the land and for the care and preservation of the buildings. Soon after its acceptance Commodore T. A. Hunt was directed to take charge of the property and see that no depredations were made upon it, but for want of an appropriation nothing further has been attempted.

TIMBER LANDS.

In my annual report in 1866 attention was invited to the condition of the lands which had been set apart by the Government in certain States of the South for "the sole purpose of supplying timber for the Navy of the United States." A number of agents were for many years appointed, with considerable salaries and contingent expenses, to superintend these reservations and protect them from depredation; but while payment was promptly made for their supposed services, payment was also made for all timber used by the Navy. It is not known that any live oak was ever procured for the Navy from these reservations, which are located in Georgia, Mississippi, Florida, and Louisiana.

The agencies were discontinued during the rebellion, and since the restoration of peace no appropriations have been made to revive or continue them. A suggestion was made in a former report whether it would not be best for the Land Office to resume possession of these lands and put them in the market for sale. Should this not be done, an appropriation would seem to be advisable to pay such agents as may be appointed to protect these lands against trespassers.

PENSION LAWS.

The second section of an act relating to pensions, passed at the last session of Congress, provides "that no person shall be entitled to a pension by reason of wounds received or disease contracted in the service of the United States subsequently to the passage of this act, unless the person who was wounded or contracted the disease was in the line of duty;" and "if in the naval service, was at the time borne on the books of some ship or other vessel of the United States, at sea or in harbor, actually in commission, or was on his way, by direction of competent authority, to the United States, or to some other vessel or naval station." Some of the most hazardous duty in which naval officers are called upon to engage is discharged at shore stations, and when their names are not borne upon the books of a vessel actually in commission. It is manifestly unjust to deprive the family of an officer or seaman who may lose his life while engaged in proving a gun, or firing a salute, or "in the line of duty" in any other way, of the small pension heretofore allowed in such cases, because his name happens to be borne upon the books of the station instead of a vessel in the harbor actually in commission. Within the past month an officer who had been forty-two years in the service, has died of disease "contracted in the line of duty" on shore, and under the provisions of this act his family are deprived of a pension. It is recommended that the law be amended in this particular.

NAVAL PENSIONS.

The naval pension-roll on the 1st of November, 1868, was as follows:

1,175 invalids, annually receiving.....	$92,674 19
1,515 widows and children, receiving.....	247,152 00
36 invalids, under act March 2, 1867, receiving.....	4,466 00

2,726 persons, receiving a total amount of $347,031 19.

There has been during the year an increase on the pension list of 248 persons, calling for $27,202 96.

PRIZES AND PENSION FUND.

In my annual report for 1865 the proceeds of the sale of prizes captured during the war and adjudicated prior to the 1st of November of that year were given. Since that date most of the cases then in court have been determined, and upon the 1st of November of the present year the gross proceeds of such sales, as far as returned, amounted to $24,875,344 91; expenses as far as returned $1,828,000 86; net proceeds $23,029,627 57.

During the year the naval pension fund has been increased $1,000,000, making a total at the present time of $14,000,000.

The act of April 28, 1800, provided "that all moneys accruing or which have already accrued to the United States from the sale of prizes shall be and remain forever a fund for the payment of pensions and half-pay, should the same be hereafter granted to the officers and seamen who may be entitled to receive the same." In the revision of the prize law in 1862, when the country was engaged in war, this provision was reenacted, and subsequently, upon the recommendation of this Department, the Secretary of the Navy, as trustee of the fund, was authorized to invest it in registered securities of the United States, which was done at the same rate of interest the Government was paying to other creditors, namely, six per cent. in gold. The statute also provides that if the income of the fund is more than sufficient for the payment of pensions, "the surplus shall be applied to the making of further provisions for the comfort of the disabled officers, seamen, and marines."

In making this my annual report, and stating the condition of the fund, I have considered it my duty as trustee to present the foregoing extracts from the statutes pledging the public faith that the money arising from the sale of prizes shall be and forever remain a fund for the payment of naval pensions and for the investment in registered bonds bearing interest in gold. It is difficult to reconcile the act of July last, which reduces the interest to three per cent. in currency, with the pledged faith previously given, which involves the national honor. Had this loan been made to States or individuals on the terms specified the contract would have been literally fulfilled. This fund belongs unquestionably to the officers, seamen, and marines of the Navy, who, by their courage, activity, and enterprise, stimulated by the pledged faith of the Government, captured the prizes from the avails of which the fund is derived. The income at the reduced rate of interest—less than is paid by the Government for any other loan, and payable in what is called "lawful money" instead of coin, which is always lawful, and which was originally specified when the loan was made—may be sufficient to meet the necessary disbursements for the pensions at the rates now established. But had not the income been reduced over fifty per cent. by the act of July last, the rate of naval pensions might be increased, and I should have felt it a duty to renew my recommendation for a revision of the naval pension laws for that purpose at the present session of Congress.

I cannot in justice to the distinguished naval officers who have rendered invaluable service to the country, and by their gallantry contributed largely to this fund, omit again calling attention to the fact that the present pension laws make no provision for pensions to the families of the admiral, vice admiral, rear admirals, commodores, and other grades of the line and staff, and again urging that suitable provision be made in each of these cases.

mates, to accept the policy so emphatically indicated of the wishes of Congress, and to limit their estimates to the amount necessary for the wants of the service, based upon the authorized number of men, and what is absolutely required to keep in repair and to preserve the public property. Should it be thought advisable to place the navy-yards in more efficient condition, befitting the requirements of the country and the service, former reports can be referred to for statements of improvements considered essential, or should the views of the Department in these respects, or as regards any branch of the service be desired, they will be promptly furnished.

Since the close of the war the estimates of this Department and the appropriations of Congress have, until the present year, been based on a maximum of 15,000 enlisted men. Although the appropriations authorized the enlistment and payment of this number, the Department in organizing the squadrons has employed no more than the necessities of the service on a moderate naval peace establishment required. Less than 12,000 men were enlisted, leaving a reserve of over 3,000 to be called into service in case of emergency. It has been the policy of the Department, while under my administration, to present in each annual report the actual condition of the service in all its branches, with ample estimates for every requirement and proposed improvement. Congress and the country have thus been fully apprised of the necessities and purposes of the Department, and deficiency bills at subsequent sessions have been avoided.

When Congress convened one year ago, and the Department learned informally that it was the intention to reduce the service one half, to defer the completion of vessels which had been commenced, and for which engines had been contracted before the war terminated, and to discontinue improvements in the navy-yards, the estimates were at once revised and made to conform to the new condition of things. The Department had not been consulted in regard to this reduction, nor informed that any change from the then existing number was designed; nor was any time allowed to recall from distant stations the vessels which were to be dispensed with in order that the squadrons might be graduated by the new standard. Measures were, however, promptly adopted upon the passage of the act to reduce the number to the legal limitation, which was accomplished by the 1st of September.

The estimates now submitted are for eight thousand five hundred men, including apprentices, the number established by the act approved on the 17th of last June. Should Congress at its present session enlarge or diminish the number now authorized, the appropriations should be made necessarily to correspond, and the estimates which follow must conform to existing legislation.

THE BUREAUS.

The accompanying reports of the chiefs of the several bureaus, and of the commandant of the Marine corps, give a summary of the operations of their several departments during the year, and are referred to for full information upon points which can here be only briefly alluded to.

The chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks details with minuteness the improvements made in the several navy-yards, and gives a statement of the work now in progress, and what is considered absolutely necessary, with the closest economy, for the repair of the buildings and the care of the public property. The channel of the Wallabout bay, at the New York navy-yard, has so far filled up as to cause much embarrassment in the docking and moving of heavy ships, and an appropriation will be required for the purpose of dredging. Another effort to obtain from the State of New York jurisdiction over the recently purchased Ruggles property has been made, and failed in consequence of local opposition. Nothing has been done, for want of an appropriation, with the property at New London, the title to which has been received from the State of Connecticut.

The chief of the Bureau of Ordnance reports that very large amounts of ordnance and ordnance stores, accumulated during the war, still remain on hand, the subsequent wants of the service having made no material diminution in the quantity. Their value is estimated to be about seventeen million dollars, and the charges for their preservation make considerable drafts on the small appropriation allowed for ordnance expenditure. Experimental operations have ceased entirely, but the chief of the bureau recommends an appropriation for renewing them, the solution of the ordnance problem being the principal condition to a successful determination of the proper armature as well as armament of efficient war vessels.

The chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting reports that, owing to the reduction of the naval force, the only contract made for the current year is for ten thousand tons of coal at $3 38 per ton. The board appointed to test the comparative tensile strength of wire and hemp rope report that the experiments show that wire rope of less than half the diameter of hemp fully equals the latter in strength. Its manufacture and use is therefore recommended. During the year three hundred and sixty tons of hemp have been manufactured into cordage. The reduction of the naval force to the number authorized by law was accomplished on the 1st of September. The necessity of providing by legislation for a more effective punishment for the crime of desertion is again urged.

The chief of the Bureau of Navigation reports that the usual duties of providing, distributing, and keeping navigation supplies have been satisfactorily performed during the year. Particular attention has been given to the subject of navy chronometers and compasses, and means have been taken to diffuse among naval officers information embodying the results of special inquiries and official experience concerning this subject. The rapidly increasing interests of the United States in the waters of the Pacific and Indian oceans render it desirable that there should be speedily inaugurated a series of surveys of the waters between the American and Asiatic coasts, from Behring's Straits to the Sandwich Islands. It is also suggested that our Navy should do its part toward a resurvey of the western coast of South America, rendered necessary by extensive hydrographical changes produced by the recent earthquakes in that region. The number of naval apprentices on board the apprentice ship is 197; on board cruising vessels, 271; making the total number in the service on the 30th of September 468. The accompanying reports of the Superintendents of the Naval Observatory and Nautical Almanac show the transactions of their respective institutions during the year, and make suggestions for the future.

The chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair states that, in consequence of the reduced appropriations, the work upon all new vessels has been suspended, except on the four small ones referred to in his last annual report, and that the repair of vessels has been strictly limited to the few necessary to maintain our squadrons abroad, no labor being done upon returning vessels. It is suggested that it would be ultimate economy to place these vessels in efficient condition, as the defects increase very rapidly as their repair is postponed. The enormous loss arising from building ships with unseasoned timber is again adverted to, and a special appropriation of about five hundred thousand dollars for two or three years, for the purpose of gradually accumulating a supply of timber in the navy-yards, is recommended. Such was formerly the policy of the Government, but the materials accumulated were exhausted during the war. The necessity of proper tools and workshops to enable us to maintain our standing as a first-class Power is also alluded to. There is no suitable place for the construction of iron and armored vessels or for other necessary work, and an appropriation of $3,000,000 or $4,000,000, the expenditure of which could be judiciously extended through several years, will be necessary to place the navy-yards in proper condition for these purposes.

The chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering reports that the work in his department is reduced to the lowest possible limit, and that in consequence of the small appropriation at his disposal, and the nominal amount being virtually reduced twenty per cent. from its former value by the reduction by Congress of the hours of labor from ten to eight, he is enabled to make but few repairs on steamers returning from foreign service and which should be put in readiness for another cruise. The present condition of the new engines for which vessels have not been provided is stated. The results of the trial of competitive machinery, designed by the bureau and by several private parties, is clearly and elaborately set forth. It is urged that increased facilities for the manufacture of machinery should be provided to enable the Government itself, in any contingency that may arise, to manufacture and repair its own engines without resorting to outside establishments.

The chief of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing recommends a change in the method of supplying the outfit of the sailor. In the military service the necessary clothing of the soldier is furnished by the Government, while in the Navy the sailor is not only required to pay for his clothing, but for his hammock, bedding, &c., his total outfit costing at present prices eighty-five dollars. This, with his cash advance of from forty to sixty dollars, brings him largely in debt to the Government at the commencement of his cruise, and is both discouraging and demoralizing, and gives great temptation to desertion. It is suggested that some portion of the needed articles be supplied gratuitously. During the year the surplus stores have been reduced, the naval depot at St. Paul de Loando discontinued, and the stores at Panama transferred from the shore to a store-ship. An increase of the compensation of clerks in the pay department upon shore stations is recommended.

The chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery gives interesting tables showing the sickness, deaths, &c., at the several hospitals and naval stations, and in the squadrons, so classified as to exhibit the prevalence of different forms of disease upon different stations. During the year there were 20,751 cases under treatment, of which number 360 died, 19,691 were returned to duty or discharged the service, leaving 700 cases under treatment at the end of the year 1867. The proportion of cases treated to the whole number of persons in the service was about 1.53, or each person was on the sick list 1.53 times during the year; the proportion of deaths .026, and the percentage of deaths to the whole number of cases treated is .017, or less than two per cent. The total number of deaths from October 1, 1867, to September 30, 1868, was 315. The total number of insane in the Government asylum during the year is 29; deaths and discharges, 9; leaving 20 in the institution on the 30th September, 1868. The fund for the support of naval hospitals, derived from a monthly tax of twenty cents upon the pay of officers amounting, on the 1st of October, 1868, to $434,500 98. For a particular statement of the condition and wants of the several hospitals, &c., reference is made to the report.

The commandant of the Marine corps reports the force in the best possible condition of efficiency and discipline, and the barracks and public property in their charge well cared for and in admirable order. A reduction of the force corresponding to that of the naval service has been made, and the entire strength of the corps, officers and men, is now but 2,500. The marine barracks in Washington, built of indifferent material nearly seventy years ago, are represented as rapidly crumbling to decay, and in such a dilapidated condition that it will be impossible for the troops much longer to occupy them. The necessity for the erection of new barracks, which has been repeatedly urged, is again respectfully recommended.

CONCLUSION.

In this my eighth annual report it is a satisfaction to state that the year now drawing to its close has been one of peaceful but active cruising on the part of the Navy. Our commerce and shipping interests, if less extensive than they were eight years ago, are nevertheless as vigilantly guarded and protected.

It has fallen to my lot to sustain a greater responsibility, and to have had a much more eventful and varied as well as a longer experience in this Department than any one of my predecessors. While I claim no exemption from error, it is a gratifying reflection that the duties intrusted to me have been acceptably performed, and that the record which commemorates the services and achievements of our naval heroes also bears evidence, through a most important period of our country's history, of a not unsuccessful administration of our naval affairs.

On this Department, soon after I entered it, devolved the task of creating within a brief period a navy unequalled in some respects, and without a parallel, of enforcing the most extensive blockade which was ever established, of projecting and carrying forward to successful execution immense naval expeditions, of causing our extensive rivers, almost continental in their reach, to be actively patrolled; and finally, after four years of embittered warfare, of retiring the immense naval armament which had been promptly called into existence, of disposing to the commercial marine the vessels procured from that service, and of reestablishing our squadrons abroad in the interest of peace.

The waste of war is always great, but much of the expenditure of the Navy Department, which is but a small per cent. of the national war expenses, is invested in navy-yard improvements, which are worth to the Government all they cost, and in naval vessels and ordnance, which have at all times an intrinsic value. When the fact of this large amount of property on hand, of the return of millions to the Treasury, of the magnitude of the war, of the vast operations of the Navy, and of the depreciation of the currency, and the consequently enhanced prices with which those operations were conducted are considered, the economical and faithful administration of the Navy Department will be admitted.

My acknowledgments are due to the gentlemen who in their several grades have been associated with me in the discharge of the laborious and responsible duties of this Department, for the able and efficient service which they have rendered. In the choice of my assistants, of the chiefs of the several bureaus, and of others who have participated in the civil administration of this Department, as also in the selection and assignment to duty in the Navy of the officers whose meritorious conduct and heroic achievements have illumined our history and given enduring renown to the Navy, I esteem myself to have been most fortunate, and I cannot close this report without expressing towards each my sense of grateful obligations, and commending them to the gratitude of the Government and country.

GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

To the PRESIDENT.

Report of the Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
December 3, 1868.

SIR: The ordinary postal revenue for the year ended the 30th day of June last was $16,292,600 80, and the expenditures during the same period, including service for which special appropriations were made, $22,730,592 65; showing an excess of expenditures of $6,437,991 85.

The receipts from postages, as compared with the previous year, show an increase of six per cent., and the expenditures an increase of eighteen per cent.

The ordinary expenses, not including mail transportation for which special appropriations were made, were $21,555,592 65; and the receipts, including the amount drawn under the acts making appropriations for carrying "free mail matter," were $20,092,600 80; showing an excess of expenditures of $1,462,991 85.

The receipts of the Department were, from postages, $16,292,600 80; the amounts drawn from the Treasury under acts making appropriations for "carrying free matter," $3,800,000; and under the acts making special appropriations for "overland mail and marine service between New York and California," $1,125,000; "steamship service between San Francisco, Japan, and China," $125,000; between the "United States and Brazil," $150,000; for "carrying the mail on routes established by acts passed during the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress," $486,525; and "for preparing and publishing post route maps," $10,000; making the receipts from all sources $21,989,125 80. The expenditures of all kinds were, as above stated, $22,730,592 65; showing an excess of expenditures over receipts of $741,466 85, for which a special appropriation will be required.

The revenue account stated by the Auditor (see Appendix) differs from the foregoing because of his adding to the receipts of the Department, from all sources, a balance of $1,494,469 98, standing to the credit of the revenue account July 1, 1867, but which is not immediately available.

The estimates for the current fiscal year, as submitted to Congress with the last annual report, showed an anticipated deficiency of $3,296,000; to meet which there was then in the Treasury $2,000,000, being the unexpended balances of former appropriations standing to the credit of the Department, leaving the amount to be provided by appropriation from the general Treasury $1,296,000. Of this sum Congress appropriated $800,000.

The expenses during the fiscal year just closed exceeded the estimated amount, especially in the item of transportation, and thus absorbed the $2,000,000 relied on to assist in meeting the anticipated deficiency for the current year. The ordinary expenditures for the current year were also estimated too low, from the fact that the Department could not, at the time the estimates were made, anticipate the extraordinary increase of service established by acts of Congress. Taking those of the last fiscal year as a basis, it is anticipated that in the current year there will be a deficiency of $3,604,500. There will also be required $97,000 for service on the route from Fort Abercrombie to Helena, Montana, authorized by the act of July 27, 1868, from January 1, 1869, to June 30, 1869; and to meet the increased liabilities of the Department for service on the "overland route," $161,000, making $3,862,500, which will be required to meet deficiencies in the receipts for the current fiscal year.

The accompanying report of the Auditor fully sets forth the details of the financial operations of the Department.

ESTIMATES FOR 1870.

The ordinary expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1870, (including $645,260 for overland and sea mails to California,) are estimated at..... $24,540,413
The ordinary revenue is estimated at..... $17,100,000
Add the standing appropriations for carrying free mail matter..... 700,000

Making the total estimated revenue... 17,800,000

Showing an excess of expenditures of..... $6,740,413 to be provided for from the general Treasury.

It will also be necessary to make the usual special appropriations, as follows:

Mail steamship service between San Francisco, Japan, and China..... $500,000
Mail steamship service between the United States and Brazil..... 150,000
Mail steamship service between San Francisco and the Sandwich Islands..... 75,000

Comparative statements of revenues and expenditures, exclusive of appropriations for special service, per capita:

Revenues from postage, &c., 1850.....	$5,499,985 00	23 7-10 cents.
Expenditures, 1850.....	5,212,953 00	22 1-2 cents.

Proportion of revenue to expenditures.....		76 per cent.

The following are some of the results of these statements:

First. From 1850 to 1860 the revenue per unit of population increased $14\frac{3}{10}$ per cent., or at the rate of $1\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. per year. From 1860 to 1868 the like increase was $58\frac{3}{10}$ per cent., or $7\frac{1}{10}$ per cent. per year.

Hence the annual increase of revenue for the eight years of the current decade is, per capita, about five times greater than the same annual increase of the preceding decade.

Second. From 1850 to 1860 the ordinary expenditures per unit of population increased 110 per cent., or 11 per cent. per year. From 1860 to 1868 the like expenditures increased $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., or $2\frac{1}{10}$ per cent. per year.

Hence the annual per capita increase of ordinary expenditures for the last eight years is about five times less than the same annual increase for the preceding ten years.

Comparing these two results, relative to the annual average of the present and preceding decade, it appears that, per capita, the revenues have increased about fivefold, and that the expenditures have diminished about fivefold.

POSTAGE STAMPS AND STAMPED ENVELOPES.

During the year, 383,470,500 postage stamps, of the value of \$11,751,014, (including 160,000 periodical stamps, valued at \$14,750;) 44,552,300 plain stamped envelopes, representing \$1,285,218; 25,469,750 stamped envelopes, bearing printed cards and requests for return to writers, representing \$759,520; and 3,872,600 newspaper-wrappers, valued at \$67,872, were issued. The aggregate value of these issues was \$13,863,124, being an increase of $3\frac{1}{10}$ per cent. over the issues of the previous year.

The issue of ordinary postage stamps, as compared with the previous year, shows an increase in value of $1\frac{1}{10}$ per cent.; periodical stamps, $11\frac{3}{10}$ per cent.; stamped envelopes, bearing cards and requests, $53\frac{1}{10}$ per cent.; and the newspaper wrappers, $81\frac{3}{10}$ per cent. The issue of plain stamped envelopes was $\frac{1}{10}$ per cent. less than during the year ending 30th June, 1867; thus showing the preference of the public for the envelopes denominated "request" or card envelopes.

The aggregate issue of envelopes was increased during the year $14\frac{5}{10}$ per cent. in value.

The sale of postage stamps and stamped envelopes during the year, as reported by the

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Auditor, was $14,066,139 82, or $208,015 82 more than the issue; thus absorbing to that amount the stock remaining unsold in the hands of postmasters June 30, 1867.

The number of packages of postage stamps lost in the mails during the year was thirty-three, representing $2,672 20; and of stamped envelopes seven, valued at $226 01.

CONTRACTS.

Transportation Statistics.

There were in the service of the Department on the 30th June, 1868, 6,891 contractors for the transportation of the mails.

Of mail routes in operation there were 8,226; aggregate length, 216,928 miles; aggregate annual transportation, 84,224,325 miles; aggregate annual cost, $10,266,056; including the compensation of postal railway clerks, route agents, local agents, mail messengers, mail-route messengers, and baggage-masters in charge of mails, namely, $1,114,633, the aggregate annual cost was $11,380,689. This service was divided as follows, namely:

Railroad routes: length, 86,018 miles; annual transportation, 34,886,178 miles; annual cost, $4,177,126, about twelve cents per mile.

Steamboat routes: length, 19,647 miles; annual transportation, 3,797,560 miles; annual cost, $650,631, about seventeen and thirteen hundredths cents per mile.

Celerity, certainty, and security: length, 161,263 miles; annual transportation, 45,540,587 miles; annual cost, $5,488,299, about twelve cents per mile.

The length of routes was increased over the preceding year 13,683 miles; the annual transportation, 5,241,536 miles, and cost, $929,770; to which add increased cost for railway postal clerks, route, local, and other agents, $93,762, making an aggregate of $1,023,562.

Overland Mail.

The contracts with Holladay and Dinsmore for the transportation of the overland mail for the Territories and the Pacific coast expired on the 30th of September last. To provide for the service thereafter, the Department, by public advertisement dated March 9, 1868, invited proposals, to be received until the 10th of June following, and decided by the 15th of the same month, for conveying the mail from October 1, 1868, to June 30, 1870, dividing the service into three routes, as follows, namely:

1. No. 16635. From Cheyenne, Dakota, or that point on the Union Pacific railroad to which the mails might be conveyed when this service should go into operation, to Virginia City, Nevada, 1,095 miles, and back, daily; the trip to be performed in nine days each way in summer, and twelve days in winter; the service and pay to be curtailed pro rata as each fifty miles of the Union Pacific railroad should be completed westward; and the Department reserving the right to curtail the service at its western terminus, when the eastward progress of the Central Pacific railroad should be sufficient to warrant the starting of the western mails from a point on the railroad rather than from Virginia City.

2. No. 14167. From Coyote, Kansas, the end of the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, to Denver, Colorado, 265 miles, and back, daily; the trip to be performed in seventy-two hours each way; and the service and pay to be curtailed pro rata as the railroad should be extended westward.

3. No. 17035. From Cheyenne, Dakota, to Denver, Colorado, 102 miles, and back, daily; the trip to be performed in twenty-four hours each way.

For route No. 16635, the following proposals were received under the advertisement, namely: Louis McLane, president Wells, Fargo & Co., $1,314,000 per annum; John Allman and John H. Clark, $460,000; Charles A. Cook, $390,000; Charles McLaughlin, $350,000; Carlton Spaid, $335,000.

For route No. 14167, Louis McLane, president Wells, Fargo & Co., $84,000; Charles A. Cook, $79,000; Carlton Spaid, $49,000; Henry S. Wheeler, $45,000; W. B. Hawkes, $24,600.

For route No. 17035, Charles A. Cook, $20,000; Louis McLane, president Wells, Fargo & Co., $17,800; Carlton Spaid, $15,000; Henry S. Wheeler, $12,000; L. H. Johnston, $9,970 50.

The Department accordingly, on the 15th June, accepted the bid of Carlton Spaid, at $335,000, on route 16635; that of W. B. Hawkes, at $24,600, on route 14167; and that of L. H. Johnston, at $9,970 50, on route 17035; and the accepted bidders were duly notified.

On the 23d of September following, upon representations that it was impracticable to stock the road from the terminus of the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, to Denver, (route 14167), in consequence of raids by hostile Indians, and that the service was unimportant, the mails for Denver being transmissible with almost equal speed via Omaha and Cheyenne, and upon the recommendation and advice of the United States Senators and Representative from Kansas the Department issued an order to rescind the acceptance of the bid of W. B. Hawkes and dispense with service on the route.

During the month of September, Carlton Spaid, the accepted bidder on route 16635, wrote the Department that, Congress having passed a law since the contract was awarded to him the effect of which would be to throw upon this route the documentary and newspaper mails formerly transmitted by the isthmus route, he should expect additional pay pro rata for every pound of such matter, and that he desired to be informed, as near as possible, what amount of such matter there would be, and for what additional amount of pay the Department would be responsible. The Department replied by furnishing him with transcripts of reports on its files showing the weights of the mails transmitted both by the overland and the isthmus routes, which contained all the information it possessed on the subject, and remarking that it would expect him to carry the mail strictly according to the terms of the contract; "using therefore such means" (quoting the language of the contract) "as may be necessary to transport the whole of said mail, whatever may be its size or weight." Whereupon, on the 29th September, Spaid gave notice that he had come to the conclusion to decline to transport any mail over the route; and on the 2d October the Department received telegrams, dated the 1st, from its special agent and from the postmaster at Salt Lake City, reporting the failure of Spaid to put the service in operation. A dispatch was immediately transmitted to the next lowest bidder, Charles McLaughlin, at San Francisco, inquiring whether he would carry the mail at his bid, ($350,000,) and how soon he could commence the service. His reply, received on the 7th, showed that he would require thirty days to prepare for the service. On the 9th, Wells, Fargo & Co., who, as sub-contractors under Holladay and Dinsmore, had carried the mails on their routes for some time prior to the expiration of their contract term, and had continued the service upon the failure of Spaid, gave notice to the Department that they could not continue this temporary service longer than the 10th. An inquiry was thereupon telegraphed to the Department's special agent at Salt Lake City, whether arrangements could be made to carry the letter mail between the termini of the Union and Central Pacific railroads, and at what cost. He replied on the 10th that he could find no one prepared to carry the mails as designated except Wells, Fargo & Co. A dispatch was then sent to Brigham Young, at Salt Lake City, inviting a proposal for the service. He replied on the 11th, offering to carry fifteen hundred pounds per day for eight months at $559,375, with an allowance of 10 cents per pound per 100 miles for all additional mail, remarking that grain was now three prices, consequent on the destruction of crops by grasshoppers, and that to put service on the route for the short period of eight months would require proportionately a much higher rate of payment than would be required were the contract to extend for several years. On the same date an offer was submitted on behalf of the Union Pacific railroad to contract for the service for one year at $1,500,000. Telegrams of the 12th, received on the 13th, notified the department of the stoppage of the temporary service and the accumulation of mails on the route. On the 16th Charles McLaughlin inquired by telegraph whether the contract would be given to him at his bid. The Department replied that it would on condition that he would commence the service immediately. To this he made no answer. And on the 21st the Postmaster General, having, with the Second Assistant Postmaster General, repaired to the city of New York, and consulted with Senator Morgan, Senator Cole, of California, Horace Greeley, Isaac Sherman, Postmaster Kelly, and other leading citizens of New York, under their advice accepted a proposition from Wells, Fargo & Co. to carry the mails between the termini of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific railroads daily for the term of one year, or until the two railroads meet, at the rate of $1,750,000 per annum, subject to deduction pro rata for every section of fifty miles of railroad completed and reported to the Department ready to carry the mails, it being estimated that the gap between the railroads covered by the stage service will be lessened at the rate of fifty miles every fifteen days, or a hundred miles a month, and that it will be closed up entirely by the 1st of August, 1869, and that upon this basis the pay to Wells, Fargo & Co., under their accepted proposal, will amount in all to about $670,000.

Early in October a Senator from Kansas, the principal public officers of Colorado, and other prominent citizens of the State and Territory, began to urge the restoration of service on the route (No. 14167) from the terminus of the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, to Denver, representing it to be indispensable; and finally Major General Sheridan, in command of the department of the Missouri, with the concurrence of the Secretary of War, gave assurance that the route was guarded, and would be during the Indian troubles, and that the service was important both to the citizens and soldiers in Colorado. The accepted bidder being released by the order rescinding the acceptance of his bid, the contract was offered to the next lowest bidder, Henry S. Wheeler, who declined; and a temporary arrangement was made on the 31st October, with Wells, Fargo & Co., to carry the mails till 1st July, 1869, at the rate of $79,000 per annum, subject to deduction pro rata for every fifty miles of railroad completed and reported to the Department ready to carry the mail—the rate being that of the bid next above Wheeler's, excepting that of Spaid, the failing contractor on route 16635.

On the remaining route the accepted bidder, L. H. Johnston, having failed, the Department accepted an offer from Wells, Fargo & Co. to perform the service for one year, from 1st October, 1868, at the rate of Johnston's bid, namely: $9,970 50 per annum.

Under the arrangements thus made, the overland mail service on the three routes is now in regular operation.

TERRITORIAL MAILS.

In the last annual report allusion was made to the route from Fort Abercrombie, Dakota, to Helena, Montana, (or the route from St. Cloud to Pembina,) intended to provide direct mail communication to the Territories of Montana, Idaho, and Washington. It was stated that in consequence of Indian hostilities on nearly the whole of the line the service was unreliable, of no value to the Department, and would be discontinued in the spring unless a marked improvement occurred. As there was no improvement, the service was discontinued from March 30, 1868; but at the last session of Congress a resolution was adopted, as follows:

"Resolved, &c., That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to change the character of the mail service from Fort Abercrombie, Dakota Territory, to Helena, Montana Territory, to post-coach service."

No service existed on the route at the date of this resolution, and the resolution is not mandatory in its terms; but, considering it as indicating that the legislative will required that the mail should be carried, and on post-coaches, and acting on the supposition that a special appropriation would be made to meet the expense, an advertisement was issued July 28, 1868, inviting proposals for service from January 1, 1869, to June 30, 1872, three times a week, in four-horse post-coaches. The lowest bid received was that of Leach, Piper, and Montgomery, of Kittanning, Pennsylvania, at $194,000 per annum, which was accepted October 2, 1868, and contracts have since been executed.

The service on the route from Sheridan (on the eastern division of the Union Pacific railroad) to Santa Fé has been increased from three to six trips a week, and the schedule time reduced to four days in summer. The service is well performed, though still occasionally interrupted by hostile Indians.

The important route from Salt Lake City to The Dalles, Oregon, has been relet from 1st October last for six-times-a-week service, at the rate of $149,000 per annum, a saving, as compared with the last contract, of $164,000 per annum.

READJUSTMENT OF PAY ON RAILROAD ROUTES.

The 30th June, 1868, being the period for the expiration of the term of contracts for transporting mails in the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and Ohio, the Department, in anticipation of the close of the term, entered upon a systematic revision and readjustment of the rates of pay on railroad routes in those States, based upon returns of the weight of the mails conveyed and the accommodations provided for mails and agents of the Department, received in response to the "railroad weight circular" referred to in the last annual report, (page 11.) Wherever the returns required or justified a change from the former rate a circular (a copy of which is annexed) was addressed to the proprietors of the route, submitting the offer of the Department and explaining its purpose. In many instances the terms offered have, after considerable correspondence, been accepted, and contracts made accordingly. In others, though formal contracts are not executed, the Department has proceeded to settle for the service for the first quarter of the new term at the rates offered. Many routes in other States than those above named have been brought up for review, upon application made by the proprietors of the railroads interested, and in every case where the returns showed a readjustment to be proper it has been ordered. Thus the rates have been changed upon seventy-one routes in all, as appears in the annexed "table showing the readjustment of the rates of pay per mile on certain railroad routes, based upon returns of the weight of the mails conveyed and the accommodations provided for mails and agents of the Department." The routes are arranged, as in table E in the last annual report, not by States, but according to the rate of pay, the highest being first, and those of equal pay according to the average weight carried the whole distance, and the table is accompanied by an alphabetical index, for easy reference. The total amount of the annual pay upon these routes, under the readjustment, it will be seen, is $926,043 20, and the total amount of the former annual pay $775,722 50—an excess of the present over the former of $150,320 70. In reaching this result the rates on more than one hundred and fifty routes, being more than one third of the whole number of railroad routes in the service of the Department, have passed under review.

In connection with this subject it may be proper to state that at different times within the months of January, February, and March last, while Congress was in session, there were submitted to the Department, in behalf of a "committee on mail service" appointed at a national railroad convention previously held, several schedules of proposed changes in the rates of pay for the transportation of mails on railroad routes, and finally the draft of an act on the subject, to be submitted, if approved by the Postmaster General, to the Post Office Committees of the House and Senate. The proposed act provided that in all contracts hereafter to be made with railroad companies for the transportation of the mail the rates of compensation should be, at the option of the Postmaster General, in proportion either to the weight of matter to be transported or to the number of cubic feet of car space which the Department might require for the accommodation of its mails and agents. The schedule of rates prescribed in the act allowed upon every mile of actual transportation seven cents for car space per day not exceeding 25 cubic feet, or weight per day not exceeding 250 pounds; 12 cents for car space per day exceeding 25 and not exceeding 50 cubic feet, or weight per day exceeding 250 and not exceeding 500 pounds; and so on, ascending, by a similar sliding scale until for 2,600 cubic feet, the largest amount of "car space" found upon any route reported, the rate reached 115 cents for every mile of transportation. The proposed act provided further that an additional sum of one dollar should be allowed for every mile run by a train specially required to be run for the transportation of the mail, and two cents per mile for transporting in the passenger cars any agent traveling on the business of the Department, route agents to be transported free, but at their own risk.

Among the other papers was a "comparative statement," purporting to show the effect of the adoption of the committee's rates upon the whole cost of the railroad mail service in operation, by which it was made to appear that a diminution of thirty-eight per cent. would result, leaving out of the account all car space beyond the amount required to transport the mails as freight, allowing a cubic foot for every ten pounds' weight; and this thirty-eight per cent., it was suggested by the committee, would probably be more than sufficient to cover the cost of extra car service required for the use of route agents and postal clerks. It was found, however, upon estimating the car space used upon the first seven routes in table E in the last annual report, (pages 72-85,) allowing six and a half feet for the height of the car ceiling, as suggested by the committee, that the thirty-eight per cent. would be insufficient to cover the amount of transportation shown upon those routes alone at the committee's rates. To ascertain, therefore, the real effect which the adoption of the proposed rates would have upon the annual cost of mail transportation on railroad routes, a statement was made up in the Department, predicated upon the "car service" and actual transportation already in use, as shown in table E in the last annual report, by which it was found that the increase of expense would be enormous.

Thus, for illustration, on the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore railroad mail apartments of eight different sizes were reported, which were estimated to average 1,760 cubic feet. For this amount of "car space" the schedule prescribed in the proposed act allowed 81 cents per mile. The number of trips on the route was reported at 28 per week. Each trip including the run forth and back, the number of trips must be doubled to find the amount of transportation per week on each mile of the road's length, making 56 miles, and this again multiplied by 52 to find the amount per annum, making 2,912 miles, which, at 81 cents per mile, would give $2,358 72 as the pay per annum for every mile of the road's length. The present rate is $375. The disparity on some other routes would be still greater, the rates running up from $75 to $2,000 and more, and from $200 to $3,000 and more. On the whole amount of railroad mail service in operation on the 30th of June, 1867, the effect would be to increase the annual expense from $3,812,600 to $21,710,023, an excess of $17,897,423. The Department forbearing, upon such a showing, to take any part in presenting the proposed act to the Post Office Committees of the two Houses of Congress, has proceeded with the work of readjusting the rates of pay on railroad routes upon a scale within the limits of existing laws and much more compatible with the resources at its command.

POST-ROUTE MAPS.

During the past year an engraved post-route map, in four sheets, has been completed by the topographer, and copies issued for the use of the Department, representing the post offices and mail service in the State of New York and its connections with adjacent States and with the Dominion of Canada.

This map, along with that previously published, representing the northeastern States, has been found of great use in the several branches of this Department in its current work to postmasters and others, and especially to the clerks of the traveling (railroad) post offices, in sorting and distributing letters.

A similar map of the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland was expected to have been issued before this, but the large amount of work required in compilation from insufficiently surveyed State and county maps, and the very extended and minute service in those States to be represented, have delayed the issue. The plates are expected from the engraver within three months.

The map of the State of Maine and adjacentcies is also well advanced in the engraver's hands, and will be completed about the same time.

Drawings are being prepared for the map of Ohio and Indiana; and those of other States, in groups, will be taken up as fast as the peculiar nature and the magnitude of this work will allow.

FINES AND DEDUCTIONS.

The amount of fines imposed on contractors and deductions made from their pay, on account of failures and other delinquencies, during the year ending June 30, 1868, was $116,609, and the amount remitted during the same period was $70,795, leaving the net amount of fines and deductions $45,814.

MAIL-BAGS, LOCKS, AND KEYS.

A table herewith shows the number, description, and cost of mail-bags, locks, and keys purchased during the year, the amount expended for new mail-bags being $58,016 87, or nearly 28 per cent. less than the expenditure for like objects during the previous year, when it amounted to $80,440.

During the fiscal year last ended new contracts for mail-bags were made, after due advertisement for proposals, according to law, at prices averaging, for those of canvas about twenty per cent. less, and for those of leather about twelve and a half per cent. more, than the prices of the last contracts.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Report of the Postmaster General.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

THROUGH MAILS.

The method used by the Department to ascertain the speed and regularity with which through mails are conveyed is shown in a circular, issued in January last, (copy herewith,) referring to the routes from New York to St. Louis, Cincinnati, and Chicago, and from Washington and Baltimore to St. Louis and Cincinnati; and appended hereto are tables exhibiting the state of the service on these and other routes.

With regard to the service on the southwestern route from New York and Washington to New Orleans, via Lynchburg, Virginia, Knoxville, Chattanooga, and Grand Junction, Tennessee, and Canton, Mississippi, it was remarked in the last annual report that the records to October 31, 1867, exhibited a marked improvement. This improvement was maintained going south during the months of November and December of last year; but failures and delays going north in those months, and in both directions in January and part of February following, were so frequent that the Department ordered the mails to be transferred to the western route—a route never before used for the transmission of the great northern and southern mails, except for a few days in the spring of 1867, and then in one direction only, namely: from New York, via Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, Columbus, Ohio, Indianapolis, Indiana, Louisville, Kentucky, Humboldt and Grand Junction, Tennessee, and Canton, Mississippi, to New Orleans, the route from Washington, via Cumberland, Maryland, uniting with it at Columbus. The western route was used for the Washington mails to and from New Orleans from February 9 to March 16, 1868, and for the New York mails from February 10 to May 17, 1868. The Washington mails were restored on the 17th March, on the adoption of a quicker schedule and the promise of improved service, and the New York mails on the 18th May, to the southwestern route, on which they still continue.

Since the 13th of June last two mails a day have passed between New York and Memphis—one by the western and the other by the southwestern route. The comparative speed and regularity of the two routes will be seen by examining the tables.

RAILWAY POSTAL SERVICE.

There are now in operation in the United States twenty-six railway postal lines, subdivided into thirty-four routes, extending in the aggregate over 7,019 miles of railroad and steamboat lines, upon 1,571 miles of which twice-daily service is being performed, making a total equal to 8,090 miles of railway postal service daily each way, and an increase of 3,276 miles over the service in operation in 1867. There are employed in this service 279 men as head clerks, clerks, and assistant clerks, at salaries ranging from nine to fourteen hundred dollars per annum, making an aggregate cost of $329,700 per annum—an increase of 119 men at a cost of $141,800 over the previous year. It would require to perform this same service in the ordinary way, by slow mail trains, 141 men as route agents, whose compensation at the rate now paid to such agents on first-class routes would amount to $152,280 per annum. This shows the increase in the cost of the postal service over the route agent service, on the twenty-six lines upon which this service is in operation, to be $177,420 per annum. To ascertain to how great an extent this apparent increase in the cost of the one service over the other was offset by saving in clerk-hire, a circular was addressed in June last to all the larger offices in close connection with the railway postal service, inquiring, among other things, how many more clerks, if any, would be required with the natural increase in the size of mails, to perform the labor in their offices if the railway postal service should be abandoned, and the old system of route agents and direct mails restored. Answers were returned by most of those addressed, admitting and fully indorsing the great superiority of the railway postal over the route-agent service, stating that their mails both in coming and going were facilitated in their transmission from twelve to twenty-four hours, and, in cases where they would, under the old route-agent system, be obliged to go through the process of redistribution, from thirty-six to forty-eight hours; but many could not state definitely the amount of clerical force saved to their offices, they having been appointed postmasters since the introduction of the railway postal service. From the reports of those who responded fully, however, it appeared that the number of clerks saved in local post offices amounted to one hundred and forty-two, whose compensation, at the average rate allowed to good distributing clerks, would amount to $142,000 per annum. Full returns would doubtless show the number of clerks saved to be still greater. About the same time that the circular above referred to was sent to postmasters, a circular was addressed to all head clerks in railway post offices, requiring them to keep, for one week, as nearly as possible, an accurate account of letters received at the postal cars for mailing, and the number of stamps canceled. Most of the head clerks responded to this circular, and it was found that the average number of stamps canceled by railway postal clerks in that week, upon the routes that made a full report, (19 in number,) amounted, on each line, to 2,321, which, multiplied by the 26 lines, would amount to 60,346 per week, or, in the aggregate, to 3,137,992 per year. Counting each stamp at three cents, the value of stamps canceled by railway postal clerks in the year would amount to $94,139 76. This count is exclusive of newspaper stamps canceled, or the stamps on foreign letters, which sometimes amount to four or five times as much. Forty per cent. on the amount of stamps canceled being the average amount of commissions, or the amount allowed in the adjustment of salaries to postmasters, this amount saved in salaries to postmasters should be credited to the railway postal service; and forty per cent. on $94,139 76 being $37,655 90, the financial result, exclusive of the extra compensation allowed to some railroads for the use of postal cars may be recapitulated as follows:

Salaries to 279 railway postal clerks.....	$329,700 00
141 route agents at present salaries, $1,080.....	$152,280 00
142 clerks saved to local post offices, $1,000.....	142,000 00
Saving in salaries of post- masters.....	37,655 90
	331,935 90
Net saving.....	$2,235 90

It is proper to state that the service is being performed, not as formerly by route agents, on the slow way or accommodation trains, but upon the fastest express trains, and that, by means of Ward's mail-bag catcher, the clerks are exchanging pouches at all offices on the line once, and in many cases twice, daily each way. On the Hudson River and New York Central railroads, for instance, the postal car leaves New York at 8 a. m., performing service at all stations to Syracuse, where they arrive at 6.30 p. m.; and from Syracuse to Buffalo, where they arrive at 12 midnight, at all express stops. The night line leaves New York at 11 p. m., performing service for all offices at express stops to Albany; leaving Albany at 7.15 a. m., performing the service at all post offices to Buffalo, where they arrive at 8.30 p. m., so that every office on the line from New York, via Albany, to Buffalo, that chooses to exchange mails twice, is served twice daily with mail each way. Under the old route-agent system this same service was performed as follows:

route agents left New York in the morning and ended in Albany in the afternoon; other route agents left Albany in the morning and arrived in Syracuse in the evening; and still other route agents, leaving Syracuse in the morning, arrived in Buffalo in the afternoon—requiring from two to three days to send a letter from one point to another and receive an answer. Now letters can be sent and answers returned between almost any two offices on the line within twenty-four hours. This is simply an illustration; the same improved facilities for the rapid transmission of mails obtaining on most other lines of railway postal service.

Another feature of marked improvement in this service is the fact that letter mail, which under the route-agent system was required to go into a distributing office for distribution, is now distributed on the railway postal cars while they are in motion. For instance, on the New York Central and Hudson River railroads letters from the interior towns for the New England, southern, or western States, instead of being sent to the Albany, New York, or Buffalo distributing post office, causing a delay of from twelve to twenty-four hours, are now distributed while in transit, pouched, and forwarded on connecting railway postal routes with no delay. And still another is the large increase of mails on all railway postal routes. The chief clerks on the Erie and Lake Shore postal cars report that since the introduction of the service on those routes the letter mail has increased from thirty-three to fifty per cent. Though part of this may be a natural increase, it is believed that a large proportion of it is due to the increased facilities for sending a mail from and to every office on the line, however insignificant it may be. These remarks apply equally well to all other railway postal routes where the full way-service is performed.

FOREIGN MAIL SERVICE.

Statistics.

The aggregate amount of postage (inland, sea, and foreign) upon the letter correspondence exchanged with foreign countries was $2,153,690 66. Of this amount $1,706,407 76 accrued on the letter mails exchanged with European countries, $309,516 43 on letters exchanged with the Dominion of Canada, and $137,706 47 on the letters exchanged with the West Indies, Mexico, Brazil, Central and South America, the Sandwich Islands, Japan, and China.

The total letter postages on mails exchanged with countries of Europe, during the first six months from July 1 to December 31, 1867, inclusive, under the provisions of the postal conventions then in force, amounted to $1,057,612 99; and on mails exchanged with the same countries during the residue of the fiscal year from January 1 to June 30, 1868, at the reduced rates established by existing conventions, amounted to $648,854 77, being a reduction to the advantage of correspondents during said six months of $408,758 22, on an increased correspondence amounting to 626,548 letters per annum.

The postage collections in the United States on the correspondence exchanged with Great Britain and countries on the continent of Europe amounted to $1,090,244 03, and the postages collected in Europe amounted to $616,223 73. Excess of collections in the United States, $474,020 30.

The estimated amount of United States postage upon the letter mails exchanged with Great Britain and the continent of Europe was $793,700 64; with Canada and the British North American provinces, $176,179 55; and with the West Indies, Brazil, Mexico, Japan, and China, and Central and South America, $128,098 87; making in all $1,097,979 06, a decrease of $93,425 61, compared with estimate of previous year. Adding the amount of United States postage upon printed matter exchanged in United States and European mails, calculated at $90,000, and $10,529 40, the reported amount of United States postage on printed matter exchanged with the West Indies, Mexico, South America, China, &c., the total United States postages on foreign mails (exclusive of printed matter interchanged with the British North American provinces, of which no separate account is kept) was $1,198,508 46.

The number of letters exchanged with foreign countries (exclusive of the British North American provinces) was 11,128,532, of which 5,900,307 were sent from and 5,228,225 received in the United States; increase over number of previous year 830,298. Of this number 10,068,659 were exchanged with European countries, an increase of 626,548, compared with the previous year. Estimating the number exchanged with the British Provinces at 2,476,000, the total number of letters exchanged in the mails with foreign countries was over 13,600,000.

Ocean Mail Transportation.

From the 1st of January, 1868, the date on which the new postal conventions with Great Britain, North Germany, Belgium, &c., came into operation, the arrangements made by this Department for the transatlantic mail steamship service have been restricted to the outward mails, in accordance with the new system adopted in said conventions, that each office shall make its own arrangements for the mails which it dispatches, and shall at its own cost remunerate the owners of the steamships employed for the conveyance of the same; and in like manner, the sea transportation of mails received from Europe since the 1st of January, 1868, has been provided and paid for by the respective foreign post departments dispatching the same to this country.

From July 1 to December 31, 1867, inclusive, the steamers employed by this Department in transporting mails in both directions conveyed mails the total postage on which amounted to $491,534 13; and those employed in same service by foreign post departments conveyed mails during the same period the total postages on which amounted to $566,078 86. During the last half of the fiscal year from January 1 to June 30, 1868, inclusive, the total postages on mails sent to Europe under the new arrangements amounted to $340,835 54, and the total postages on mails received from Europe during the same period amounted to $308,019 23, these reduced amounts resulting from the reduced rates of international postage charged on and after the 1st of January, 1868, under the provisions of the new postal conventions, which came into operation on that date.

The cost of the United States transatlantic mail steamship service from July 1 to December 31, 1867, under arrangements then in force, allowing the sea postages as compensation, was $282,017 42, and from January 1 to June 30, 1868, under the new arrangements, $139,760 02; a reduction of over one half from the cost of the same service during the previous six months. Total cost of transatlantic service for the year, $421,777 44, being $129,560 57 less than the preceding year. The amount paid for the transportation of mails to and from the West Indies, &c., by steamers receiving various rates of compensation within the limit of the postages, was $70,287 67, and the cost of sea and isthmus conveyance of mails to and from Central and South America, via Panama, was $27,334 33, making a total expenditure for ocean transportation of $519,399 44, exclusive of payments amounting to the sum of $497,916 67, made during the year to the steamship lines to Brazil, to Japan, and China, and to the Sandwich Islands, respectively, receiving subsidy grants fixed by special acts of Congress.

POSTAL CONVENTIONS WITH COUNTRIES OF EUROPE.

New postal conventions with Great Britain, the North German Union, Belgium, and the Netherlands, respectively, the leading provisions of which were briefly stated in my last report, were carried into effect on the 1st of January, 1868; and those concluded with Switzerland and Italy went into operation on the 1st of April, 1868. Under the provisions of these conventions important improvements have resulted, not only in reduced rates of international postage, but in greater uniformity of postal details and enlarged facilities of mail accommodation. The detailed regulations arranged and adopted for the execution of each of these conventions are annexed.

On the 13th of December, 1867, before the new convention with the United Kingdom of 18th June, 1867, went into operation, notice was given by the British post office to terminate the same on the 31st of December, 1868, in accordance with the power reserved in the twenty-first article thereof; which notice was accompanied by the announcement that Mr. Anthony Trollope would be dispatched to Washington in the spring of 1868 with full powers to negotiate a new convention better calculated to afford satisfaction to the people of the two countries. The provisions of a new convention to supersede the present one on the 1st of January, 1869, were accordingly arranged with Mr. Trollope at Washington in July last; and, after adjusting by direct correspondence between the two post departments certain modifications on which Mr. Trollope did not consider himself authorized to treat, the modified convention was formally executed on the 24th of November last. Its general provisions are substantially those of the present convention. The only change in the existing rates of international postage is a reduced charge on small pamphlets, book packets, and patterns, not exceeding two ounces in weight; the British post office having declined to assent to a further reduction of the international letter rate, but agreeing to consider the question of such reduction at the expiration of twelve months from the commencement of the convention. A copy of the new convention and detailed regulations for carrying the same into execution is annexed.

The French Government having communicated, through its minister at Washington, an invitation to this Department to send a special delegate to Paris authorized to negotiate and arrange in person the details of a new postal convention between the United States and France, Hon. John A. Kasson was, on the 5th of April, 1867, appointed a special commissioner on behalf of this Department to proceed to Paris, and there to negotiate and arrange the conditions of agreement between the respective post departments of a new convention, subject to the approval of the Postmaster General of the United States. Mr. Kasson's mission was primarily and specially to the French post department, with authority, also, to negotiate and settle the details of new postal conventions with the post departments of Great Britain, Prussia, and Belgium, respectively, and conclude postal conventions with other European Governments, subject to like approval of the Postmaster General of the United States. While Mr. Kasson succeeded in negotiating improved postal arrangements with Great Britain, Belgium, and North Germany, and advantageous conventions with the Netherlands, Switzerland, and Italy, his mission to the French post department failed to accomplish any revision or modification of the postal convention with France.

It being thus made apparent to me that the French post department was indisposed to conclude a new convention modifying the provisions of the convention of March 2, 1857, in conformity with the more liberal and improved arrangements concluded between the United States and other countries on the continent of Europe, this Department was constrained to avail itself of the power reserved in the present convention to terminate it by a previous notice of one year, and notice was accordingly given on the 8th of January last to terminate the same on the 1st of February, 1869. Subsequently negotiations were opened with the French office for a new convention, this Department submitting for its consideration and approval a statement of the modifications of the convention of 2d March, 1857, considered necessary for the amelioration of the postal service between the two countries. The French department has submitted counter propositions based on so widely different views of the leading principles and features of an international postal arrangement, and claiming so unequal and unjust a proportion of the rates of postage, that there seems to be, in the present state of the negotiations, little probability of harmonizing the conflicting views of the two offices.

POSTAL CONVENTION WITH CANADA.

The postal convention between the United States and the Dominion of Canada was modified, to take effect on the 1st of April, 1868, by reducing the single rate of international letter postage to six cents if prepaid, and continuing the ten-cent rate for all unpaid or insufficiently paid letters; and the like modification has been extended to letter correspondence exchanged with Prince Edward Island.

POSTAL CONVENTION ESTABLISHING AN EXCHANGE OF MAILS WITH BRITISH EAST INDIES.

A postal convention has been concluded with the British post department, establishing and regulating an exchange of mails between the United States and the Straits settlements and the British East Indies, by means, conjointly, of the United States mail packets plying between San Francisco and Hong-Kong, China, and the British mail packets plying between Hong-Kong and Singapore, Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, and Aden, a copy of which is annexed. Its provisions are similar to those of the postal convention concluded between this Department and the colonial government of Hong-Kong, China.

MAIL STEAMSHIP SERVICE TO JAPAN AND CHINA.

During the year ended June 30, 1868, seven round voyages between San Francisco and Hong-Kong were completed by the United States mail packets of the Japan and China line, and two round voyages were completed between said ports during the quarter ended September 30, 1868. The average actual running time on the outward voyages between San Francisco and Hong-Kong, during this period, (omitting the trip during which the steamship Great Republic was disabled by a serious accident in mid-ocean,) was 29 days 21 hours, and 30 days 19 hours on the inward voyages. The Great Republic on her outward trip in March last, when distant 3,827 miles from San Francisco, and 2,100 miles from Yokohama, broke one of her paddle-shafts, but was nevertheless able to proceed on her voyage, reaching Yokohama by the use of one wheel, and attaining, under these adverse circumstances at one of the stormiest seasons of the year, the remarkable speed of 173 nautical miles a day. The steamship New York, prudently stationed at Yokohama, to guard against possible accidents, completed the voyage of the disabled ship, and thus, notwithstanding the outward voyage was by this accident protracted eight days, the round voyage to Hong-Kong and return was terminated at San Francisco within two days of the regular schedule time. The timely precaution of the contractors in providing a spare ship at Yokohama, to guard against the possibility of an interruption of the service, and the energy which they manifested on this occasion in completing the round voyage with as little delay to the mails as possible are worthy of commendation.

The new steamer Japan, four thousand three hundred and fifty tons Government register, was added to the line in August last, and the company state that they expect to place the America in service during the coming summer, thus completing the full number of four steamers required by the contract, although three only are actually required to perform monthly voyages, the fourth furnishing the means of relieving the others in case of repairs or accident.

The branch line between Yokohama and Shanghai, touching at Hiogo and Nagasaki, has been run in regular connection with the main line, and has proved a very important addition to the service. The qualified permission granted by the Department to the contractors in April, 1867, to terminate the voyage of the large ships at Yokohama, and to employ one or more branch steamships of a less size to do the service between Yokohama and Hong-Kong, to which reference was made in the last report, was not executed, the company notifying the Department of its decision not to avail itself of said permission, but to continue the service by the large ships to Hong-Kong as provided by the contract. In like manner the company did not avail itself of the authority given at the same time to change the Japan port of calling from Yokohama to Osaka, their president deciding that it would not be for the interest of the Government or that of the company to make such change.

The regular monthly trips provided for by the law authorizing the establishment of this service, and by the contract made in pursuance thereof, delayed by unavoidable causes, which have been satisfactorily explained, were begun on the 3d of June, 1868, and have since been regularly maintained.

It was hoped that the discovery by American citizens of a small group of islands midway between California and China, and conveniently situated with respect to this steamship route, would have resulted in increasing the efficiency of the service by relieving the steamships from the necessity of carrying the great weight of coal required for consumption on their long voyage of five thousand miles, and the effort of the contractors to effect this desirable improvement were regarded with great interest. But, unfortunately, the surveys made by officers of the Navy, as well as those of the steamship company, demonstrated that the project was impracticable of execution at present, owing to shoalness of water at the entrance to the harbor. If it should prove feasible, however, as I am informed is the opinion of competent naval officers whose attention has been given to the subject, to obtain the necessary increased depth of water on the bar, by a reasonable expenditure, the propriety and expediency of undertaking the work would be a question worthy the attention of our Government, as well for the attainment of this object as for other public advantages of a national and commercial character that will readily suggest themselves.

In view of the rapidly-growing importance of our relations, political and commercial, with the great empires of China and Japan, and of the prospective development of our Pacific States, as well as of the territory west of the Rocky mountains and east of the Sierra Nevada, rich in natural resources, but now sparsely peopled, it becomes an important question for consideration whether provision should not be made for an increase and extension of the service on the Japan and China mail line. While submitting this matter to the wisdom of Congress, and without being prepared to offer any suggestions at present as to details, I am clearly of the opinion that the best interests of the Government and people of the United States require that the period of the completion of the Pacific railway across our continent ought not to be allowed to pass without making adequate provision for placing its western terminus at San Francisco in at least semi-monthly communication with China and Japan. Any legislation with this object should follow the safe and practicable precedent furnished by the successful working of the act authorizing the present service.

MAIL STEAMSHIP SERVICE TO BRAZIL AND TO THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

The required number of monthly trips have been satisfactorily performed by the contractors on the mail steamship route between New York and Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, the average time occupied on the outward voyages being twenty-seven days eight hours, and on the inward voyages twenty-six days; and on the mail steamship route between San Francisco and Honolulu (Hawaiian Islands) the contractors performed eight round trips from 15th October, 1867, to 30th June, 1868, the average length of the outward voyages being eleven days one hour, and of the inward voyages twelve days three hours.

PROPOSED CONTRACT WITH "THE COMMERCIAL NAVIGATION COMPANY."

I have had under careful consideration the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 27, 1868, authorizing and empowering the Postmaster General "to contract with the Commercial Navigation Company of the State of New York, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of New York, under a special charter passed by the Legislature of said State, under the date of April 23, 1866, for the weekly or semi-weekly conveyance of all European and foreign mails of the United States between New York and Bremen, touching at Southampton, England, or Liverpool, touching at Queenstown, in first-class sea-going steamships, to be constructed in the United States and owned by said company, for a term not exceeding fifteen years;" and after a thorough examination of the subject in all its bearings, in which I consulted the Attorney General on the legal questions involved, I decided, in the exercise of the discretion given to me, that it was impracticable to make a contract with said company for only a weekly or semi-weekly mail service to Europe, and accordingly declined to execute a contract in the manner and on the conditions therein stated. I have, however, advised said company of my willingness to make a conditional contract, subject to the approval of Congress, for the conveyance of the United States mails to Europe by American steamships of sufficient number to perform at least four outward trips per week—that being the present number of weekly mails to Europe—and with the additional stipulations necessary to insure regularity and efficiency in the service always inserted in ocean mail steamship contracts; said contract to be approved by Congress by the passage of an act or joint resolution ratifying the same. In view of the great importance of this subject, I earnestly commend the proposed contract to the careful consideration and action of Congress.

CONTINUANCE OF MAIL SERVICE IN TIME OF WAR.

I fully concur in the recommendation of my predecessor, Postmaster General Dennison, in his annual report of November 2, 1864, that provision should be made, by treaty stipulations between nations or otherwise, for the exceptional treatment of regular mail packets in time of war, by authorizing such packets, under proper safeguards against the transportation of persons or articles contraband of war, to continue their navigation without impediment or interruption.

Such a principle ought to be universally recognized and adopted, as all Governments and peoples have a common interest in maintaining regular and uninterrupted postal communications between nations in time of war; and I respectfully recommend that the Postmaster General be authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the President, to incorporate such a stipulation in the postal conventions already concluded or hereafter to be made with foreign Governments.

LETTER-CARRIERS.

The free delivery system has been in operation during the year in forty-eight of the principal cities. It has continued to grow in popular favor, and has to a great extent supplanted the general and box deliveries. In Philadelphia, Chicago, St. Louis, Cleveland, Louisville, and other cities, the number of post office boxes has been greatly reduced, and the hope is confidently entertained that this mode of delivery will ultimately supersede all others. Its necessity in large cities is illustrated by the single example of New York, with its six thousand boxes representing thirty thousand names, any one of which each sorting clerk must be able to recall and associate with the proper box on the instant, a work impossible to be done without liability to error. This difficulty necessarily increases with the growth of the city, and finds no remedy, for the reason stated, in the multiplication of clerks.

The only remedy for this evil known to me is the delivery by carrier, which, after years of experience, has received the sanction of the principal postal departments of Europe, and which, by inducing the habit of directing letters to street and number, renders the sorting comparatively simple, and the delivery accurate and reliable.

Where the system has been judiciously and energetically conducted the people have not been backward in acknowledging its merits and availing themselves of its benefits.

The experience acquired by carriers has greatly facilitated operations, and enabled them to perform an additional amount of work with less proportionate labor.

I would here respectfully suggest that some legislative expression favoring the retention of experienced and efficient carriers would, by making their tenure of office dependent on themselves, conduce to more exemplary conduct, better order, and a more faithful discharge of duty. It would, besides, give stability to the system, conciliate public confidence toward it, and extend its usefulness.

While it is gratifying to state that the postage on local matter has increased in some cities as high as three hundred per cent. during the last four years, still experience has shown that in general the postage from this source is insufficient to meet the expense of this mode of delivery, especially in the smaller cities. This, however, should not be expected, nor can it be used as an argument against it, since the local matter constitutes a very small portion of the matter handled. Besides, the facilities afforded by this delivery must operate to increase mail letters as well as local, but whether in the same ratio cannot now be determined for want of the proper data.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Report of the Postmaster General.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Its benefits are also observable in the more thorough and accurate delivery of letters, especially in the populous cities where there are so many persons of the same name, the street and number serving to identify the person addressed. Many of these letters would without the carrier's delivery be advertised and sent to the dead letter office to be there destroyed, or returned to the writers at considerable expense to the Department, and after many vexatious disappointments to correspondents.

The aggregate results for the year are shown in the following figures:

The number of letter-carriers employed was 1,198; mail letters delivered, 64,349,486; local letters delivered, 14,081,906; newspapers delivered, 16,910,715; letters collected, 63,164,625; amount paid carriers, including incidental expenses, $995,934 59; postages on local matter, $475,982 36. (See tabular statements in the appendix.)

READJUSTMENT OF SALARIES.

Under the provisions of the second section of the postal act approved July 1, 1864, postmasters are now paid stated salaries in accordance with the amount of business done, instead of commissions, as formerly. These salaries have to be reviewed and readjusted once in two years, throwing upon this office a large amount of extra labor.

The readjustment for the two years commencing July 1, 1868, is now so far completed as to show that the salaries of 23,481 postmasters will amount to $4,548,137. This business is continually upon the increase, as will appear by a comparison with the two previous adjustments:

For the two years commencing July 1, 1864, the salaries amounted to $3,383,381
For the two years commencing July 1, 1866, the salaries amounted to 4,033,728
For the two years commencing July 1, 1868, as before stated, the salaries amount to... 4,548,137

In view of the great importance and responsibility of this branch of business I would respectfully request authority to appoint one additional fourth-class clerk to take charge of the same.

BLANK AGENCY.

Under the provisions of the fourteenth section of an act to further amend the postal laws, approved July 27, 1868, a blank agency for the distribution of blanks, wrapping paper, twine, letter balances, and marking-stamps to the several post offices in the United States has been established at Washington, and the agencies heretofore in operation at New York and Buffalo have been discontinued. This change was deemed important and necessary not only on the score of economy in the distribution of the articles named, but because of the very large amount of property to be purchased and distributed, as well as that the operations of the agency might be under the immediate supervision of the Department; and the wisdom of Congress in authorizing its establishment has been fully demonstrated by the recent development of startling frauds perpetrated upon the Department under the old system.

The agency has been organized by the appointment of a competent and reliable superintendent, an assistant superintendent of tried integrity and long experience in the business, with the necessary clerks and laborers to insure a prompt and faithful discharge of all the duties devolved upon them.

The increase in the number of post offices in 1867 over the number in operation in 1866 was 1,135. The increase in 1868 over the number in operation in 1867 was 1,818.

The number of postal railway clerks in 1865 was 64; the number in 1866, 83; the number in 1867, 170; the number in 1868, 232.

The annual salaries of postal clerks in 1865 aggregated..... $75,000
Salaries in 1866..... 96,200
Salaries in 1867..... 197,500
Salaries in 1868..... 274,300
Increase of route agents between 1865 and 1868..... 113
Aggregate increase of compensation..... $148,868

Special attention is called to this increase of postal clerks and route agents and to the increase in their compensation. The service has required, and will continue to require, an increase in this class of departmental agents and employés. Congress passed laws authorizing an increase in compensation of route agents, postal clerks, and letter-carriers. I have increased the compensation of these men so far as I have been able, and regret that it is not in my power to pay them still higher salaries. They are not paid enough, any of them.

The number of letter-carriers has been increased from 757 in 1865 to 1,198 in 1868. The amount paid them, including incidental expenses, is $995,934 59. These men also are insufficiently paid, and I would increase their compensation if in my power.

DEAD LETTERS.

The whole number of letters of all classes received during the year ended the 30th June last, by actual count, was 4,162,144, showing a decrease of 144,364 letters from the number estimated to have been received during the previous year.

Of these letters 3,995,066 were domestic letters; 167,078 were foreign, and were returned unopened to the countries where they originated.

The domestic letters received may be stated as follows:

Ordinary dead letters.....3,029,461
Drop and hotel letters..... 522,677
Unmailable..... 363,698
Fictitious addresses..... 9,190
Registered letters..... 3,282
Returned from foreign countries..... 66,538

In the examination of domestic dead letters for disposition, 1,736,867 were found to be either not susceptible of being returned, or of no importance, circulars, &c., and were destroyed. About 333,000 more were destroyed after an effort to return them, making about fifty-one per cent. destroyed. The remainder were classified and returned to the owners as far as practicable.

The whole number returned was 2,258,199, of which about eighty-four per cent. were delivered to owners, and sixteen per cent. returned to Department.

Eighteen thousand three hundred and forty letters contained $95,169 52 in sums of one dollar and upwards, of which 16,061 letters, containing $86,638 66, were delivered to owners, and 2,124, containing $7,862 36, were filed or held for disposition; 14,082 contained $3,436 68, in sums less than one dollar, of which 12,513, containing $3,120 70, were delivered to owners; 17,750 contained checks, drafts, deeds, and other papers of value, representing the value of $3,609,271 80; of these 16,809 were restored to the owners, and 821 were returned and filed; 13,964 contained books, jewelry, and other articles of property, of the estimated value of $8,500; of these 11,489 were forwarded for delivery, and 9,911 were delivered to owners; 125,221 contained photographs, postage stamps, and articles of small value, of which 114,666 were delivered to owners, and 2,068,842 letters returned had no inclosures.

Thus, of the ordinary dead letters forwarded from this office, about eighty-four per cent. were delivered, and of the valuable dead letters, (classed as money and minor,) about eighty-nine per cent. were delivered.

The decrease of money letters received (about three thousand) is probably owing to the growing use of money orders for the transmission of small sums.

Prominent among the causes of the non-delivery of letters is the unmailable character of many of them, ascertained during the past year to be 363,898 letters, showing a decrease of 79,888 from the previous year. Of these 290,448 were detained for non-payment of postage; 58,387 returned for misdirection or want of proper address; 13,470 were addressed to places for which no mail service had been established, and 1,593 had no address whatever. There were also returned 23,425 letters addressed to persons stopping temporarily at hotels, departures or non-arrivals preventing delivery, and 9,190 found to be addressed to fictitious names. These are mostly cases where the causes of non-delivery appear from the letters themselves, and no effort was made to deliver them.

The number of dead letters returned during the year to foreign countries was 184,183, and the number received from foreign countries was 66,558. It further appears that out of 4,666,673 letters mailed to the United States, through British, French, and German mails, 126,866 (or 2.7 per cent.) were returned to Europe as dead letters; and out of 5,401,986 letters forwarded from this country through those mails, 30,970 (or .57 per cent.) were returned as dead letters, showing an extraordinary discrepancy between the proportion of dead letters received from Europe and the proportion returned from the United States to European countries.

This difference is doubtless largely owing to causes existing in this country which do not operate in the same proportion in Europe.

The geographical extent of the United States and Territories, as yet largely unsettled, the constant arrival of emigrants in search of new homes in remote regions, and the continual changing of places of abode in a sparsely settled country, all operate to increase the difficulty in the delivery of foreign letters.

The aggregate of postal letter service during the year is estimated at 720,000,000, and the proportion of domestic dead letters to the number of domestic letters mailed is about one to 126.

There were received at this office during the fiscal year 5,459 applications for letters, of which 1,151 were answered satisfactorily, the letters applied for being found. About one third of these applications were for ordinary letters without inclosures, no record of them being kept and search for them being useless.

The amount of money taken from all dead letters undelivered since last report, and deposited in the United States Treasury, was $27,967 71.

The amount realized from sales of waste paper and deposited was $1,280 42.

POSTAL MONEY ORDER SYSTEM.

The number of money order offices now in operation is 1,468. Since the date of the last annual report 245 additional offices have been established and one office has been discontinued.

The number of orders issued during the year was 831,937, of the aggregate value of.....$16,197,858 47
The number of orders paid was 836,940, amounting to.....$15,976,501 11
To which is to be added the amount of orders repaid to purchasers..... 142,035 92

Total of payments..... 16,118,537 03

Excess of issues over payments..... $79,321 44

The last annual report shows that during the the fiscal year ending June 30 the aggregate amount of orders issued was $9,229,327 72, and of orders paid and repaid $9,071,240 73. Hence it appears that during the last fiscal year there was an increase in the amount of orders issued of seventy-five per cent. and in the amount of orders paid of seventy-seven per cent. over the corresponding transactions of the previous year. This large and constant increase from year to year in the amount of money order business plainly indicates the great utility of this system for the public, as a safe and convenient method of transmitting small sums of money through the mail.

The average sum for which money orders were issued last year was $19 47, being nearly the same as that of the previous year, $19 45. The number of duplicates was 3,873, of which 3,792 were issued as substitutes for originals lost in the mails or otherwise, 58 were in lieu of orders rendered invalid because not presented for payment until more than one year after date, and 23 to replace orders made invalid in consequence of bearing, contrary to law, more than one indorsement.

The receipts and expenditures of the last fiscal year, as adjusted and stated by the Auditor, were as follows, namely:

Receipts.
Fees on money orders issued.....	$124,487 00
Premium received on exchange.....	16 19
	124,503 19
Expenditures.
Commissions to postmasters and allowances for clerk hire.....	$65,271 36
Allowances for remittances lost in the mails.....	1,769 00
Incidental expenses for stationery and fixtures.....	3,304 68
	70,345 04

Excess of receipts over expenditures..... $54,158 15 being the gross amount of revenue derived from the transaction of the money-order business.

Under existing law post-office blanks of every description are furnished exclusively by the Congressional Printer, hence the cost of money-order blanks used by postmasters is not included in the foregoing statement of expenditures.

In the transaction of the money-order business the smaller offices usually issue more orders than they pay, in consequence of the general tendency to remit money to centers of trade and commerce. For the same reason the number of orders paid at the larger post offices greatly exceeds the number issued; and to supply the latter with sufficient funds to meet this excess of payments, postmasters at the smaller offices are required to remit promptly to certain first-class offices, designated as their depositories, all surplus funds that may accrue in their hands from the issue of orders. These remittances are made by means of national bank drafts, or in registered packages by mail when such drafts cannot be procured, as is usually the case at the smaller post offices. During the last year the amount of surplus money-order funds remitted by these methods and deposited in the larger offices was $11,191,457 04. Whenever a registered package containing money-order funds in course of transmission by mail is reported as missing, a special agent is immediately instructed to investigate the matter, and if it cannot be found after a reasonable time, credit for the amount of the lost remittance is allowed, provided it is proved, after a thorough examination of all the circumstances of the case by the special agent, that the postmaster not only sent the money in a registered package, but in doing so complied strictly with all the requirements of the Department. These are, that he must keep an exact description of the notes remitted by him, and must be ready to prove by the testimony of a disinterested witness that he inclosed these notes in a secure package, which he registered in the mode prescribed, and duly dispatched in the mail from his office. As above stated, the sum of $1,769 was allowed during the last year for lost remittances. In addition to this amount an allowance of $5,265 was made to the postmaster at Austin, Texas, on account of five lost remittances, proved conclusively to have been duly mailed by him during the first quarter of 1868 to the postmaster at New Orleans, Louisiana. These remittances were stolen by a clerk in the post office of that city, as appears from the report of the special agents of this Department, who investigated the case and caused the arrest and commitment of the alleged depredator. The allowance in this instance, however, was not made, and notice thereof transmitted to the Auditor in time for insertion in his report, and will therefore be included in his next annual statement.

The sum of $1,205,253 01 was transferred by postmasters from the postage to the money-order account, to enable them to meet orders presented for payment at times when their money-order funds were insufficient for the purpose. On the other hand, the transfers from the money-order to the postage account amounted to $1,217,392 45, showing, at the close of the year, a balance in favor of the former account of $12,139 44.

Application has repeatedly been made to this Department during the past year by citizens of the United States who reside in or who frequently visit Panama, New Granada, for the establishment of a money-order office at the United States consulate of that city. It is represented that such an office would not only afford much-needed facilities to American artisans and workmen resident in Panama and vicinity for the transmission of small sums to their families or relations at home, but would also accommodate, in a similar way, the large number of travelers who pass through that city on their way to or from the Atlantic States, as well as the numerous American sailors who frequent the port. For like reasons it seems desirable that a money-order office should be opened at Aspinwall. I would therefore recommend that the Postmaster General be authorized to establish an agency at each of the cities in question, for the issue and payment of money orders by the United States consul, in the same manner and under the same regulations as at money-order post offices in the United States. These two consuls at present act as agents of this Department for the receipt and dispatch of mail matter. The addition of the money-order business to these duties would involve an increase of responsibility and of clerical labor, for which they should receive an additional allowance proportionate to the amount of business transacted.

The Department is at present engaged in arranging the details of a convention for the interchange of postal money orders between certain money-order post offices of this country and those of Switzerland. After it shall have been put into successful operation similar arrangements will gradually be made with other foreign countries which may desire the establishment of an international money-order system.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The law requires the salaries of postmasters to be adjusted once in two years. The aggregate salaries of postmasters, as revised July 1, 1864, was $3,383,381 77. As adjusted July 1, 1866, the sum was $4,033,728 17. As adjusted July 1, 1868, the sum was $4,545,888. The increase in a little over two years, from June, 1866, to and including July, 1868, was $1,162,506 23. This increase of salaries, under the rules prescribed by law, is encouraging. It is based solely upon the continual increase of the business of the Department and of the people.

The increase of the expenses of the postal service, based as it is upon public necessity and public demand, instead of being cause of discouragement, is a subject of congratulation. The restoration of so large a part of the postal service, suspended during the war, and the new service created by Congress since the close of the war, equal to one-third of the amount of service in operation at that time, have produced a less deficiency than existed in time of peace and prosperity previous to 1860.

The proportion of deficiency to revenue is far less now than then, notwithstanding the service is very much greater than ever before. In 1859 the sum of the deficiency was only $1,000,000 less than the entire revenue. In 1860 the sum of the deficiency was about three million five hundred thousand dollars less than the entire revenue. For the year 1868 the deficiency is $10,000,000 less than the entire revenue. The majority of the southern States have never paid their own expenses for postal service. They will not do so for a long time to come. With the exception of Iowa and Missouri none of the States or Territories west of the Mississippi have ever paid a revenue equal to their postal expenses. The cost of the transportation of the mails in all new States and Territories, and in all sparsely-populated portions of the country, never has been paid by those States or Territories out of their own revenues. It is only as population and business increase, and the country is developed, that postal service can be self-sustaining.

The idea that the Post Office Department can be self-sustaining, in the present condition of the country, is absurd. It cannot be, and ought not to be, for fifty years to come. The revenues will largely increase, and so will expenditures. Ten years hence I estimate the expenses of the Post Office Department at $40,000,000, and the revenues at $30,000,000. This increase must go on as long as the country prospers and mineral, agricultural, and commercial business increases. The mines are not yet all developed. The lands are not all cultivated. The rivers are not all navigated. The railroads are not all surveyed. The cities are not all built. The sea has not given us all we have a right to exact. Our country is not finished. Until it is finished he is not a wise nor a sagacious man who assumes that the postal service will pay for itself.

The Post Office Department can be made self-sustaining in one way, and that is by cutting off the postal service in the States and Territories where the receipts for postages are not equal to expenses. This would exclude all but Iowa and Missouri west of the Mississippi, and all the States overborne by the rebellion. It could further economize by withdrawing all aid from the China, Brazil, and Sandwich Islands steamship lines, thus saving $725,000. It could save $995,000 by abolishing the letter-carrier system for the cities. It could also economize to the extent of over $700,000 by overturning the system of postal cars. It is true that in public estimation the letter-carriers for cities are thought to be almost indispensable, but the system costs money and brings small revenue. It is all disbursement and no receipt. What if from twelve to twenty-four hours are saved in the transmission of mails between Washington and Cincinnati, or St. Louis, or Chicago, and the whole West and Northwest by these traveling post offices, which put off and receive mails while traveling at thirty miles an hour, and which receive mails, make up mails, and distribute mails as they go hurrying along? It costs money, and the Government, like a miser, can keep its money in its chest. It gives no return and helps nobody, but is safely hoarded. A halting, timid, illiberal policy like this will save one million and lose twenty. Every dollar put out by the Government in subsidies to build railroads, in subsidies to aid ocean commerce, in liberal appropriations to open lines of travel and develop material resources in a great nation like this, is money put out at exorbitant usury, and will bring returns in development of material wealth, and in making the nation great and rich and strong in everything of value and interest to a great people.

FRANKING.

I have twice in my annual reports called attention to the gross abuses of the franking privilege. It becomes my duty again to speak of the frauds perpetrated upon the revenues of the Post Office Department by these abuses. I have had occasion frequently during the past year to call the attention of members of Congress to the use of their names in sending mailable matter free under a fac simile frank. Three dollars will buy the fac simile frank of any member of Congress, and the use of it by claim agents and business men in cities in sending books, periodicals, letters, and business circulars defrauds the Department out of immense sums of money. It is estimated that the loss to the Department by this species of abuse of the franking privilege has amounted to from one million to one million and a half dollars during the past year. On former occasions I have urged, in order to avoid the continuance of this serious cheat in the use of names of members of Congress without their knowledge or consent, that the law be so changed as to require the written signature of the person exercising the franking privilege upon the matter franked; and to relieve the heads of Departments and bureaus of great labor, that a franking clerk be authorized by law for each Department of the Government, with the right to frank all matter pertaining to the Department for which he is so appointed; and to relieve members of Congress from great labor and care, that one or more franking clerks be appointed for each House of Congress to frank such letters and public documents as it is desirable to send free through the mails. I have thus far failed to secure any attention to these urgent appeals, and am becoming satisfied that the only way to avoid an abuse which is becoming systematized and which is so severe a tax upon the revenues of the Department is to abolish the franking privilege altogether.

POST OFFICES IN BOSTON AND NEW YORK.

In the city of Boston the Government has purchased, for a large sum of money, a very valuable site for a post office and for revenue offices. It is of very great importance, both to the postal and revenue service, that at as early a day as possible plans for buildings should be adopted and appropriations made to erect them. There is no occasion for any delay, and every reason that economy and public necessity can suggest why the work should go immediately forward. Boston is the capital of New England, and the Government ought to erect public buildings there which would gratify the pride of that people and do honor to itself.

I must again urge that steps be immediately taken to erect a suitable post office in the city of New York. A most eligible site has been purchased there for this purpose. The necessities of the public service demand that there shall be no further delay in this case. The building now occupied for a post office is what is left of an old church. It is patched and battered, full of dark corners and discomforts. The sunlight can scarcely penetrate its gloomy interior. Gas is burnt there day and night, and men work by it. It is over an old graveyard, and under its rotten floors lie skulls and bones, and the damp mold of dead men. On removing the floors for repairs, a short time ago, these unwelcome sights were exposed to view. The building is unfit for any use whatever; yet there, in summer and winter, in heat and cold, by gaslight, from night until morning and from morning until night, three hundred men are at work for the people of the whole United States, and inhaling a poisoned atmosphere every breath they draw. It is a disgrace to the city of New York and a disgrace to the nation. An average of nearly thirty men are sick all the time from laboring in that unwholesome place. The Post Office Department pays every year for extra help on account of it a sum equal to the interest on half a million dollars. It is not always that the commercial and moneyed center of a nation is the same. But the city of New York is both the moneyed and commercial center of the western hemisphere. In fifty years it may be the moneyed center and commercial center of the world. In less than twenty years the city will contain a population of at least three million people—a population equal to that of all the Colonies at the date of the Revolution. It is time now to begin to do something to meet its growing necessities. The post office building is unsafe. It is liable at any time to burn down, and scarcely a day passes but there goes through that office, in money, drafts, and securities, from ten to thirty million dollars in value. To erect suitable public buildings there is the nation's work, and the nation's representatives ought to attend to it.

In the year 1854 the deficiency of the Department, as between revenues and expenditures, was $1,621,887 90; in the year 1855 the deficiency was $2,626,206 16; in the year 1856 it was $2,787,046 50; in the year 1857 it was $3,453,718 40; in the year 1858 it was $4,543,843 70; in the year 1859 it was $6,996,009 26; in the year 1860 it was $5,656,705 49; in the year 1861 it was $4,557,462 71; in the year 1862 it was $2,112,814 57; in the year 1863 it was $150,417 25; in the year 1864 it was $206,532 42; in the year 1865 there was a surplus of revenues over expenditures of $861,430 42; in the year 1866 the excess of expenditures over revenues left a deficiency of $965,093 09, making the expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1866, $1,826,523 67 greater than for the year ending June 30, 1865. The years 1865 and 1866 above mentioned were the two years in which the Department was administered by my immediate predecessor. The deficiency for the year ending June 30, 1867, was $1,906,789 92, including as revenue $900,000 drawn under acts making appropriations for carrying free mail matter, and not including as expenditure $1,191,666 67 paid for service for which special appropriation was made.

The actual difference between revenues independent of special appropriations and expenditures, including special appropriations, was $3,998,456 59.

The revenues independent of special appropriations, for the year ending June 30, 1868, were $16,292,600 80; and the expenditures including service for which special appropriations were made, were $22,780,592 65, showing an excess of expenditures of $6,487,991 85. To meet this deficiency there were drawn under appropriations made for carrying free matter $3,800,000, and under acts making special appropriations for overland mail and marine service between New York and California, $1,125,000; steamship service between San Francisco, Japan, and China, $125,000; between the United States and Brazil, $150,000; for carrying mail on routes established by acts passed during the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, $486,525; and for preparing and publishing post-route maps, $10,000; leaving a deficiency, as stated in the first part of this report, for the year ending June 30, 1868, of $741,466 85.

It is seen from the foregoing statement of receipts, expenditures, and appropriations that in supplying necessary postal accommodations for the people the excess of expenditures over revenues rapidly increased from 1854 to 1859 and 1860, inclusive; the deficiency for 1859 being $6,996,009 26, and for the year 1860 being $5,656,705 49. After the year 1860 the expensive service in the southern States began rapidly to diminish, until in the year 1865 there was so little mail service performed in the States involved in the rebellion that the revenues exceeded the expenditures by $861,430 42. The service was almost entirely suspended. Directly after the war ended and during the second year of the administration of my immediate predecessor, ending June 30, 1866, the Postmaster General entered upon the serious task of restoring the service in the insurgent States. In the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas the service was restored during the year ending June 30, 1866, to an extent costing $1,086,527.

In the same States the cost of service for the year ending June 30, 1867, increased to $1,891,531, and for the year ending June 30, 1868, it increased to the sum of $2,168,459. This expenditure was for transportation alone, and include none of the other large expenses necessarily connected with the postal service in those States.

Before the rebellion, and in times of ordinary prosperity, the excess of expenditures over the revenues of the Department was nearly $7,000,000. The almost total abandonment of the service in the southern States, and the rapid increase of revenue growing out of the remarkable increase of correspondence connected with the Army and Army operations, and of domestic correspondence between soldiers and their families and friends, soon brought expenses and revenues near together, and in the year ending June 30, 1865, left an unexpended balance in the Treasury, as before stated.

In the year ending June 30, 1865, the aggregate length of routes was 142,340 miles, and the annual transportation reduced to 57,998,694 miles.

During the year ending June 30, 1866, the aggregate length of routes had increased to 180,921 miles, and the annual transportation to 71,837,914 miles, an increase of 38,581 miles in length of routes, and of 13,844,220 miles in annual transportation.

During the year ending June 30, 1867, the aggregate length of routes had increased to 202,245 miles, and the annual transportation to 78,982,789 miles, an increase of 21,324 miles in length of routes, and an increase in transportation of 7,144,875 miles over the previous year.

During the year ending June 30, 1868, the aggregate length of routes increased to 216,928 miles, and the annual transportation increased to 84,224,325 miles, an increase of 14,683 miles in length of routes, and 5,241,516 miles in annual transportation.

Since the 30th day of June, 1865, and to the 1st day of July, 1868, three years, the aggregate length of mail routes has increased 74,588 miles, and the annual transportation has increased 26,230,631 miles.

Since I came to the head of the Post Office Department, in July, 1866, after the close of my immediate predecessor's second and last year as Postmaster General, the aggregate length of mail routes put under contract and in actual operation up to the 1st day of July, 1868, is 86,003 miles, and the increase of annual transportation for the time increased 12,886,411 miles.

The increase of service and great increase of the expenses of the Department for inland mail transportation have not all arisen from the restoration of mail service in the late disordered States. A large amount of the service in operation previous to the war, and discontinued during the war, has not yet been restored. In addition to the increased and increasing railroad transportation, with its increasing expenses, Congress, by a series of acts, between the 3d day of March, 1865, and the 25th day of July, 1868—a little over three years—created 1,267 new mail routes, with an aggregate length of 48,744 miles, to wit:

By act of March 3, 1865, 114 routes—6,640 miles.

By act of March 14, 1866, 76 routes—4,901 miles.

By acts of July 18 and 26, 1866, 367 routes—15,741 miles.

By act of March 2, 1867, 139 routes—4,888 miles.

By act of March 30, 1868, 386 routes—10,779 miles.

By act of July 25, 1868, 185 routes—5,795 miles.

Of these, thirty-three were established in the late rebel States, with an aggregate length of less than 1,000 miles. One hundred were established in the Territories with an aggregate length of 12,141 miles. The following is a complete list of States and Territories in which such service was established, with the amount of such service in each State:

I have the satisfaction of stating that a decree has been rendered in the high court of chancery of the Dominion of Canada, in the "stamp case," (the United States vs. Boyd et al.,) in favor of the plaintiffs. This action was brought to recover United States postage stamps of the value of about ten thousand five hundred dollars, which had been stolen in July, 1864, from the steamer Electric Spark, conveying the United States mails from New York to New Orleans, which was captured at sea by the armed steamer Florida, a piratical vessel sailing under rebel colors. The court sustained the right of the United States to the stamps, awarding costs of suit and ordering the return of the stamps to this country. The preparation of the case in this country was chiefly conducted by Joseph A. Ware, esq., solicitor of the Auditor's office, who deserves great credit for his diligence and skill, and the case was prosecuted under the counsel and direction of Hon. Caleb Cushing. The report of the solicitor of the Auditor's office and the opinion of the chancellor is published in the appendix.

The subject of connecting the postal service with the magnetic telegraph is one deserving the special attention of Congress. An independent report on the subject will be prepared and submitted for consideration at an early day.

The rapid growth of the postal service of the United States since the present organization of the Post Office Department was established by the act of July 2, 1836, has devolved on its officers an amount of business of so extensive, varied, and responsible a character that a reorganization, wisely adapted to the present and prospective condition of the service is necessary to secure the greatest practicable efficiency in its administration. I will take an early opportunity to prepare and submit to Congress for its approval a plan for its reorganization.

Respectfully submitted:

ALEX. W. RANDALL,

Postmaster General.

The PRESIDENT.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, November 30, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the reports received by this Department from its bureau and other officers have, pursuant to law, been transmitted to the Public Printer. They furnish copious details touching the several branches of the public service to which they relate.

During the last fiscal year public lands were disposed of as follows:

	Acres.
Cash sales.....	914,941.33
Located with military warrants.....	512,533.42
Taken for homesteads.....	2,328,923.25
Approved to States as swamp.....	259,197.85
Grants to railroads.....	697,257.57
Located with college scrip.....	1,942,889.08
	6,655,742.50

a quantity less by 385,372 acres than that disposed of the previous year.

The cash receipts of the office during the same period, from all sources, amounted to $1,632,745 90, which exceeds the amount received from the same sources the previous fiscal year by $284,883 38.

Nearly one fourth of the homestead entries were made under the act of June 21, 1866, which applies only to the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida.

The quantity of land still undisposed of is 1,405,366,678 acres.

Measures have been taken for establishing the boundary lines between Nebraska and Colorado, Nebraska and Wyoming, Nevada, Utah, and Arizona, and for running the northern boundary of New Mexico.

I invite attention to the views presented in my former reports in regard to certain amendments of the preemption and homestead laws.

The report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office is very elaborate, and affords much valuable and interesting information in relation to the agricultural, mineral, and other resources of the several land States and Territories, as well as many judicious suggestions on the operation of the laws regulating the disposal of the public domain.

Of the two revolutionary soldiers pensioned by special acts of Congress in 1867, John Gray, of Ohio, has died. The other, Daniel F. Bakeman, of New York, is reported as living.

There are at the present time on the rolls the names of 888 widows of revolutionary soldiers, and 1,303 widows and children of soldiers who served in wars subsequent to the Revolution and prior to the rebellion.

During the past year there were examined and allowed 9,825 new applications for invalid pensions of soldiers, at an aggregate annual rate of $628,271 70, and 4,854 applications for increased pension of invalid soldiers, at an annual aggregate rate of $280,487 28. During the same period 19,242 original pensions to widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of soldiers were allowed, at an aggregate annual rate of $1,910,202 70, and 27,053 applications by the same class for increased pay were also admitted, at a total annual rate of $1,725,960. On the 30th June, 1868, there were on the rolls 74,782 invalid military pensioners, whose yearly pensions amounted to $6,828,025 26, and 92,243 widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of soldiers whose yearly pensions amounted to $12,065,068 94, making the total aggregate of Army pensioners 167,025, at a total annual rate of $18,893,094 20. The whole amount paid during the last fiscal year to invalid military pensioners was $7,484,796 85; to widows, orphans, and dependent relatives, $16,178,801 93; a grand total of $23,663,598 78, which includes the expenses of the disbursing agencies.

During the same year there were admitted 135 new applications for invalid Navy pensions, at an annual rate of $12,890; 50 applications for increased pensions of the same class at an annual aggregate of $2,994; 219 original applications of widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of those who died in the Navy, at an aggregate rate of $26,012 per annum, and 72 pensions of the same class were increased at a total yearly rate of $3,600. On the 30th June, 1868, the rolls of the Navy pensioners bore the names of 1,175 invalids, at an annual aggregate of $94,883 75, and 1,443 widows, orphans, and dependent relatives, at an aggregate annual rate of $286,256. The amount paid during the last fiscal year to Navy invalids was $97,340, and to widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of officers and seamen of the Navy, $255,043 21; a total amount of $352,383 21.

During the year there were added to the number of pensioners of all classes 28,921, there were dropped, from various causes, 14,752, leaving on the rolls, June 30, 1868, 169,643. The total amount paid for pensions of all classes, including the expenses of disbursement, was $24,010,981 99, a sum greater by $5,391,025 53 than that paid the previous year.

There were 1,077 bounty-land warrants issued for 167,720 acres.

The expenditures for special agencies are largely exceeded by the pecuniary gain to the Government. Over 300 claims have thus been found fraudulent, amounting to $27,000 per annum.

The Commissioner presents in his able report valuable suggestions touching the codification and administration of the pension laws, and other matters relating to the office, to which I respectfully invite attention.

Treaties have been concluded with various Indian tribes, as follows:

With the Kiowas, Comanches, and Apaches, October 21, 1867; the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, October 23, 1867; the Tabeguaches and six other bands of Ute Indians, March 2, 1868; the Cherokees, April 27, 1868; the Mountain Crows, May 7, 1868; the northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes, May 10, 1868; and the Navajoes, June 1, 1868. The foregoing treaties have been ratified. The following treaties, concluded with various tribes since July 1, 1867, have not been ratified: with the Sioux nation, (different bands,) 29th April, 1868; the Osages, 29th May, 1868; the Chippewas of Swan creek and Black river, June 1, 1868; the Bannacks and Shoshones, July 3, 1868; the Gros Ventres, July 13, 1868; the River Crows, July 15,

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

1868; the Cherokees, July 19, 1868; the Blackfeet, September 1, 1868; the Bannacks, Shoshones, and Sheep-eaters, September 24, 1868.

The leading stipulations of the treaties which have been proclaimed provide for gathering the respective tribes upon distinct reservations and for securing in due time to each Indian a title to a separate tract of land. Clothing, goods, and farming implements are to be furnished, and school and mission houses, agency buildings, mills, &c., are to be erected. When by a temporary occupation of the Indian hunting grounds or the construction of railways over them we partially deprive the Indians of their accustomed means of subsistence, we should afford them a reasonable indemnity. Our treaties, however, will not be worth the paper upon which they are written if Congress does not furnish the means of executing them. We have no just ground of reproach against most of the tribes for the non-fulfillment of their treaty stipulations. It is a significant fact that during the winter of 1867-68, when more than twenty-seven thousand Indians were subsisted by us, not a single act of depredation or violence was reported. It is believed that peaceful relations would have been maintained to this hour had Congress, in accordance with the estimates submitted, made the necessary appropriations to enable this Department to perform engagements for which the public faith was pledged. A costly Indian war, with all its horrors, would have been avoided.

The lands within the limits of reservations set apart for Indians who have made some progress in the arts of civilized life should not be held in common. When surveyed, the title in severalty to small tracts designated by specific legal subdivisions should be vested in individuals, with no power of alienating them except to members of the tribe. The Government should guaranty to the Indians the perpetual and exclusive right to remain in the undisturbed possession of the reservation, and prohibit, by the severest penalties, the settlement of white persons within it. The latter trespass upon the land of the Indian, and often compel him to abandon his home and seek another in a distant wilderness. So long as this precarious tenure exists, the Indian believes that he has but a temporary right, of which he is to be divested by the advancement of the white population, and the labors of the agents in his behalf will be greatly embarrassed. We have striking examples of the high degree of civilization which the Indians may, under propitious influences, attain. The Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Seminoles, residing within the Indian country west of Arkansas, have given evidence of their capacity for self-government. Institutions are organized under which their civil and political rights have for many years been as well protected as in any part of the country. They have adopted measures for the formation of a territorial government, with a view to their ultimate admission as a member of our Federal Union. Such facts should stimulate us to constant and strenuous efforts in reclaiming the wild tribes and instructing them in the arts of civilized life. Although our progress is slow and beset with formidable difficulties, a just regard to our obligations requires us to persist in the work.

The transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department has been suggested. Our experience during the period when the Indians were under military care and guardianship affords no ground for hope that any benefit to them or the Treasury would be secured by the measure. I assume that it is our duty to promote, by all appropriate and peaceful means, the moral, intellectual, and material condition of these wards of the Government. There is nothing in the pursuits or character of the soldier which especially adapts him to this duty. It can be better fulfilled by our civil officers.

No divided control should, however, be tolerated. Undue interference with the exercise by this Department of its acknowledged and exclusive jurisdiction over the Indians has seriously impaired its efficiency and disturbed our relations with them.

I refer you to the report of the Commissioner for more specific information in regard to Indian affairs.

An act approved March 2, 1867, established a Department of Education, intrusted the management thereof to a Commissioner, provided for his appointment, and authorized the employment of sundry clerks, who were made subject to his appointing and removing power. It devolved upon him the duty of presenting to Congress annual reports, the first of which was to contain a statement in relation to the land grants made by Congress to promote education. An act of the last session declares that the Department of Education shall cease from and after the 30th of June next, and that there shall be established and attached to this Department an office to be denominated "the Office of Education," the chief officer of which shall be the Commissioner of Education.

As the Department of Education will, at the close of the present fiscal year, no longer exist, I submit that the act works at that date a cesser of the present office of Commissioner. A new office, taking effect in futuro, has been created, although the mode of filling it has not been prescribed. The appointment of an officer by legislative enactment is confessedly unconstitutional, as the appointing power is otherwise vested. But without dwelling upon this question, inasmuch as the duties appertaining to the bureau are to be discharged under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, I beg leave to offer for consideration some general views which have impressed me with the conviction that all legislation touching the Department and the Office of Education should be repealed. The acts of Congress and the reports of the Commissioner of Public Lands disclose the extent of the several land grants made by the General Government for seminaries of learning.

The approaching census will exhibit full and authentic educational statistics; and I am unable to perceive the propriety of maintaining a bureau for the purpose of compiling, from the published reports of the local authorities or other sources, information touching the practical operations of the school systems in force in the several States. Those reports are widely diffused and are accessible to the public. The matter which may be elicited is not required to enable Congress to discharge its legitimate duties. Education in the States falls within their exclusive province. The enlightened and active zeal which most of them have manifested on the subject affords an ample guarantee that systems of common schools will be maintained throughout the country. Such modifications as may be required to adapt them to the peculiar condition and wants of the various classes of the population will be seasonably introduced. We shall all gladly hail the day when a title to instruction in the rudiments of knowledge will be regarded as the birthright of every American child. The management of this great interest may, however, be safely and wisely left to the States, to whom alone under the Constitution it belongs.

As in the past, so in the future, when new States shall be admitted into the Union Congress will grant them land for educational and other purposes, and the administration of the fund derived from the sale of it should be confided to them. Interference by Congress in matters of purely local concern can be productive of nothing but unmixed evil.

Should, however, "the Office of Education" be perpetuated, I suggest the propriety of enacting by whom the Commissioner shall be appointed. The act of last session in other respects should be modified. Under the Constitution "Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments." It has been judicially determined that clerks are officers within the meaning of this provision, and the power of appointing such as this bureau may, in the opinion of Congress, require, should therefore be vested in the Secretary of the Interior. The Commissioner, as other officers of like grade, should be required to report to the Department under whose supervision he acts, and not to Congress. An appropriation for the next fiscal year of $6,000 will be required to pay the contingent expenses of the office, salaries of the Commissioner, and two clerks of the first class to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior. This sum will be ample if the office be economically administered. No greater clerical force should be authorized.

During the year ending September 30, 1868, there were 20,112 applications for patents; 14,153 patents (including reissues and designs) were issued; 1,692 applications allowed on which patents did not issue owing to the non-payment of the final fee; 3,789 caveats filed; 180 applications for the extension of patents received, of which 133 were granted. The receipts were $693,786 78, being $171 64 less than the expenditures.

Congress, on the 20th of July last, directed that all moneys standing to the credit of the patent fund, or in the hands of the Commissioner, and all moneys thereafter received at the Patent Office should be paid into the Treasury without deduction, appropriated $250,000 for salaries, miscellaneous, and contingent expenses, and other purposes, and required it to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. The cash then on hand, $63,025 76, was accordingly paid, and the amount to the credit of the patent fund transferred on the books of the Treasury. The expenses from that date to the 31st of October were $173,461 43. The expenses for this and the following month, including the outstanding claims, are estimated at $120,000. An appropriation of $360,000 will be required for the remainder of the fiscal year.

The Commissioner in a communication to me expresses the opinion that in view of the varying amount both of the receipts and expenditures, it is expedient to restore the office to its former position, and, if deemed necessary, to limit the surplus to the credit of the fund. He considers that the miscellaneous character and uncertain extent of clerical and other labor required render impracticable even a proximate estimate of the appropriations for each fiscal year. I do not concur in these views. In my judgment the legislation of the last session was wise and salutary in this regard. The probable expenditures may be estimated with reasonable certainty. The office should report to the Secretary of the Interior and he be authorized and required to exercise an efficient supervision over it. I am satisfied that the absence of such control has led to lavish expenditures and flagrant abuses. The limitations upon the Secretary's appointing power ought to be abolished and this bureau placed upon the same footing in this particular as the other bureaus of the Department. I am gratified to record that the present Commissioner has efficiently and zealously labored to correct irregularities, reduce expenses, enforce a wholesome discipline in the office, and render it in every respect more worthy of public confidence.

I renew my former recommendation in favor of repealing so much of the law as allows an appeal from the decisions of the Commissioner on applications for letters-patent and in interference cases, and respectfully refer to the views on the subject presented in my former reports.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

At the date of my last annual report you had accepted 490 miles of the road and telegraph line of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and the commissioners were then engaged in the examination of an additional section of 20 miles. Since that date, including said 20 miles, 830 have been accepted. The commissioners have submitted reports upon four additional sections, amounting to 100 miles.

By a report from the Government directors, it appears that the expenses for operating the road for the year ending September 30, 1868, were $3,213,565 83. The amount received from passengers during the same time was $1,109,501 28, of which $130,239 62 was from the United States. The amount received from freight was $3,077,330 81, of which the Government paid $550,759 73.

Early attention was given to the proper interpretation of the acts declaring that the roads to which the Government subsidies in lands and bonds were granted should be "first-class." My immediate predecessor, referring to the subject in his annual report, stated that he had invited the directors on the part of the Government and the commissioners to meet for the purpose of determining on a standard of construction and equipment, to which the companies should be required to conform. Their report was submitted to the Secretary, and on February 24, 1866, he directed that it should "be used by the directors and commissioners as a guide for their action in directing or accepting the work."

The act of Congress prescribes that the Government directors shall from time to time report to the Secretary of the Interior in reply to inquiries he may make of them relative to the condition, management, and progress of the work, and shall communicate to him such information as should be in the possession of the Department. I therefore, on the 13th of June last, availed myself of this provision, and directed Mr. Williams and Mr. Rollins, two of the Government directors, to examine the completed portion of the road, and also the regions west thereof over which the company's surveys had been made, and to report touching its location, construction, and equipment, and also the number and condition of the machine and repair shops. Mr. Williams is an experienced civil engineer, and in the absence of Mr. Rollins, who was unavoidably prevented from accompanying him, performed the duty committed to him in a very satisfactory manner. His reports presented such statements that I deemed it my imperative duty, on presenting to you the report of the commissioners on the twenty-fifth section, to invite your attention to the leading facts he communicated, and to request that the Attorney General be directed to advise you whether said report, as to the facts covered by it, was conclusive upon the Executive; and if not, whether upon other satisfactory evidence that the road was not properly constructed you could lawfully withhold from the company all or any part of the lands and bonds to which it would otherwise be entitled.

You acceded to the request. The Attorney General examined the acts of Congress, and the manner in which the executive duty thereby imposed had been discharged, and furnished an elaborate opinion upon the questions submitted. He considered that the duty had, during your and the preceding administration, been judiciously performed; and as it was the main policy of those acts to foster and press on the enterprise, the nature of it required a distinction to be drawn, in some particulars, between a provisional and an absolute completeness of the work. He held that the standard adopted by the Department properly recognized the propriety and necessity of an ultimate revision of the road in order to secure that absolute completeness which in its early stages could not be rightfully exacted as a condition precedent to the advances upon each successive section, and added that it was competent for the Executive, by means of further inquiry from engineers and experts in the construction and management of railroads, to provide for a revision of the work theretofore accepted upon the assurances or obligation of the company to supply as far and as fast as might be what was needed to make the road conform in all respects to the standard, and that a reasonable amount of securities might be reserved to enforce the performance of this obligation of the company.

This Department, on the 25th of September, represented to you that the time had come for such revision. Brevet Major General Gouverneur K. Warren, United States Army, Jacob Blickensderfer, jr., of Ohio, and James Barnes, of Massachusetts, were appointed commissioners for that purpose. The first is an accomplished officer of the corps of engineers. The other gentlemen are civil engineers of large experience and are reputed to be thoroughly versed in the science and practice of their profession.

They were directed to make a thorough personal examination of the road, and to report upon its location, construction, and equipment, and to furnish a proximate estimate of the amount of expenditure required to render it, as far as constructed, "equal in all respects to a fully-completed, first-class railroad." They were also required to report upon the most direct, central, and practicable location from the end of the track to the head of Great Salt Lake, and the estimated cost of construction and equipment of the road between the latter point and the mouth of Weber cañon.

The commissioners' report has just been received. The trust confided to them appears to have been executed with intelligence and fidelity. A description of the location of the road is given. The elevation at Omaha is 946 feet above tide-water, and at the head of Great Salt Lake 4,315 feet. The sum of the ascents going westward is 12,995 feet, and the consequent sum of the descents is 9,626 feet. They are of the opinion that the location of the road, as a whole and in its different parts, is upon the most direct, central, and practicable route, but that the line is not in all respects well adapted to the ground, as there are points where the full capabilities of the country have not been developed, and others where, in its details, the location is radically wrong. This has been occasioned by a desire to diminish the cost of work by the introduction of more and sharper curves than the circumstances require, although the saving in cost was but small in comparison to the permanent injury of the road. The commissioners are of opinion that the line, as built, should not be permanently adopted, and that economy and the best interests of the road require alterations and improvements to be made.

The road, when examined, was built 890 miles from Omaha. Its construction, so far as excavations and embankments were required, was remarkably easy. From Omaha to a point 535 miles west there are no rock excavations, and the natural surface of a great portion of the intermediate country presents nearly practicable grades. From the latter point to the end of the track the work is less than on eastern roads of the same length, and the most difficult parts are light in comparison with roads in the Alleghany mountains. There is but one tunnel. It is on the bank of St. Mary's creek, 230 feet in length.

The road-bed was designed to have embankments fourteen feet wide on top, with the usual side slopes, depending on the material excavated, and cuts of not less than sixteen feet in width of bottom. The higher embankments are not brought up to the proper standard, and in some instances the width of the top is less than the length of the ties. The estimated cost of bringing the embankment up to full width is furnished. Instances also occur where the cuts have not been excavated to the depth designed. The grades are consequently higher than the engineer originally contemplated. In some cases they reach ninety feet per mile, when easier grades were shown upon the profiles. The cuts should all be reduced to the depth at first proposed, in order to secure the proper ruling grades in those divisions of the road where they are located. Many of the cross-ties must be replaced before the track will sustain the traffic that will be thrown upon it on the opening of the road. The average number of them is not less than 2,500 per mile.

The track laying has been done as well as the rapid construction of the road would admit. The commissioners mention as a deficiency that on the curves the rails have not been bent to conform to them. There are portions of the road where ballasting material is wanting and can only be supplied by transporting it from the most accessible points by rail. This is the case in the valley of the Bitter creek, where the soil is of an unfavorable character, and where it would be difficult to sustain a track, particularly in the season of melting snows, unless supported by ballast. The track has, without exception, been laid on the bare roadway, without the latter having been previously prepared to receive it. As a consequence, except where the embankments were built of gravel or other good material, the track is without ballast, the surfacing having been done by throwing up the necessary material for that purpose from the sides of the embankments themselves.

The bridging on the line consists of stone culverts, girders, and truss bridges, and many varieties of truss and pile bridges. Between Omaha and the end of the track the total number of structures deemed permanent is 250, consisting of one iron truss-bridge, seven Howe truss-bridges, constructed of wood and iron, and 242 stone box and arch culverts and short girder bridges with stone abutments. The temporary structures consist of pile and trestle bridges, of which there are 153, each less than 25 feet long, 322, varying in length from 25 to 50 feet, and 219, each over 50 feet long, the total number being 694, and the aggregate length, 43,717 feet, or nearly eight miles. Of these 694 structures, 84 over the principal streams are to be replaced by Howe truss-bridges, erected on permanent stone abutments and piers. These will require 70 abutments, 26 piers, and 8,450 lineal feet of Howe truss in spans, respectively, of 100 and 150 feet. In some cases the foundations for permanent pier and abutment masonry, erected or in course of construction, were not placed at a proper depth. The remaining 660 trestle and pile bridges, after providing for those over the principal streams, must be replaced by box culverts, arches, or stone abutments, with girders or trusses of short spans.

The rolling stock of the road consists of 117 locomotives, 19 first-class and eight second-class passenger cars, 15 baggage, 442 box, 1,227 flat, 43 coal, and 72 caboose cars, besides hand and other cars suited to special purposes. The locomotives are well constructed, and the number on hand probably sufficient for the present wants of the road. An additional number will be required for that part of the road when the line is open for through traffic. The cars are equal to those on the best roads, and the accommodations for the care, maintenance, and repair of the rolling stock are now sufficient to meet current demands, but must be enlarged from time to time to meet the increasing necessities of the road.

The commissioners submit the following estimate of expenditure which will be required to render the first 890 miles of the road equal to a fully completed first-class railroad. No allowances are made for work in progress, or materials and equipments ordered or reported

Additional station buildings.....	75,000
Additional snow fences.....	50,000
Additional fencing against stock.....	30,000

Total.....$6,489,550

The following estimate is furnished by the commissioners of the cost of constructing and fully equipping the road from the mouth of the Weber cañon to the head of Great Salt lake:

For grading and bridging, including masonry and foundations complete, 96.3 miles, at $11,500 per mile.....	$1,107,450
For superstructure, including rails and fastenings, spikes, ties, track laying, and ballasting, with six per cent. of sidings, 102 miles, at $17,000 per mile.....	1,734,000
For equipment, including motive power, rolling stock, engine-houses, turn-tables, shops, tools, water stations, and station buildings, 96.3 miles, at $7,000 per mile....	674,100
Total.....	$3,515,550

As the actual cost of this road is a matter of public interest I deem it proper to present, in a condensed form, the estimates submitted, on the 14th instant, by Jesse L. Williams, esq. He states that the cost of the road as shown on the books of the railroad company is, of course, equivalent to the contract price per mile. The actual cost to the contractors forming an association, which embraces most of the larger stockholders of the company, is shown only by their private books, to which the Government directors have no access. The calculations were, therefore, made from the most accurate available data, and the estimated cost of the first 710 miles of the road was taken as the basis for computing that of the whole line. Should the road, as is expected by the company, form a junction with that of the California company, near the northern extreme of Great Salt lake, a little west of Monument Point, its length would be about 1,110 miles. The cost of locating, constructing, and completely equipping it and the telegraph line is $38,824,821; an average per mile of $34,977 82.

The Government subsidy in bonds for that distance at par amounts to $29,504,000, an average per mile of $26,580. The company's first mortgage bonds are estimated at 92 per cent., and would yield $27,143,680. The fund realized by the company from these two sources amounts to $56,647,680, being an average per mile of $51,034, exceeding by $16,056 68 the actual cost of constructing and fully equipping the road, and yielding a profit of more than $17,750,000.

The deficiencies in the road noted by the commissioners are in their opinion, almost without exception, incident to new roads, or of a character growing out of the peculiar difficulties inseparably connected with the unexampled rapidity with which it has been constructed. Supplying them in the first instance would have materially retarded the progress of the work, and the expenditure at the present time for the purpose will but little exceed that originally required. It is obviously the duty, and no doubt the desire, of the company to bring up the constructed portion of the road to the required standard, while at the same time they are energetically pressing forward the work upon the remainder of the line. An imperative duty is devolved upon the Executive to insist upon the exact fulfillment of the engagements of the company, and to use all just and available means to secure it. I have therefore the honor to recommend that the issue of patents for land and of bonds be suspended until such deficiencies shall have been supplied.

The instructions to the commissioners required them, after they should have reported upon the Union Pacific railroad, to examine and report upon the roads of the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, and the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company. I have received no further report than that of which I have endeavored to give a faithful summary.

The Central Pacific Railroad Company of California have constructed 390 miles of their road and telegraph line, of which 296 were constructed and accepted since my last annual report. This company filed a map of the definite location of their road from Humboldt Wells via the head of Great Salt lake, to the mouth of Weber cañon. On the 15th of May last I gave my "consent and approval" to the location as far as the head of Great Salt lake, a distance of 140 miles. Subsequent surveys corrected and improved the unaccepted part of the line, and on the 14th ultimo they filed a map and profile from the head of Great Salt lake to Echo Summit, to which location I gave my "consent and approval."

The company state that their earnings for the six months ending June 30, 1868, were from passengers $145,048 70, and from freight $264,410 41. Their expenses for the same period were $157,068 89, and their indebtedness at that date $26,862,727, of which the sum of $7,340,000 was on account of bonds issued by the United States in aid of the construction of the road.

On the 18th ultimo special commissioners, Sherman Day, United States surveyor general of California, Brevet Lieutenant Colonel R. S. Williamson, United States Army, and Lloyd Tevis, were appointed to examine the roads and telegraph lines of the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California and the Western Pacific Railroad Company. They were instructed to report in regard to the location, road-bed, cross-ties, track laying, ballasting, rolling stock, repair shops, station buildings, culverts, bridges, viaducts, turnouts, and all other appurtenances of the roads, and the amount of expenditure required to render them, so far as built, equal in every respect to fully-constructed first-class railroads. No report has been received.

At the date of my last annual report the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, had constructed 305 miles of their road and telegraph line, and 285 miles thereof had been accepted. Since that date 88,343½ miles have been accepted.

The amendatory act approved July 3, 1866, authorized this company to designate a new route and file a map thereof. They were required, however, to connect with the Union Pacific at a point not more than fifty miles westerly from the meridian of Denver, in Colorado. Their right to bonds was limited to the amount they would have received had the road been constructed on the original route to the one hundredth meridian of longitude. No acceptable survey had been made from Fort Riley to that meridian, and as the Department was not officially advised of the exact distance between those points, Brevet Major C. W. Howell, captain of engineers, United States Army, was at my request assigned on the 8th of June last, by the Secretary of War, to make such survey. He executed the duty, and submitted a report under date of September 28, 1868. He determined the distance to be 258,343½ miles. He also ascertained that the meridian is 9,300 feet west of the point designated by the Union Pacific Railroad Company. This survey was approved by you. The distance for which the company was entitled to bonds is 398,343½ miles.

The following summary is made from the report: they have constructed and operated the road 405 miles west of the initial point. It has been provided with round-house accommodations, repair shops, turn-tables, water-tanks, sidings, &c., to meet the immediate wants of business, and the necessary ware-houses and depot buildings have been erected at the stations for the accommodation of passengers and freight. The equipment is as follows: 29 locomotive engines, 21 passenger and 878 other cars. The aggregate earnings, from September 1, 1867, to August 31, 1868, were $1,878,588 83, and the expenses $1,247,816 83, leaving the net earnings $680,771 95. The average length of road operated during the year was 331½ miles, and the average earnings per mile $5,666 93. Surveying parties, employed in examining the routes of the thirty-second and thirty-fifth parallels, have discovered on the latter a practicable route westward from Albuquerque to the Pacific. It crosses the Colorado river south of Fort Mohave, and thence runs westward to the city of San Francisco, through Tehachepah Pass of the Sierra Nevada mountains, which is only 4,020 feet above the sea. The highest point is in the San Francisco mountains, 7,464 feet. The entire line is exempt from obstruction by snow, and traverses a country rich in mineral wealth and abounding in timber and coal. Surveys have also been made from Fort Mohave on the Colorado river to San Diego, and from Fort Wallace, Kansas, via Puntia Pass and San Louis Park, to Albuquerque. The cost of surveys in 1867 and 1868 was about $225,000.

The hostility of the Indian tribes of the plains seriously interfered at times with the working of the road west of Fort Harker. Stations have been burned, rolling stock destroyed, and a number of men killed. Trains, nevertheless, made their usual trips, but the trade with New Mexico and Colorado was almost entirely suspended.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Since my last report the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company have completed sixty additional miles of road and telegraph line. They are entitled, under the acts of Congress, to no further subsidy.

Sixty-nine and a half miles of the road and telegraph line of the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company were completed, equipped, and accepted in March last. About thirty-one and a half miles, necessary to make a connection with the Union Pacific railroad, are under contract and in process of grading. The iron has been purchased and is in transitu. The company have secured a water front of about one mile on each side of the Missouri river, and have contracted for a steam ferry to pass the cars over the river.

The indebtedness of the company is represented to be:

Cash of stockholders.....	$1,676,000 00
United States bonds received on 69½ miles road.....	1,112,000 00
Due contractors.....	511,801 02

Aggregating.....$3,299,801 02

No stock certificates or first-mortgage bonds have been issued. The amount received is given as—

From passengers.....	$51,407 79
From freight.....	44,156 14
From telegraph.....	1,135 97

Total.....$96,699 90

Operating expenses.....$53,184 08

The company have six first-class locomotives and ninety-nine passenger and other cars in use. They expect to have the whole line of road completed and in operation next month.

No track has been laid by the Western Pacific Railroad Company within the past year. They, however, reported on the 15th of September last that the grading of the unfinished part of the road would be completed and ready for the track in a few months.

No portion of the Northern Pacific railroad has been constructed. The company report that surveys have not been continued during the past season for want of a military escort to protect surveying parties.

In 1867 two lines were run from Lake Superior; one commencing at the west end of the lake and the other at Bayfield. The first, following a westerly course, crosses the Mississippi about twelve miles above Crow Wing; thence runs south of and near to Otter Tail Lake, and pursuing the same general course intersects the Red river at a point between Fort Abercrombie and the mouth of the Sioux Wood river. The second follows a southwesterly course for fourteen miles to Pleasant Bay; thence westerly to within eighteen miles of Superior; thence its course is direct to the Mississippi, crossing that river at St. Cloud; thence northwesterly up the Sauk valley to the Sioux Wood river a little to the south of where it joins the Otter Tail river. Both of these lines have such a direction on approaching the Red or Sioux Wood rivers that when continued westerly they will pass to the south of and near the Cheyenne river in Dakota. The distance of the first is 232 miles, and its estimated cost $7,967,000, being an average per mile of $34,357 48. The distance of the second is 317 miles, and its estimated cost $11,815,000, being an average per mile of $37,236 05. The alignment is favorable on both routes. The maximum gradients will not exceed thirty to forty feet to the mile, and are of limited extent. Upon the Pacific side the surveys were confined to an examination of the Cascade range, with a view to ascertain the relative elevation and practicability of the passes. Three were found; the Cowlitz or Packwood, 2,600; the Snoqualmie, 3,030; and Cady's, 4,800 feet above the level of the sea.

The Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company have not filed the report required by the act of June 23, 1868, and no information touching their doings has been communicated to this Department.

The Southern Pacific Railroad Company report that they have surveyed only that portion of their line lying between the towns of San José and Gilroy, in the county of Santa Clara, a distance of thirty miles. The grading is rapidly progressing. The iron has been purchased and is in transitu. They expect to complete this thirty miles of road by the 1st of April, 1869. Their capital stock is $1,800,000, of which $72,000 has been actually paid in, and their indebtedness $480,000.

The following statement exhibits the amount of United States bonds issued to the respective railroad companies:

Union Pacific, 820 miles.....	$20,238,000
Central Pacific of California, 390 miles.....	14,764,000
Union Pacific, eastern division, 393 9425-10000 miles.....	6,303,000

Central Branch, Union Pacific, }	960,000

1,793½ miles nearly.....$44,337,000

The act of July 13, 1868, authorized the sum of $6,500, appropriated by the act of March 3, 1865, to be applied to the completion of the bridge over the Dakota river, on the line of the wagon road between Sioux city and the mouth of the Big Cheyenne. A superintendent was appointed in August last and the bridge is in process of construction.

The architect reports the completion of the exterior marble work, and of the arrangements for securing a supply of water to the central building and south wing of the Capitol. Many of the passages and rooms have been painted, and other improvements made. Sewers for drainage have been built, and the archways under the porticoes paved, one with the Nicolson and the other with the Burlew & Smith's tar and gravel concrete pavement. He submits a new plan for the extension of the eastern front of the central building.

The bronze doors designed by Crawford have been finished, and placed in position at the main entrance to the northern wing.

The central portion of the Capitol has been kept in good repair. It is desirable that Congress should, without delay, authorize the construction of apparatus to heat the rotunda, in the same manner as the corridors and other passages of the building are now heated.

The obvious necessity for the extension of the Capitol grounds induced Congress to authorize the appraisal of the contiguous private property, the annexation of which was deemed indispensable. Certain squares were appraised in the year 1860, but in the absence of legislation no further step has been taken in acquiring a title to them. The appreciation of other real estate in that portion of the city would seem to require their reappraisal. Delay complicates the difficulties incident to the subject, and I earnestly repeat my former recommendation of immediate and favorable action by Congress.

The north portico of this Department has been completed, and considerable progress made in inclosing the adjoining grounds and in flagging the sidewalk which borders them. The fund appropriated for these purposes, although carefully and economically expended, was insufficient. I confidently trust that Congress will at an early period of the approaching session provide means for the completion of these necessary improvements and for paving G street, between Seventh and Ninth streets.

The office of Commissioner of Public Buildings was formerly under the supervisory control of the Secretary of the Interior. The act of March 2, 1867, abolished it, and devolved upon the chief engineer of the Army its duties as well as the superintendence of the Washington aqueduct and of all the public works and improvements in this District, unless otherwise provided by law. It was evidently impracticable for him to discharge in person these obligations in addition to his other arduous labors. An act approved the 29th of that month provided that the expenditure of the moneys which had been appropriated for disbursement by the Commissioner should be under the direction of such officer of the corps as the chief engineer might direct. On the following day Congress provided that all moneys appropriated for the Washington aqueduct and for the other public works in this District should be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War. The terms of this act were broad enough to embrace the Capitol and the contiguous public grounds, but by another act of the same date the control of them was reserved to this Department.

I recommend that these acts be repealed, and the office of Commissioner of Public Buildings reestablished. I hazard nothing in saying that since it was discontinued the duties which appertained to it have not been discharged more efficiently than formerly. This improvident legislation divides the charge over the public grounds and works between two Executive Departments and withdraws an officer of the Army from his appropriate duties to perform services having no relation to his professional pursuits and acquisitions.

The following statement shows the amount advanced to marshals of the several districts during the year ending June 30, 1868, for defraying the expenses of the courts of the United States, including fees of marshals, jurors, and witnesses, maintenance of prisoners, and contingencies:

The amount paid during the same period to district attorneys, their assistants and substitutes, was $190,703; to United States commissioners, $78,522 19; to clerks of the courts of the United States, $76,584 26; and for miscellaneous expenditures, including rent of court rooms, $106,325 95. The aggregate amounts to $1,789,177 76, being but $159,641 26 in excess of the sum expended for such purposes during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, notwithstanding the largely-increased business transacted by the Federal courts. At the latter date the balance on hand amounted to $332,886 03. Congress appropriated $1,300,000. There were received on account of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, $203,685 43, and from repayments by marshals and others, $10,819 29. The total amount at the disposal of the Department for this branch of the service was $1,847,370 75, so that the balance at the commencement of the current year was but $58,192 99. Assuming that during its progress the fines, penalties, and forfeitures would reach the same amount as during the preceding year, and satisfied that the expenses of the courts could not be materially diminished, I estimated that $1,600,000 would be required. Congress, however, appropriated but $1,000,000. A deficit of $459,015 23 will occur unless the fines, &c., should be increased. I recommend that $500,000 be appropriated in the deficiency bill, and that $1,600,000 be appropriated for the next fiscal year.

It is proper to add that the large balance on the 30th of June, 1867, as compared with that at the close of the following fiscal year, was occasioned by the great disparity in the amounts realized during the respective years from fines, penalties, and forfeitures. It was $439,335 76 more during the former than the latter year.

On the 1st instant there were in the custody of the warden of the District jail 141 prisoners. Of this number 33 were females and 113 persons of color. During the year preceding that date 1,022 persons were committed; 233 were convicted of various misdemeanors, and 69 sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor in the penitentiary at Albany. The expenses, including the cost of the transportation of prisoners, were $34,388 37.

In view of the insecure and crowded condition of the jail, and its unfitness in every respect as a proper place of confinement, Congress authorized the construction of a building of adequate dimensions. My predecessor selected a site therefor on grounds belonging to the Government in this city. The required steps were being taken with all practicable dispatch to "let the contracts." Congress, however, interposed, and directed the selection of a new site. This was done. Perfected plans were then prepared, and after due advertisement and a careful comparison of the bids, contracts were awarded and bonds executed in strict compliance with the statute. The contractors soon after commenced work, and it was actively progressing when, under a mistaken impression of fact, Congress, on the 11th day of January last, directed it to be suspended for forty days. At the expiration of that period the expediency of further legislation in the premises continued to attract attention, and was receiving the consideration of Congress. A bill subsequently passed one House, and is now pending in the other. At the request of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds the work has not been resumed. This protracted and unnecessary delay has arisen from causes beyond the control of the Department, and occasioned serious injury to innocent parties and the public. As the projected new building is absolutely necessary, I hope that Congress will take prompt and decisive action in regard to it.

Some years ago the penitentiary in this city was appropriated by the military authorities. It was never restored to its original uses, and has been since destroyed. Adults, convicted of felony and sentenced by the supreme court of this District to imprisonment at hard labor, are sent to an institution in the State of New York. Considerable expense is incurred in transporting and subsisting them. Persons convicted of crime against the United States may be imprisoned in a State prison or house of correction of an adjoining State or district, if, within the jurisdiction of the court pronouncing the sentence, there be no suitable place of confinement. Convicts from some of the southern States were formerly confined, during the term of their sentence, in the penitentiary here, but are now conveyed to more distant points at increased expense. A penitentiary, properly constructed and judiciously managed, could be rendered self-sustaining by the labor of the convicts. The Government is the proprietor of lands in this vicinity which afford excellent sites for such a building. The neighboring quarries furnish stone of a superior quality. Considerations of economy suggest to Congress the expediency of adopting, at their approaching session, measures for the erection of a District penitentiary.

I am not officially advised of the condition of the House of Correction for this District, as the trustees have submitted no report.

No addition has been made to the Metropolitan police force. Its members have been active and vigilant in the maintenance of good order and the protection of the rights of persons and property within the District. During the past year they made 18,834 arrests, 3,549 of which were females; 11,165 of those arrested were unmarried, and 7,387 could neither read nor write; 6,409 were dismissed, 64 turned over to the military, and 880 committed to jail; 341 gave bail for their appearance at court, 2,056 were sent to the workhouse, and 675 required to enter into bonds to keep the peace. In 327 cases minor punishments were inflicted. Fines in 8,082 cases were assessed, amounting to $35,274 40; 4,038 destitute persons were furnished with temporary lodgings; 165 lost children were restored to their homes, and 167 sick and disabled persons were assisted and taken to the hospital. Of the number arrested 12,762 were charged with offenses committed upon the person, and 6,032 with offenses against property. The detective force made 453 arrests, recovered lost or stolen property to the amount of $25,727 85, and discharged other important duties. The labors of the sanitary company, although insufficient for the purpose, were chiefly directed to the abatement of nuisances and the enforcement of the police regulations for promoting the cleanliness of the city. More efficient measures should be devised to secure objects so essential to the health and comfort of the population.

During the month of November, 1867, a complete census of the inhabitants of the District was taken by this force for the use of the Department of Education.

In my previous reports I invited attention to the expediency of creating a court for the summary trial of offenses of a minor grade. A justice of the peace of this District, in the exercise of criminal jurisdiction, chiefly acts as an examining magistrate. Most of such offenses are cognizable in the supreme court, where the accused is rarely put upon his trial until the term after an indictment against him has been found. If unable to give bail he remains in custody. When a prima facie case against him has been made out at the preliminary examination the witnesses are recognized to appear before the grand jury, and subsequently before the court after indictment found. Their fees for such attendance are taxed against the United States. Many of them are transient persons without a fixed residence. It often occurs that when the cause is called for trial it is discontinued by reason of their absence beyond the reach of process. The accused thus escapes deserved punishment. During the last fiscal year the expense of the criminal court in this District amounted to $26,612 12. It was defrayed exclusively by the Government. A tribunal such as I have suggested has been organized in almost every other populous city, and with evident benefit to the public. By its instrumentality the ends of criminal justice would be effectually and cheaply served, and the right of the accused to a speedy trial attained. The supreme court of the District, relieved of a large and increasing number of prosecutions, could with greater dispatch dispose of the civil cases on its calendar.

During the year ending June 30, 1868, the expenditures of the Government Hospital for the Insane were $114,035 81, and there were admitted 152 patients, being an excess of 43 over the number admitted the preceding year. One hundred and nineteen of them were males, 69 of whom were from the Army and Navy. The whole number under treatment was 432. Seventy-six were discharged; of these 63 were restored and eight improved. There remained under treatment at that date 329. There have been 1,464 persons treated in the institution since it was opened, of whom 1,145 were natives of this country. The board recommend that there be appropriated $90,500 for the support of the institution during the year ending June 30, 1870; $10,000 for the completion of the wall inclosing the grounds, and $23,000 for the purchase of 148 acres of ground. The excellent management of this institution eminently entitles it to the continued confidence and patronage of Congress. The estimates are reasonable, and I cordially commend them to the most favorable consideration.

During the last fiscal year 22 pupils were admitted into the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, and the directors request the following appropriations: to supply a deficit for the current fiscal year, $17,500; for support of the institution for the year ending June 30, 1870, $31,000; for buildings, $66,000; and for improving grounds, $4,000; making in all $118,500.

In my last report I earnestly commended to the fostering care of Congress the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum. The act of the 27th of July last appropriated $15,000 for the support of the institution during the current year, and required that all expenditures should be made under the direction of the Surgeon General of the Army.

During the year ending the 30th of June last the total number of women under treatment was 631; 33 of them were pay patients, from whom the sum of $1,339 44 was received; 549 were restored to health; 10 were relieved, and 12 died. The small amount of receipts is ascribed to the want of requisite accommodations. Most of the available space was occupied by free patients, to the exclusion of many who desired to secure private apartments. The increased number of inmates rendered necessary a considerable outlay for furniture and bedding. The funds derived during the last fiscal year, from all sources, were insufficient to cover the actual expenditures, and at the close thereof the institution was $7,000 in debt. The directors request that a clause appropriating that sum be inserted in the deficiency bill.

The estimates for rent and the support of the institution during the next year are $18,000. I do not doubt that Congress will cheerfully accord that amount. I also submit an estimate for the purchase of ground and the erection of permanent buildings for the use of the institution. The title to the property, when acquired, should be vested in the United States.

The laws providing for the receipt, custody, and distribution by this Department, of the Statutes of the United States, and other official publications, have, as far as practicable, been carried into effect. I invite attention to the propriety of revising the statutes which relate to the printing and distribution of documents published by the authority of Congress.

One of my predecessors, on the eve of his retirement from office, urged the propriety of an appropriation for erecting and furnishing suitable residences for the Vice President of the United States and the heads of the Executive Departments. After alluding to the value of money when the Government went into operation, and the salaries of those officers were originally fixed, as compared with that which it bore in December, 1852, when his report was submitted, he expressed the opinion that $6,000 at the latter date was not worth much more than $3,000 at the former. The cost of rent, provisions, fuel, and other necessities of life in this city, had then risen to such a degree that the most rigid economy was required to enable those officers to live within their incomes, and he declared that, as far as his observation extended, few of them had been able to do so.

His remarks in this connection present the facts and my own views in so striking a light that I deem it proper to incorporate them in this paper:

"Upon every change of Administration, or in cases of the death or resignation of members of the Cabinet, their successors, often from remote parts of the country, find themselves embarrassed in obtaining, even at an exorbitant price, a suitable residence for themselves and their families. They are then compelled to expend at least one year's salary in furnishing their establishment, and are consequently obliged to draw upon their private resources for the means of subsistence. Much of their time and attention is occupied by these domestic concerns which might be more profitably devoted to the public interests. At the close of their terms they are forced to dispose of their household effects at a ruinous sacrifice, and return to their homes impoverished in fortune, and with the ungracious reflection that while they devoted their time and talents to the public service their country has refused them even the means of support.

"It may be said in reply, that there is no obligation on any one to accept these positions, and if they do so they must abide by the consequences of their own acts. In one sense this is true. There is no legal obligation on any one to accept an official position, but there is a high moral and patriotic obligation on every citizen to contribute his service to his country when it may be required; and there is a reciprocal obligation on the country not to allow him to suffer in his private fortune by that service."

Congress did not accede to his recommendation; they, however, passed the act of March 3, 1853, which increased the salary of the Vice President from $5,000, prescribed by the act of September 24, 1789, to $8,000, and gave to the members of the Cabinet the same amount. The addition thus made was estimated to be sufficient for house rent. No increase has been voted since, notwithstanding the constant appreciation of labor, rent, and every article of consumption. My observation and experience enable me to affirm, with unhesitating confidence, that the income of the office will not equal the outlay if the incumbent lives in a style at all compatible with the proprieties of his position and the relations which a decent regard to the just claims of society compels him to maintain. "The high offices of the country should be open to the poor as well as to the rich; but the practical effect of the present rate of compensation will soon be to exclude from the executive councils all who have not ample resources independently of their official salaries."

Several of the annual reports of this Department refer to the compensation of the judiciary. One of the most thoughtful writers of the last century remarks that the administration of justice seems to be the leading object of institutions of government; that Legislatures assemble; that armies are embodied, and both war and peace made with a sort of reference to the proper administration of laws and the judicial protection of private rights. While this is emphatically true in every free country, the judicial department of the United States is charged, also, with other duties, and its power extends to all cases arising under the Constitution and the acts of Congress. The guardianship of the fundamental law has been thus confided to it. The Supreme Court decides, in the last resort, questions involving the constitutional authority of the Federal Government and its various departments, as well as the reserved powers of the several States, and the consistency of their legislation with the Constitution and laws of Congress. No foreign tribunal possesses so broad a jurisdiction, or deals with issues so vitally affecting national power, dignity, and sovereignty. Its members should consist of jurists who, having gained the highest honors of the bar, bring to the discharge of their exalted trust mature experience and pre-eminent talents and learning. Their salary, if not equal to their former professional income, should at least secure them an independent support and bear a just relation to their arduous employment. One of the most eminent judges of that court resigned on account of the scanty salary, and a venerable Chief Justice, whose labors during a long life conferred enduring benefits upon his country, died a few years since bequeathing to his family little beyond the legacy of an illustrious name. The salary is far from being proportionate to the weighty responsibilities of the station. It is even less than is paid to some subordinate officers in other branches of the public service. It is a singular and disreputable anomaly that the chiefs of bureaus of the War Department each received in pay and emoluments during the last fiscal year a larger compensation than the Chief Justice of the United States. Recent legislation recognized the just claims of the judges of the district courts and of the supreme court of this District, but Congress inadvertently, I presume, omitted to make a becoming provision for the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The proposition to erect and furnish houses for the Vice President and Cabinet ministers may not meet with more favor now than when it was originally made. I earnestly recommend, therefore, that fifty per cent. be added to their present salary and to that of the justices of the Supreme Court. It will even then be much less than is allowed to officers of a similar grade by any other first-class Government. The Cabinet ministers will not receive more than is now paid in coin to several of our foreign representatives, who discharge much less laborious duties, in capitals not more expensive than Washington. Since the salaries in question were fixed at the present rate Congress have, by successive statutes, nearly quadrupled their own, and I do not doubt that the members of that honorable body will render in some degree to others the justice already secured to themselves.

I have heretofore alluded to the compensation of the Assistant Secretary and the heads of bureaus. The Commissioner of Patents, whose salary is not too large, receives $4,500, being fifty per cent. more than that of the other officers of equal grade in this Department, and exceeds by more than twenty-eight per cent. that of his official superior, the Assistant Secretary, whose duties involve far more labor and responsibility. This glaring and indefensible inequality should be corrected. I recommend that the annual salary of the Assistant Secretary be fixed at $5,000, and that the Commissioner of Patents, Commissioner of the General Land Office, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and Commissioner of Pensions shall each be paid $4,500 per annum.

The duties of a copyist are merely mechanical, and he is liberally paid, more so, indeed, than the same qualifications in any other walk of life command; but the higher order of clerical labor, requiring for its acceptable performance intelligence and special knowledge as well as faithful training and long continued service, is not adequately remunerated. It is my settled opinion, the result of much reflection and of experience in my present position, that the efficiency of the clerical force would be essentially promoted by thoroughly reorganizing it and securing to clerks of experience and tried ability an enhanced compensation. It is hoped that a subject of so much importance to the successful working of the Executive Departments will receive the consideration it so well merits.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. H. BROWNING,
Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDENT.

National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES DIXON, OF CONNECTICUT,
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
December 17, 1868.

The Senate having under consideration the resolution in regard to the national debt—

Mr. DIXON said:

MR. PRESIDENT: If we commence by acknowledging the propriety of any expression of opinion by the Senate of dissent or disapprobation of a measure recommended by the President of the United States otherwise than by legislation adverse to it, then we must admit, I think, that the Committee on Finance are entitled to a great deal of credit for having modified the form of the language and phraseology in which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CATTELL] saw fit, in the first place, to introduce his resolution. Compared with the somewhat violent language first used it is very temperate and moderate, and I give the gentleman himself great credit for having on further reflection, and perhaps with the advice of the committee, modified and tempered the form of his language. As it now stands, it is merely an expression of opinion adverse to the proposition of the President of the United States, and being myself opposed to that proposition, I can vote for the resolution. I do not approve of the proposition; and I can therefore give a vote against it. But, sir, I do not in giving that vote at all consent to the idea that the President has made a proposition of repudiation or that he is himself a repudiator.

In the first place, this recommendation, if you call it such—and I am willing to take the ground of the gentlemen themselves and regard it as a proposition made by the President—does not appear to be proposed by him as compulsory upon the bondholders. In fact, the form of the language is otherwise. He expressly says, to begin with, that in his judgment our national credit should be sacredly observed. He has before said that it is possible that the bondholders themselves would not be averse to a settlement of our indebtedness upon a plan which would yield them a fair remuneration and at the same time be just to the taxpayers of the nation. Whether the proposition he makes is a fair one or not; whether it is a reasonable one or not; whether it is a practicable one or not, it is perfectly plain that the President proposes it, not as a compulsory scheme, but as one to which the bondholders, in his own language, "may not be averse." He may misjudge in supposing they will not be averse to it, but he expressly so declares.

I do not think the President of the United States has on this floor an enemy—if it may be supposed that he has an enemy anywhere, and especially here—so hostile, so inveterate, as not to rejoice to find, if it be so, that the President does not propose a measure of repudiation. What he proposes may be unwise, impracticable; it may be indiscreet; but no matter how unreasonable, if it is not compulsory it is not in any sense repudiation. Why, sir, he might propose that the bondholders should abandon the whole debt and give it to the nation, and he might say it would be an act of patriotism on their part; but to say so would not be to say that he would compel them to do it.

Now, sir, in examining this subject it is necessary for us to do what Dr. Johnson recommended to Boswell, to "free our minds from cant," from hypocrisy, and from pretension. Is this the first proposition that has been made for a modification of the national debt? One would suppose, from what we have heard here, that there has been no proposition before for any modification of the form of the national debt. Let us see how that is.

I will say here once more by way of caveat,

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

National Debt—Mr. Dixon.

SENATE.

for the benefit of the reporters in the gallery, that I am opposed to this scheme and all other schemes having any appearance of repudiation or of any change in the form of the debt, either in principal or interest, except by the free consent of the bondholders; and in examining this proposition I wish that to be understood, otherwise somebody may misunderstand me or misrepresent me as saying that I wish in some way to palliate or excuse repudiation.

Now, sir, let us look at this matter. We have an enormous debt, immense in its total, inconceivable in its amount. When you undertake to conceive of this vast globe of earth on which we live you cannot conceive of it as one body. It is wholly impossible for the human mind to grasp it, because when we think of such a physical object we consider it only through the senses of touch and of sight, and what we cannot see or touch as a whole we cannot conceive of as a physical object except, by dividing it into fragments. So of this debt; no human mind can conceive of $2,500,000,000. You may conceive of so many separate units; but of the debt itself you can form no conception. It is inconceivably immense in its amount. The condition in which it places us is by no means agreeable. Our duty, however, is plain: we are to meet it boldly and manfully, and the debt must be paid to its uttermost farthing.

We are not the first nation that has been in this condition. If it is feared that the English people may accuse our President of repudiation let us for a single moment consider some of the plans and schemes which have been proposed with regard to their debt, and those plans in many cases compulsory. In the reign of George I there was a proposition made by Mr. Archibald Hutcheson to repudiate one-tenth of the entire debt and to tax the nation for the remainder, and pay off the whole of that remainder at once. In the year 1825 that scheme was revived in the English Parliament, was advocated in the public prints by as distinguished a political economist as Mr. Ricardo, and was also seriously and solemnly advocated, in the year 1827, in an article in the Edinburgh Review, as the only means by which the Government of Great Britain could save itself from bankruptcy and destruction. It was said by one statesman that "they must either destroy the debt or the debt would destroy them." The proposition was to actually repudiate ten per cent. as a tax upon the bondholders, and then to tax the whole community, including the bondholders, twelve per cent. of their whole property, for the purpose of paying it off.

But if our English creditors are disposed to attribute to us purposes of repudiation, it may perhaps be well for them to recall to their recollection some of the serious propositions made by British writers of high character and vast influence to repudiate a portion of the national debt of England when the taxes required for its payment shall be so large as to "encroach on the capital of the country." I submit the following from the Edinburgh Review, volume thirty-three, page 65. It needs no comment:

"It is no doubt true that the first duty of Government, in matters of finance, is to keep faith with the public creditor; and it was on this principle that Parliament imposed the new taxes at the last session. But if even with these new taxes such a deficit were to arise as we are now contemplating, it is impossible not to see that a case would be made out for the country and against the stockholder to which no former practice or acknowledged principle would any longer be applicable. So long as taxes can be levied from the free income of the subject, so long the most rigid faith must be kept with the public creditor. But when they come to encroach on the capital, and of course to diminish those springs of wealth from which all expenditures must be supplied, their increase becomes not only oppressive but impossible, and their cessation a matter not of nominal but actual necessity. In such a state of things, therefore, which can no longer be represented as extremely unlikely to occur, we shall soon become familiar with other maxims than those to which we have been so long accustomed; and after having witnessed the facility with which the public was led to approve of the application of the sinking fund to the current expenses of the State, we should not be at all surprised to find the reduction of the dividends become a topic of general speculation, and even a favorite project of finance. We mean neither to argue here nor to express any opinion of our own with regard to it; but we have no doubt that a multitude of plausible arguments will very speedily be mustered up for its support; and that, besides assuiling the purchasers of stock to the purchasers into any other concern where the prospect of gain is compensated by the risk of loss, it will be strongly urged that they are, in strict justice, bound to submit to some deduction on account of the increased value of the currency since the period when at least $300,000,000 of the existing debt was borrowed. Had the depreciation been openly avowed at the time no subscriber could have objected to its being made a condition that he should be repaid with a sum equal in value though smaller in nominal extent to what he had actually advanced. Those things may become necessary."

I will not follow up the various other propositions made in England with regard to their debt, nor will I go into the manner in which they have reduced their interest by consolidation, much of which has been in a certain sense compulsory; but I will come to our own country. What has been done here? What have been the plans proposed here? I wish to show what, perhaps, may surprise some Senators without considering it, but which they will find to be true as soon as they apply their minds to the subject and resort to a little practical arithmetic. I wish to show that the scheme of the President is certainly as good, if not far better, for the bondholder than some plans which have been proposed by some others who have escaped the denunciation of the Senate.

In the first place, there was the plan known as the plan of Mr. Pendleton, which proposed an entire payment of the debt, as I at first understood it, by an issue of greenbacks. Mr. Pendleton somewhat modified it afterward. If the law had expressly provided that the debt might be paid in paper currency that proposition of Mr. Pendleton, in my opinion, would have been ruinous, not only to the bondholder but to the people, for the reason that it would have unfunded the national debt, so to speak, and poured into the business of this country an immense flood of currency which would have overwhelmed every interest in one universal deluge of destruction. That was the sufficient answer to it. If we had the right to do it I should not have considered it for a moment. I doubt even whether it would be wise to pay off the debt in gold instantly even if we had the money, for that would produce somewhat the same effect of injurious inflation. Mr. Pendleton was by some denounced as a repudiator, but he did not acknowledge the charge. I will say nothing in regard to his purposes or his views, further than that his known character as a patriot and a statesman forbids the idea that he intended repudiation.

There was another proposition made by a Senator on this floor, the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] Certainly nobody can call him a repudiator. What did he propose? He proposed a long loan of forty years at three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. interest, and I am compelled to say that, taking his speech by which he accompanied that bill and the bill itself together, it was a compulsory scheme.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to interrupt my friend, but I must say that I never made such a proposition.

Mr. DIXON. I will show in what sense it was compulsory.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was not to correct that that I rose; but I never made a proposition for a loan at less than five per cent.

Mr. DIXON. Perhaps I have done the Senator injustice. I know the bill was modified greatly by the committee. In the printed bill, between the brackets and italics, it is pretty difficult to tell what was the Senator's view and what was the committee's; but the Finance Committee, of which he was chairman, reported a bill here which proposed on its face an exchange of the present bonds for bonds at three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. interest, running forty years. That is on the face of the bill. What was the speech of the Senator by which he accompanied it, by which he enforced and advocated it? He declared that, in his judgment, the terms of the law creating the loan authorized the Secretary of the Treasury in negotiating the new loan to tell the existing bondholders that they must accept that or they must take their pay in lawful paper money of the United States. That the Senator declared to be his opinion of the law. He had a right to hold that opinion of the law. To believe that that was the intent and meaning of the law was no repudiation. It was a legal question. There was a great deal in his argument. The same view was at one time in the mind of the honorable Senator from Indiana who addressed us yesterday, [Mr. MORRIS.] He declared himself partially of the same opinion. Now, sir, would it be believed, after hearing the remarks of the honorable Senator from Michigan yesterday, that the proposition of the President of the United States is a better plan for the bondholder than that?

Why, sir, the mistake of the President was, if he wished to propose a plan of this kind which would be accepted by the bondholders, that he did not make the annuity long enough; he cut it very short, and in that way it is so objectionable that it will not be accepted. But suppose the President had made a proposition of this kind; suppose he had proposed the same length of time as the Senator did in his bill, a forty-year annuity at six per cent. The Senator would then have said it was repudiation of principal and interest, as he says now; but what would be the effect of it? There would be an extra two and two thirds per cent. interest for forty years to be paid to the bondholder, which at compound interest amounts to not far from three thousand dollars. Senators do not consider what the effect of a long annuity is, nor what the effect of compound interest is. If they will sit down and figure for a few moments they will find that the President has not been guilty after all of such very great injustice. Take a twenty-year annuity; the difference between a four per cent. bond and a six per cent. annuity, at twenty years only, is nearly one thousand dollars at compound interest. Still, the Senator from Michigan says this is repudiation of both principal and interest. If the President had proposed forty years, as the Senator from Ohio did, he would have proposed a scheme most ruinous to this Government. If the President of the United States had said "Let us propose to the bondholders to pay them an annuity of six per cent. for forty years, and they give up the capital," he would have proposed a scheme that would have taken $2,000 out of the Government for every $1,000 bond issued; but still, upon the principle of the Senator from Michigan, it would have been repudiation both of the principal and the interest.

I repeat that the difficulty of the President's scheme is that it is too short an annuity to be entirely acceptable. Still I venture to predict that the foreign creditors would rather take it to-day than take their money back and loan it at three per cent. It is vastly better for them than to take greenbacks. Suppose they took the greenbacks on the plan of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN;] suppose the whole debt was paid to them in greenbacks, they refusing to take a three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. bond, what would be the effect? The greenbacks would fall instantly to about fifty cents on the dollar. They would therefore get but about five hundred dollars on each $1,000 bond. The President's scheme is much better than that.

Now, sir, I wish to have two things remembered: first, the President has merely proposed a proposition "to which" he says "the bondholders may not be averse;" second, it is not

SENATE.

National Debt—Mr. Dixon.

by any means so ruinous a scheme for them as has been suggested. If it had been a twenty-five or thirty-years' annuity, certainly if it had been a forty-years' annuity, it would have been generous, liberal to the bondholders, and would actually have been very injurious to this Government. I think, when we view the matter in this light, our wish, if any such exists, to make out Andrew Johnson a bad man, a repudiator, ought to yield to our wish to protect the honor of the Government, and not have it believed that he has proposed a scheme of repudiation if he has not done so.

I have taken up the scheme of the honorable Senator from Ohio, and I have said that he cannot be called a repudiator. What shall we say of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] who has introduced a bill on the subject? Need I say that I do not mean to call him a repudiator when I comment upon his scheme. What is his plan presented in this bill? Why, sir, that we shall propose to the bondholders a forty year loan at four and a half per cent. He sees the importance of reducing the vast amount of interest under which the people of this country are groaning, and he makes a proposition, of course to be accepted or not as the bond holders choose. Does that Senator remember that his proposition is far worse for the bondholders than it would be if he proposed to give them an annuity for forty years at six per cent. and pay them no capital. I dare say if the Senator had been told that he would ever make a proposition of that kind, a forty year annuity and the capital to be repudiated, and that he was a repudiator, he would deny it; but it would be better than the scheme he now proposes, and the Dutch and English and German bondholders would seize upon it with avidity. Let him offer them a forty year annuity at six per cent. and at the end of that time to pay them no capital, and see what they would do. The English Government made the same mistake many years ago. They never found out the difficulty until Francis Horner pointed it out to them. They issued certain bonds at five and a half per cent. interest, the capital to be paid at the end of that time; but, thinking they would save something, they concluded to give six per cent. in the form of an annuity and no capital to be paid at the end. It was to run one hundred years; and that one half per cent. difference in the interest, as Francis Horner showed them, amounted at compound interest to more than twice the amount of the bond at the end.

Why, sir, one per cent. interest on a unit of $10 for one hundred years is $1,000 without interest; whereas at compound interest it is almost incredible to consider what it amounts to in that time. Compound interest increases so rapidly that Dr. Price calculated that one penny put at compound interest at the birth of our Saviour would have amounted in his time to many globes of gold of the size of this earth; and upon that he founded the plan of paying the English debt by a sinking fund, which Mr. Pitt adopted. The only difficulty was, they found they could not get the compound interest, could not always provide for it; it could not be paid. There were various reasons; but let compound interest go on and the debt would be paid in a short time. One penny at compound interest would pay the debt a great many times over in the space of time mentioned by Dr. Price. Let me read on this subject the following extract from the Edinburgh Review, volume twenty-four, page 295. It is well known, says Dr. Price—

"To what prodigious sums money improved for some time at compound interest will increase."

And then he states, in a note, that—

"A penny so improved from our Saviour's birth as to double itself every fourteen years, or, which is nearly the same, put out to five per cent. compound interest at our Saviour's birth, would by this time—that is, in seventeen hundred and seventy-three years—have increased to more money than would be contained in one hundred and fifty million globes each equal to the earth in magnitude, and all solid gold."

In a note upon this note his accurate friend, Mr. Morgan nicely observes, that a penny improved so as to double itself every fourteen years would have accumulated only to one hundred and seven millions of such globes, just forty-three millions fewer than the Doctor had calculated; but this, Mr. Morgan wisely observes, is abundantly sufficient to prove the strength of his argument.

The President undoubtedly had all these things in view. I have had no conversation with the President on the subject; I know not what his views were; but I have not the slightest idea that he made this proposition with any view to compulsion. He is acquainted with the subjects which he attempts to discuss. It was a scheme that might be accepted and would be accepted if the time were extended. Let him make it thirty or forty years, and I vouch for it it will be seized with avidity by the foreign bondholders.

Now, sir, I do not propose to vote for the President's plan. I propose to offer an amendment to this resolution suggesting that he has at the same time proposed to keep the public faith, so that we may not say to the world that the President of the United States is a repudiator. As I said before, the Senate ought rather to say to the world that he is not. His proposition, though perhaps rather darkly expressed, is in fact not compulsory, but an offer made which he thinks the bondholders may not be averse to; and I have now shown you, as sensible men, that it is not a disgraceful and outrageous proposition, as the Senator from Michigan states, but that if it had been for ten years longer it would have been very liberal on our part, and if for twenty years longer extremely injurious to the Government. This is a matter of arithmetic. Anybody can understand this. There is no difficulty about it.

In connection with this subject we have before us the vast question of our national debt and what action we shall take with regard to it. It is a question of immense importance, momentous in its consequences, and cannot be overlooked or neglected. Why, sir, under what are we now suffering in this country? There seems to be a difficulty in determining what is the trouble and what is its cause. We know that there is a tremendous pressure upon us; we know that there is a weight bearing us down; that business is prostrated; that everywhere men are disheartened and perplexed. We hear every day of commercial failures in New York and elsewhere. Why is it? The election of General Grant was to restore prosperity. If that was expected it was asking too much of that election.

Now, I will undertake to say what I think is a portion of our difficulty. I believe to-day that one great cause of our difficulties is the enormous amount of interest the Government is paying—not in consequence barely of the amount which the Government pays. The Government may pay six per cent. interest without being utterly ruined; but what follows? Suppose an individual has occasion to borrow $1,000, and asks his neighbor to loan him that sum, what does he say? "I cannot take less interest than the Government pays me; I am receiving nine per cent., and I must have that; I think I ought to have ten, and if I change my investment I ought to have twelve;" and it is paid. I tell you, sir, the average rate of interest is raised all over this country in all the business relations between man and man, and no part of the country suffers from it more than the very section from which the honorable Senator from Indiana comes. In the State of Indiana the average rate of interest is not less, in my judgment, than ten per cent. Can men in business make money and pay ten per cent. interest? So long as this Government pays six per cent. interest in coin, and we have a depreciated currency so that it amounts virtually to between eight and nine per cent., every man in the country has to pay the same or more. In all the relations of business between man and man the rate of interest will be more than the Government is willing to pay, and business will be crushed out beneath the weight of this load of interest. There is the trouble. Still, even the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] with all his knowledge upon this question and his immense ability, does not see fit in his comprehensive survey of our situation to enumerate that as one of the troubles under which we labor.

Now what can we do? Can we reduce this rate of interest? One thing we have a right to do; we are bound to pay the debt, that is, the funded debt, and we have a right to pay it in some form. The Senator from Indiana yesterday gave us to understand that to pay the funded debt to-day without paying off the legal-tender currency would be a crime, and he declared to us that by so doing we should be on a par with the man who put off his daily debts to his laborers to pay his long acceptances. That, he says, would be the comparison that ought to be made if we allow this floating debt to continue as it is and pay in any form the national debt; that is, the interest-bearing debt. I say, on the contrary, we have a right to pay it; it is no crime to pay it. And if the creditors object to payment of the principal then they must accept a less rate of interest.

What, then, shall we do? How shall we pay it? The Senator tells us that there is a peculiar sacredness about the legal-tender currency by reason of which it ought to be paid off to-day.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask the Senator whether he proposes to pay the bonds now or to shave them?

Mr. DIXON. When I say pay I mean pay. I say we have a right to pay them. I do not say we have a right to shave them. I say we have a right to pay the debt. We have also a right to buy them in the market. The Senator says—I have his language before me—that it is a crime to pay the funded debt before we pay the floating currency of the country, the green-back currency, and he says they cannot be paid under three years. To pay off the national debt and stop the amount of interest before that time has arrived is piracy and robbery according to the honorable Senator.

I think the honorable Senator entirely mistakes the relation of the debt and the people. He compares it to a debt between individuals. He says if A owes B, A is bound to pay; if he does not, it is repudiation. There is a certain degree of truth but also a great fallacy lurking under the Senator's proposition. What is this debt? It is the debt of the people to the people. It is the people's own debt. Who owe it? The people owe it. To whom is it due? To the people. That is the condition of the national debt to a certain extent; but a portion of that debt is not owned by the people of this country. There is not a dollar of the legal-tender currency which is not held by the people of the country. A large portion of the national debt is held out of the country. If the people of this country find that it is for their benefit to allow this debt due from themselves to themselves to float among themselves as currency for their business, having no other, is that such an atrocity as the Senator has represented it? With his ingenuity and his ability he may make it appear to be a criminal matter; but certainly it is far from being so. It is a matter of convenience which shall be first paid, the interest-bearing debt or the other. The people of this country finally pay it all. It comes out of their labor. If they find it more to their interest to pay the funded debt and stop the interest than to pay the debt which takes the form of currency between themselves, they have a right to do so. It may be a matter of uncertainty and doubt as to which is the best policy; but when it is treated as a crime, and we are told it must not be done lest we should become pirates and robbers, it is certainly a misapprehension of terms, a misuse of language.

The Senator has presented here a scheme which, I must say, I am compelled to disapprove of. I have examined it, and I listened to his able speech, much of which I agree with, and all of which I admire for its ability. But I think his scheme, if carried out, would be a scheme of protracted agony, of long-continuing misery up to the time when he proposes specie payments to be made. Let that scheme be carried out, and everything under which we are now suffering would be intensified, in my judgment. What does he propose? He proposes to hoard gold for a long period; he proposes that the banks shall keep all the gold that is paid in to them; he proposes, in short, a scheme which would compel that which he considers injurious, contraction. He declares that the Government must not contract. But suppose the banks contract in the way proposed? I will not go into that. I have not time nor strength to go through the whole of that subject.

The Senator supports his plan by what seem to me to be some very great, and I will say alarming, fallacies. In the first place the Senator commences by telling us that the currency is not expanded to a very great extent more than in 1860. How does he show that? He adds some items to the currency that I never heard called currency before except by Mr. Micawber. He declares that promissory notes and bills of exchange constituted at that time a part of the currency, and should be offset against our currency now, thus showing we had the same amount then as now. There may be a case in which a bill of exchange payable at sight may come to be considered a part of the currency, although as a general rule it does not. It is the same as a check on a bank. Is that currency? Suppose the Senator goes to his bank and takes out money, gives his check for it himself, and pays it out, are both the check and money to be considered currency? What difference does it make if he gives me the check and I get the money? The check is not money. It is a mere voucher, proof, evidence that a certain amount of money has been paid upon it. But he makes both currency. Then he speaks of promissory notes. I will read what he said upon that, for it struck me as a very singular idea in regard to promissory notes and their nature:

"It is said by many that the currency is redundant and that we cannot return to specie payments until contraction has taken place."

Then he goes on to calculate what the amount of the currency is. He says:

"The bank notes of the northern States were not current in the southern States, and vice versa. Hence the payment of debts and commercial transactions between different parts of the country were conducted by bills of exchange and promissory notes, which amounted to many hundred millions of dollars during the year."

I never heard of any one who considered that a mode of payment except our distinguished friend, Micawber, who felt his mind entirely relieved when he had given his note; the thing was then off his mind and honorably settled and paid. Promissory notes were given, and are still, but they paid no debt; the debt still existed. But what does the Senator go on to say? He says, they now being out of the question, there is $100,000,000 of currency used in their place sent by express agents. He admits, then, that the currency is vastly increased and inflated to that extent.

The question is, whether there is a greater amount of currency now in existence and afloat in the channels of business than there was in 1860. The honorable Senator says there is not. I think that is an alarming idea, because I undertake to say that among the causes of the depreciation of the currency is the amount of it now outstanding, which, as I shall hereafter show, he says has no effect as a cause of its depreciation. One great difficulty with us is the amount of our floating currency as well as the amount of our funded indebtedness. I began by saying that the weight of our immense burden, the inconceivable amount of our funded and floating debt, was the evil under which we are suffering, and the vast amount of interest also paid upon it upon all business loans by the people of this country. I should not comment upon this mistake which I think the Senator has made if I did not think it an alarming idea to go out to the country; because what follows? If the currency is not expanded, if that is not an evil, if the depreciation has not been caused in any degree by the expansion, then we may expand still further without causing any further depreciation. If the Senator is correct, you may unfund, if I may use the expression, the whole national debt without depreciating the national currency; for what does he further tell us? He goes on to say that the amount of the currency has nothing to do with its depreciation; and he actually says that if the amount of currency was only $1,000,000, if it was irredeemable and unredeemed, it would be depreciated as it is now.

Mr. MORTON. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but he is mistaken. I did not say in my speech that the amount of the currency had nothing to do with the depreciation of it. I said the existence of the bonded debt was not the cause of the depreciation of the currency. I argued that the currency was not redundant; but I did not say anywhere that the amount of the currency would have nothing to do with the depreciation of it, because that would not be true. If there was an excess of currency that very fact might increase the depreciation. But I said the existence of the bonded debt had but little to do with the depreciation of the currency.

Mr. DIXON. If the Senator will allow me to read from the report of his speech, whether authorized or not I do not know, in the National Intelligencer, he will find I have not misrepresented him. He says:

"Here the Secretary reiterates his former opinion, that by largely contracting the paper currency the rest of it would be appreciated to par. How such contraction would have this result he has never shown, and the opinion results from a misapprehension of the causes which depreciate the paper currency. Suppose the greenback currency was contracted down to one hundred millions, could the remaining hundred millions be brought to par in any other way than by making arrangements to redeem it?"

Is not the inference from that directly that the reduction to one hundred millions would have no tendency to bring it to par? But he goes on further:

"You cannot pay a debt without paying it, and every trick or device to bring the currency up to par without making preparations to redeem it according to the promise on its face will be abortive and disastrous. The currency is depreciated because it is overdue and dishonored, draws no interest, and there is no time fixed or preparation made for its redemption; and these causes would depreciate it if there were but one million of it afloat."

He does not say depreciated to the same amount; but that seems to be the inference, because he has told us he does not agree with the opinion of the Secretary that contracting the paper currency would appreciate the balance to par. Now, let us take an example. We will take A and B, each worth $100,000. A has $10,000 of irredeemable paper in circulation, and B has $1,000 of the same kind of paper in circulation. Which of those liabilities would be the most depreciated? I take it, one of the first questions a broker would ask, in considering the value of the paper, would be, "How much of it is on the market? How much of this paper is in circulation?"

It is too plain for argument that the amount of our currency is one of the greatest causes of its depreciation. There are other causes to which I shall allude. Elementary writers on this question state that there are two causes which go to the depreciation of public funds.

The first is a doubt as to their payment, whether they will be finally paid at all. The second is their vast amount. It will be observed that the second reacts upon the first. But aside from that, if you declare that it is perfectly certain to be paid, when you find the amount vast, it is depreciated in the very nature of things, precisely as gold would be depreciated if the amount of it in circulation was enormous. If we had a currency of $2,500,000,000 of gold to-day, the very fact of its amount would depreciate it. It would become comparatively worthless in consequence; it would buy less. If that is true of gold is it not equally true, and still more true, of paper, aside from any question as to the ability of the party to pay?

As I said I should not have commented upon this, although I confess I think it a dangerous fallacy, if the Senator had not gone further and declared that the amount of the national debt, the funded debt, had no effect whatever upon the depreciation of our currency. Let me consider that for a single moment. In the first place, suppose our national debt to-day were canceled, and we had our whole legal-tenders to pay, what would be our condition? The Senator may theorize. It is very easy to involve this question in doubt and uncertainty by theories; but let us look at the fact. What would be our condition? We would have $150,000,000 in gold paid in as duties every year; no national debt to pay off; no interest to be paid; every dollar of that to be appropriated to the payment of the floating currency; and still the existence of the funded debt, the interest of which exhausts a large portion of our revenue, has no depreciating effect whatever! It has this fatal effect: it exhausts our means of payment, the very worst effect possible. If I find that a man's means of payment in a certain direction are exhausted I have some little doubt whether he can pay in another direction.

The Senator, I think, will see that he greatly erred in instructing the people of this country that the amount of their debt had nothing to do with the depreciation of the currency. If so, there is little reason for economy; there is no ground for trying to diminish our expenses, or for trying to reduce our debt, except to reduce a certain amount of interest. When I hear fallacies stated in this body which have gone abroad in the public press with approbation, and which I think are dangerous, I must, so far as I can, attempt to counteract them.

Sir, the amount of the funded and unfunded debt is our great evil. How are the two divided? There is no difference between them in one sense; they are to be considered as a unit—all as one national debt. A part of it pays interest, and part of it does not; and still we are told that the only evil is with that part which does not pay interest, and that it is of no consequence how much we pay interest on so far as the depreciation of the unfunded portion is concerned. Why, sir, the very reverse is true. If the Senator could, in justice to the bondholders and without injuring the business of the country by the ruinous inflation of prices, unfund the whole national debt and reduce it to a currency among the people, then he would relieve them from an immense burden; but the other evil, that of inflation, would, perhaps, be the greatest.

The Senator proposes to force the resumption of specie payments by legislation, and he has a long-continuing plan by which we are to reach it. I must say I think the plan of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] is better, although I doubt whether his is practicable. The Senator from Indiana proposes to reach specie payments by a long, grinding process upon the people of the country, which would, in my opinion, redouble the evils under which we are now laboring.

I beg leave to say to that Senator and to other Senators that I very much doubt the possibility of resuming specie payments by legislation. It never yet has thus been done in the history of the world. We talk about legislating specie payments. Sir, the only mode in which specie payments have ever been resumed in England or anywhere else has been by the course of events, by the renewed prosperity and restored ability of the country. It may be thought that Sir Robert Peel's bill in 1819 was an exception to this statement. I wish to show what was the state of England at that time. I think some facts in regard to it may be interesting to Senators who may not have considered them and to the people of the country. I say there never was yet an instance where specie payments have been restored by mere legislation. What was done in England? In 1819, when the bill passed for the restoration of specie payments, to take effect in the year 1821, what do you suppose was the rate of discount at that time on Bank of England notes? What was the depreciation? How great a step was it necessary to take in England in 1819 in order to resume specie payments? Only two and a half per cent. In 1819 the discount on Bank of England paper was only two and a half per cent. It never exceeded twenty-five per cent. at the very worst, and for a long series of years after the battle of Waterloo it was but two and two and a half per cent. up to 1819; so that when the bill passed for the resumption of specie payment in England it was already almost restored.

To show that I am not wrong in this, let me read a few words from an article in the Edinburgh Review. This is not mere speculation on my part. First, I will read with regard to the rate of discount on depreciated, irredeemable paper in England during their great wars to restore the Bourbons. The Senator tells us the amount of currency has nothing to do with it, that the depreciation takes place from other causes. This writer says:

"It appears by the tables of the price of bullion, published by order of the House of Commons, that until 1801 bank notes were on a par with gold. In 1801 and 1802, however, they were at a discount of from eight and a third to seven and a third per cent., but they again recovered their value; and from 1803 to 1809, both inclusive, they were only at a discount of £2 13s. 2d. per cent. But in 1809 and 1810 the directors appear to have totally lost sight of every principle by which their issues had previously been governed. The average amount of bank notes in circulation, which had never exceeded £17,500,000, nor fallen short of £16,500,000 in any one year from 1802 to 1808, both inclusive, was in 1809 raised to £18,927,833; and in 1810 to £22,541,523."—Edinburgh Review, vol. 35, p. 477.

They made the same mistake that the Senator has. They thought the amount had nothing to do with it; that they could increase the amount without increasing the depreciation. Let us see what the effect was:

"The issues of country bank paper were increased in a still greater proportion; and, as there was no corresponding increase in the business of the country, the discount on bank notes rose from £2 13s. 2d. in 1809, to £13 9s. 6d. per cent. in 1810."

That is, it rose from about two to about thirteen per cent. merely in consequence of the increase of the issue.

"The recommendation to return to cash payments contained in the report of the bullion committee presented to the House of Commons in 1810 appears to have given a slight check to the issues of the bank. All apprehensions from this quarter were, however, speedily dissipated, for in May, 1811, when guineas were notoriously bought at a premium and bank notes were at an open discount, as compared with gold bullion, of upwards of ten per cent., the House of Commons not only refused to fix any certain period for reverting to cash payments, but actually voted a resolution declaring that the promissory notes of the Bank of England had hitherto been, and were at that time held to be, in public estimation, equivalent to the legal coin of the realm.

"This ever-memorable resolution—a resolution which took for granted that a part was equal to a whole; that ninety pounds and one hundred pounds were the same thing—relieved the bank from all uneasiness respecting the interference of Parliament, and stimulated the directors to increase the number of their notes in circulation. The consequence was that in 1812 they were at an average discount of twenty and three fourths; in 1813, of twenty-three; and in 1814, of twenty-five per cent. This was the maximum of depreciation."—Edinburgh Review, vol. 35, page 480.

That was the greatest depreciation ever known in England—twenty-five per cent., which we should consider very moderate, and would now be very thankful if our paper money was of equal value. The writer goes on:

"In 1817 and 1818 the average discount on bank paper, as compared with gold, did not exceed £2 13s. 2d. per cent. In the early part of 1819 it rose to about six per cent., but it very soon declined, and for the last two years paper has been nearly on a level with gold."

Then the writer goes on to comment on what was the effect of the act of Sir Robert Peel, of 1819, to restore specie payments, and he says that that bill did not restore specie payments, that they were already restored by the operation of various causes, and that the act only confirmed what already existed, and even then, before the act was allowed to go into force, a tremendous effort was made to repeal it, because that act, although specie payments were almost restored, and the only difference between gold and paper was two per cent., shook the whole commercial fabric of business in England and brought immense ruin in its train. Now, sir, what will be the effect of an act here establishing by a rigid rule specie payments at a certain day with paper at thirty-four per cent. discount? It is impossible to imagine it, if we may judge by what took place in England under the same circumstances, or I may say very different circumstances, because there the rate of discount was very much lower. The writer says, in commenting upon the effect of the bill of Sir Robert Peel, showing that what I have said in regard to it is true:

"It must be remembered that much of that inconvenience and distress, which must always result from every sudden rise in the value of money, had been got over in 1817 and 1818. The rents of such farms as been entered into during the depreciation had been very generally reduced, and a vast number of annuity bills had been canceled, and prices and wages had begun to accommodate themselves to the new scale of value. The adoption of Mr. Peel's bill only gave stability to arrangements which had been brought about by the natural course of events, and by fixing the standard at its former limit secured us, so long at least as we have good sense and honesty to maintain it inviolate, against the risk of future derangement and fluctuation.

"But even if it could be shown that the act of 59, George III, was inexpedient at the time when it was passed, that would add but little real strength to the plea of those who are now contending for its repeal. Every objection which it was possible to make to the degradation of the standard in 1819 must apply with tenfold force to the scheme for degrading it in 1821; while, on the other hand, all the arguments that could have been urged in favor of the measure at the former period must now be proportionably weakened."

"The proceedings in 1819"—

"That is, Sir Robert Peel's bill—

"did not really add three per cent. to the value of bank paper, nor were they intended to raise it. Their great object was to shut the door against a new depreciation, and to prevent the value of paper, which had for three years been nearly on a level with gold, from being again degraded."

I beg the attention of Senators to this; I ask the attention of the honorable Senator from Indiana to that fact, that the great object of the bill of Sir Robert Peel was to shut the door against a new depreciation, and to prevent the value of paper, which had for three years been nearly on a level with gold, from being again degraded. That was the condition of things in England then—far from our condition now. Instead of a discount of thirty per cent. and upward on paper money, the fact was that the progress of business, the restoration of prosperity, and the return of peace in the long lapse of time that had taken place between the battle of Waterloo and the resumption of specie payments in 1821, had restored specie payments and brought about what the Senator desires now in a gradual manner, instead of a hurried precipitous one, leading to destruction.

I say I very much doubt, although it may be unpopular to say so, whether it is possible by legislation alone to restore specie payments. You may pass a bill providing that on such a day specie will be paid; but will you therefore be able to pay it then? The Senator says confidence will be restored, and nobody will ask for specie; and that seems to be the confident hope of those who favor such legislation, that as the day approaches we may be able to resume, because nobody will ask us to pay; but if they do ask it I fear very much that the Senator will find that the vast amount of specie which he proposes to take out of the channels of business and to accumulate during three years will not be sufficient, after all the injury that that accumulation has wrought, to enable the Government to maintain specie payments, unless renewed prosperity shall enable the country to do so.

Now, let me refer with regard to this hoarding of gold—and I do it in no party sense—to the sub-Treasury law. What was our idea in that? It seems to be thought now that the hoarding of gold is of no consequence in this country, because, we are told, it is merchandise. Is it so? Calling it merchandise makes no difference; it is still gold, still money; and you propose to hoard up $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 under the pretext that it is merchandise, like corn in a crib or wheat, and you say that will not derange the finances of this country. There are those here who recollect what was the supposed effect of the sub-Treasury scheme. There are some who think it had no effect, the operation of it being on so small a scale. But in 1857 we know it was in full force and effect, and in 1857, while that scheme was in full force and effect, the most ruinous revulsion happened that ever happened in this country, and every bank in the Union was compelled to suspend specie payments. The advocates of that scheme, which was a scheme for hoarding gold precisely like this, told us that there never could be a revulsion, provided the Government would keep a large amount of specie on hand. In 1857 they had a large amount on hand, and continued specie payments, and were the only parties in the country who did. Not a bank in the Union paid specie; and not only that, values went down, stocks depreciated. The banks were not only unable to pay their debts in specie, but their stocks went down. The average rate of bank stocks in the city of New York at that time was about fifty cents on the dollar, and so of stocks and property all over the country.

I do not say that we ought to make no effort, therefore, to relieve ourselves from this condition, because I think legislation may do something. We may try experiments. They may turn out different from what we suppose. What is the cause of the depreciation of our paper currency? I propound that as a question to the Senate. If they can explain it to me they can answer a difficult riddle.

Why is it that the currency of this country is so depreciated? Is it a thing which other Governments have been subject to? In France the assignats were, it is true, depreciated; they were utterly worthless finally, and went down to nothing. But how about Bank of England notes after the battle of Waterloo? They were irredeemable. The bank was authorized by act of Parliament to refuse specie. The amount of their notes, it is true, was not so great as ours. It was only about one hundred million dollars, somewhat over twenty million pounds at the outside. But the depreciation the moment that Napoleon was conquered at the battle of Waterloo was only about two per cent., and it remained at that figure from that time, with one exception in 1819, when, as it appears, probably on account of speculation resulting from the fears entertained of Sir Robert Peel's bill, the premium went up to six per cent. for a short time; but before the bill went into effect, and at the time of its passage, bank notes and specie were at par.

Now, I say, if any Senator can tell me why it is that our paper money is depreciated I should like to have him explain it. Is it because our Government has no credit? Is it because it is supposed that the debt will never be paid? Is it because there are repudiation

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

National Debt—Mr. Dixon.

SENATE.

schemes abroad? Not at all. Every scheme of repudiation has been put down, as gentlemen themselves say, by the voice of the people. Nobody proposes to repudiate. Everybody declares that the debt must be paid. The President himself, whom you stamp as a repudiator, or attempt to, says the debt must be paid; that the national credit must be preserved.

What, then, is the cause of this depreciation? I confess that I am unable to say. The honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] and the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORRIS] do not attempt to explain it. I think I know one reason, and I will suggest it. In the first place, this Government is dishonoring its own paper, and has been for the last five years. It refuses to take its paper for the very purpose for which it is wanted; that is, in the payment of import duties. Suppose you went farther; suppose after having refused to take it for your tariff duties, you refused to take it in payment of internal revenue taxes; I ask you how much lower it would be then? Does any body doubt that such a refusal on the part of the Government would carry it down still lower?

On this subject we have the light of experience. In the year 1861 we passed an act issuing $50,000,000 of paper money, which we declared should be receivable for tariff duties; and all other dues to the Government. We did not make it a legal-tender. We did not clothe it with that sanction. We only declared that the Government would not discredit its own paper, but would take it for duties on imports. What was the consequence? For a long period of time you found that paper quoted in the newspapers at par with gold. While the balance of your Treasury notes went down till gold was at a premium compared with them of 180, that irredeemable paper dollar of the Government receivable for duties was on a par with gold.

It may be said, where will you get your gold with which to pay the interest on the debt if you do not require the duties to be paid in gold? If it is true that the depreciation of the currency is occasioned by your discrediting your own paper, then if you take off that discredit and thus raise your paper to near par you could buy gold very easily without much loss. If you have caused the discredit in that way, by removing the discredit the difference between gold and paper is nothing; it is immaterial. I think there may be the great error that we have committed. I do not know whether it could be remedied now. I am inclined to think that the removal of that discredit might have a very great and favorable effect; I doubt very much whether it is not true to-day that the fact that the Government rejects and refuses and discredits its own paper at the custom-house has a very great effect upon the depreciation of that paper everywhere. If so, it has been a very costly experiment. It never was done anywhere else. Did the British Government do it? Did they refuse to take Bank of England notes for duties and for all debts to the Government? Not at all. They received them for everything. They were a legal tender for everything, and even were paid for the interest on their debt, which they were solemnly bound to pay in specie, but refused to pay, and paid in paper, and now call us repudiators because some propose to pay ours in paper. What did they do from 1801 to 1821? They paid all their interest in Bank of England notes, part of the time depreciated, and received it for every debt of the Government. In consequence of its being received the depreciation was very slight.

I think another cause of the depreciation of our currency is the enormous expenditures of the Government. I do not say that in any party sense. I am not talking as a partisan. The time for that has gone by. But we have raised, say, $1,500,000,000 in taxes since the war closed. That money has been paid out for various purposes. How much of it might have been saved? Why, sir, if we had come here with a self-sacrificing spirit at the close of the war and determined to do our duty, to cut down every expense, to refuse to raise every salary—not excluding our own; if we had come here in a spirit of self-sacrifice and said we will stay here and do our duty and not ask that our own salaries shall be raised, nor will we raise any others, nor will we pay a dollar which is not inevitably necessary, I believe our paper money to-day would have been nearly as good as gold.

The reason why I comment upon the Senator's statement that the amount of our debt and the amount of our paper currency has nothing to do with this depreciation is because I think it leads directly to this spirit of extravagance. If he is correct, it is comparatively no matter how much we spend; our paper is not depreciated; our debt is nothing. I beg leave to say to you, Mr. President, that our debt is a rather serious thing. It is a great, enormous fact, tremendous in its consequences. I trust in Heaven it will be paid in all its parts; but I tell you, Senators, you have a duty to perform in regard to it which is not to be shirked off, nor to be avoided by claiming that its amount is of no consequence and has no effect upon the value of money.

It is very popular in stump speeches and in popular assemblies to tell the people that they have vast resources; that they possess an immensely rich country; that they owe comparatively nothing. Sir, the national debt is a mortgage upon one fifth of all the personal property of the country, and it is a very serious question how it shall be paid. When the President of the United States proposes a plan which may be unwise, what is said? He is denounced as a repudiator, and our credit is sunk still lower than it was before for the sake of getting an opportunity to injure President Johnson.

Now, sir, the first thing which I would do to raise the credit of our country would be, as I have said, to adopt a rigid system of economy. I think that the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives should pass a joint resolution declaratory of their purpose to enter upon and persist in at all hazards a system of rigid, unbending economy that should yield to no appeal, and pay out nothing that was not absolutely necessary. That mere fact would benefit our public credit much more than the resolution which is now proposed. I would stop everything; I would stop even the Pacific railroad if necessary; I would not pay out another dollar until our credit was restored. I say I would stop the Pacific railroad if necessary. I trust it would not prove necessary. The honorable Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] looks alarmed. I do not wish to cut off intercourse with him when he and I retire to private life; but I say, rather than repudiate the public debt, cut even that off. I would stop the purchase of real estate from foreign Governments. I would not buy Cuba. I would not buy Mexico. I would pay our debt; and when our debt was paid, if we had any money to expend in foreign luxuries, in the form of icebergs or torrid zones, I would then indulge in them.

What would be the next step? Then—and here I am perhaps encroaching upon party ground—I would adopt a system of policy like that pointed out by my honorable colleague [Mr. FERRY] the day before yesterday. I would extend to the people of the South the hand of friendship and kindness. I would remove all their political disabilities. I would invite them to this entertainment of paying our public debt, and let them join us in it.

Now, sir, I have a few words to say with regard to that plan of my colleague. I have nearly concluded what I had to say on the financial question; but I have a few words to say with regard to the speech of my colleague in connection with this subject of restoring our national credit. He proposes two measures: one a joint resolution to repeal the disabilities made by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, and the other a bill which does not require a two-thirds vote. I thank my honorable colleague for those two measures, and I thank him for his speech upon them. The honorable Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] proposed a scheme which called up my colleague—a scheme which seems to me utterly shocking in its character, proposing to create a new set of crimes, proposing to make it a crime in the United States of America for a citizen to hold an office. The comment made upon that by my colleague was sufficient, and I will not add to it. The only fault I had to find with my colleague's speech was that it was a little too late. If he had made that speech one year ago he would have stood with me and with my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] and he might have done some good. It is not too late now for some benefit to result from it. While I am up I will read a few extracts from it. It is precisely, except in its eloquence and ability, what I might have said myself. He is speaking of the laws which we adopted last year, against which I protested, against which I took the liberty to make a speech, imposing political disabilities upon a portion of our own people. He says:

"These laws, limiting and restraining the suffrage, serve now only to gail and irritate, and to do no good whatever, unless, indeed, sir—that which I too often hear and too often read in the newspapers—we are here to continue disabilities upon those people for the purpose of maintaining the ascendancy of the Republican party in those communities; and I take it that legislation for such a purpose as that, or for any merely partisan purpose, is not to be entertained by the Senate of the United States."

"Well, now, sir, is there any necessity that the fragment that remains of the operation of these limitations upon the suffrage in those States should be longer continued? And if there is not; if the original necessity of these disabilities of both kinds has passed away, has actually been driven out of existence by the action of the people of the United States in the recent presidential election, why should we retain them here longer?"

"We want them to come back to build up a strong, free, and enduring nationality; and it is true, Senators, that the disabilities imposed by this third section to-day deprive the States and the Republic of the assistance and services of the greater portion of the intelligence, the culture, and the property of those communities."

Precisely what I objected against the bill a year ago. He goes further:

"But the imposition of your disabilities goes farther. It scatters broadcast all over the South a race of political outlaws, sullen and discontented, from the feeling, right or wrong, that they are suffering injustice, and naturally enough so fits them to become centers of conspiracy."

That is an objection which occurred to me and which I attempted to express. I thought it would produce that effect. And still every day, although by our legislation we have made them centers of conspiracy and made them outlaws, we are hearing complaints continually because they are disquieted and uneasy. It reminds me—to quote Dr. Johnson again—of what he one day said to Boswell. He told Boswell he had seen that day an instance which manifested human nature to him in a new light. "I was passing a fishmonger's stall and I saw the fishmonger skinning an eel alive, and he was cursing the eel because he would not lie still." [Laughter.] That is precisely what we are doing in regard to the South, according to the Senator's own statement, skinning them alive, imposing disabilities upon them, making them outlaws, and cursing them because they will not lie still. I think their misconduct, if there has been any misconduct, has been greatly overrated. I have no doubt there has been some misconduct, but I do not believe it to exist to the extent that my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] does, who told us that one individual killed one hundred and twenty-four men. I do not think a manslayer is abroad to that extent. That was an idle boast. There has been some illegal action undoubtedly. What is the cause? My colleague answers that question. He says our legislation makes them "sullen and discontented outlaws." Let that answer be spread broadcast before the people of the State of Connecticut, and there is my vindication, for which I most profoundly thank my colleague.

HO. OF REPS.

Claims of Loyal Alabamians—Mr. Haughey.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Mr. CONNESS. Will my friend allow me at this point to make a suggestion merely?

Mr. DIXON. I rather prefer, as I am so nearly through, that the Senator should wait; he will have an opportunity in a few moments. Now, sir, what I want is precisely what my colleague wants, with one or two exceptions. He proposes to amend the Constitution of the United States in a manner which to me is very revolting, not because I hate negro suffrage, but, sir, I do desire that the proud old State of Connecticut shall not be humbled in the dust. Having enjoyed the right of suffrage and of regulating her own suffrage for more than two hundred years—longer, I believe, than any State in the Union—I do not desire that at this late day she should be compelled to submit to the commands of the State of Massachusetts or any other State with regard to who shall vote within her borders; and I do most deeply regret that my colleague feels it his duty to support such a constitutional amendment. When I called attention a year and a half ago to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] to establish negro suffrage in Connecticut and other States by act of Congress I was regarded as attempting to excite a false alarm. Sir, I knew what was coming. I saw it then. That Senator never has failed in any of his attempts. Some Senators resist him for a while, but all must eventually yield. I say it in no sense of reproach. The fact is, extreme men in a party always do carry their point.

When the honorable Senator from Massachusetts proposed his scheme I predicted when I reached home, in a speech which I there made, that the time was near at hand when the proud State of Connecticut would see herself compelled to accept a suffrage law from Massachusetts. Massachusetts is a great State, and we are ready to take advice from her at any time, but compulsion is hard to submit to.

I deeply regret that my colleague deems it his duty to support that measure. I had hoped his course would be the other way. If he will consent that when the measure is forced upon us it shall, by the terms of the resolution proposing it, be submitted for adoption to a convention of the people of Connecticut chosen for the purpose, instead of the Legislature; if the people of Connecticut by a convention consent to it, I will not object. If the people of Connecticut see fit to alter their suffrage law I am perfectly willing. I think if a constitutional amendment on the subject is submitted to the States it ought to be provided that it shall be ratified by conventions chosen for the purpose, and not forced through Legislatures chosen for another purpose. The latter would be a fraud upon the people.

On looking at a speech which I made less than a year ago, among other things I find language which he has almost repeated with regard to the disabilities imposed upon the people of the South. I then said:

"I find, sir, under this law, that almost every man capable of holding the pettiest office comes under the ban of your proscription, and is to be allowed no share in the government of the community in which he lives."

The Senator says that a large portion of the property, intelligence, and culture of the South is excluded. I added:

"How is this done? Not on the face of the law, but in a manner furtive and deceptive. The fourteenth proposed amendment to the Constitution provides that a certain specified class, including all who ever held any office, shall, under certain circumstances, be deprived of the privilege of holding office under the State or Federal Government. The reconstruction law simply provides that all who, by this proposed amendment, were to be excluded from office, shall be refused registration as voters. Thus the work is done."

And that is the work the Senator proposes to undo. I said further:

"How many white men are thus reduced to a political condition beneath that of their former slaves it is difficult accurately to ascertain. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORRIS] admits the number to be fifty thousand. I have no doubt, judging from the effect which such an exclusion would have if existing in my own State, that the number disfranchised in the entire South is at least two hundred thousand. But take the estimate of the Senator from Indiana, namely, fifty thousand, that number accomplishes the object of the disfranchisement."

Now, the Senator himself declares, as I have already read, that a class quite as large as that which I specified in my remarks have had disabilities imposed upon them, the effect of which has been to make them outlaws, rebels, and to make them necessarily centers of conspiracy. He speaks of the necessity for it. Why, sir, it is as necessary now as it was a year ago. He says, or the inference is, that the only necessity for it now is to keep in power the Republican party. He says the newspapers advocate it for that purpose. Why, sir, they advocated it for that purpose then. It may have been a little disguised; but does not the Senator know that that was the whole object and purpose? If that is atrocious now, was it righteous then? All that can be said in regard to it now might have been, and was by me and others said at that time. The Senator, therefore, as I say, was only a little too late in his remarks.

Now, one other thing I beg to observe, not for the purpose of showing inconsistency in my colleague, but for the purpose of showing the extent of candor to which he has now reached. He said a year ago that they were not disfranchised; that the disfranchisement already existed, and that we had only refused to enfranchise them. I thought then he was mistaken. He now sees what was then the truth, that we had by legislation "imposed disabilities" upon them.

I do not like, Mr. President, to refer to remarks which I have made here in former days; but I will take the liberty, as I desire to have them go upon the record, of reading a few more words from the speech which I then made upon this subject, with which I will close. I said:

"If my voice could reach them I would entreat them to cast their eyes backward on the events of the last three years and calmly consider whether all that they apprehended as the consequence of the radical policy has not been more than realized. Do they find in its full development anything which invites them to aid in establishing it as the permanent policy of the Government? Do they not see more plainly than ever before that it is incompatible with constitutional freedom and the true interests of the people? It is now fully exposed to their view, with its military despotism, its contempt of the supreme judicial power of the nation, its usurpation of executive authority by Congress, its instigation of a conflict of races for supremacy by refusing to an immense class of white men the privilege of suffrage granted indiscriminately to uneducated blacks"— the very thing which now shocks my colleague—

"its sectional bitterness, its spirit of undying revenge, its gospel of hereditary hatred."

That was thought to be unjustifiable language by many when I used it; but I ask my colleague if it is not borne out by what he himself has said in his speech, if we have made them outlaws and rebels and centers of conspiracy, which I conscientiously believe, as he does, to be the case—

"It is in the power of this great body of intelligent conservative voters, with whom party ties are less strong than love of country, to overthrow this policy and restore peace, good-will, and unbounded prosperity to a suffering and distracted people."

I wished to overthrow this policy then. One year only elapses, and my colleague wishes to overthrow it now. I then added:

"It is in their power even now to compel the adoption of a policy modified and amended in the manner proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, consistent with all the rights of humanity in which the intelligent minds of the North and the South shall cordially agree and which shall harmonize conflicting opinions in both sections.

If they exert their power, and, by a united effort through the ballot-box, accomplish this great work, our Union may yet be restored upon the constitutional basis, the rights of every human being may be protected, liberty may be established upon the sure foundation of law, and, through all the years of the nation's life, the people of the North and the South, having no further possible ground of quarrel, may become more and more harmoniously joined together in the willing bonds of fraternal union. But if the policy and the spirit which now control our legislation are to receive the popular sanction, and be perpetuated, our history will be no longer a glorious record of human progress and of unexampled national and individual prosperity, but its dark and bloody pages will be written, like the roll in the vision of the prophet Ezekiel, within and without, with lamentations and mourning and woe."

That is what I thought would be the effect of these measures less than one year ago. My colleague now proposes to strike them all out for the reasons which he has given. I approve of his reasons, and I shall vote for his proposition.

Claims of Loyal Alabamians.

SPEECH OF HON. T. HAUGHEY,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 5, 1869.

In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's annual message.

Mr. HAUGHEY. Mr. Chairman, near the close of the session in July last I introduced a joint resolution, which reads as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of the law of July 4, 1864, restricting the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and providing for the payment of certain demands of loyal citizens of States not in rebellion for quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States, be extended so as to include loyal citizens of the State of Alabama."

This resolution was referred to the Committee of Claims. As it is uncertain when that committee will report, I propose to submit my remarks in support of the resolution in Committee of the Whole.

Relief is sought in this resolution for such loyal citizens of Alabama as furnished to the Army of the United States quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies for which they have received no compensation. The class of men for whom relief is sought are those whose sufferings and sacrifices and whose persecutions during and since the war entitle them to the favorable consideration of Congress. They are the true and faithful Union men of Alabama. They are those who opposed secession, opposed rebellion, and never during the war or since did any act which could be construed as giving voluntary aid or comfort to the enemies of the Government.

They are generally men of moderate means—small farmers—whose horses, cattle, corn, and hogs, which were taken or furnished for the use and support of the Army of the United States, constituted nearly all their wealth. Very few of them had any interest, present or prospective, in slaves or slavery. Though impoverished, in many instances, by the Union forces they never faltered in their love and attachment to the Government. Thousands of them, rather than submit to rebel tyranny and despotism, left their homes, their wives, children, and all that life holds dear, and took refuge within the Union lines, and there remained until the close of the war. Several thousand of them enlisted in the Union Army, and many of them acted as scouts and performed valuable services in aid of the Union cause. While many of these brave men were fighting in the ranks of the Union Army and exposing themselves to all the privations and hardships incident to camp life their families at home were stripped of all their means of support by a branch of that Army in whose ranks they were fighting.

For reasons satisfactory to Congress the claims of these men have hitherto been ignored. Though the justice of the claims and the loyalty of the claimants can be established by the highest and most positive evidence, and though nearly four years have elapsed since the claims originated, they have thus far failed to be recognized and still remain unsettled. The tendency of legislation in regard to these claims is to increase rather than diminish the difficulties attending their adjustment.

In the enactment of laws and the establishment of rules and regulations for the proper adjustment of claims growing out of the rebellion much embarrassment has been experienced in agreeing upon a uniform standard by which the justice of claims and the loyalty of claimants should be established. The standard of loyalty so far as it affects southern claimants has changed very materially within the last few years. It is much more rigid in its requirements now than it was during the first few years of the war. Until the passage of the act of July 4, 1864, all that was required to establish the loyalty of a claimant and secure the settlement of his claim was to prove that he never voluntarily aided the rebellion. Now he must prove in addition that he had not been a resident of nor did the claim originate during the war in a seceding State, Tennessee and West Virginia excepted. Excepting in these two States no claims growing out of the rebellion originating in a seceding State can be settled or in any way adjudicated, either by the Court of Claims or by the Executive Departments of the Government.

According to existing laws it is of no avail that a claimant can prove by demonstrative evidence that he never voluntarily aided the rebellion. He may even prove by incontrovertible evidence that he not only gave no aid to the rebellion but that he had served in the United States Army during the whole period of the war, and aided to the full extent of his ability in suppressing the rebellion, yet from the simple fact that his property was taken by the United States forces in one of those States that are excluded from the benefits of the act of July 4, 1864, no settlement of his claim can be permitted. Even the widows and orphans of Federal soldiers may establish the fact that they have been impoverished and brought to misery and want by the Union Army, and yet because they were residents of the South no compensation is allowed for their losses.

If the citizens of the seceding States had been a unit in voluntarily engaging in rebellion, and the citizens of the non-seceding States had unanimously endeavored to suppress it, the legislative and executive departments of the Government would have had no difficulty in the enactment of laws and the establishment of rules for the proper adjustment of claims growing out of the rebellion and in determining the loyalty of claimants.

The question of loyalty would always have been determined in any case by ascertaining the State in which the party resided during the war. In the examination of claims the Executive Departments of the Government would have been relieved of all embarrassment in the adjustment of them after ascertaining the section of the country in which the party resided during the war and the locality in which the claim originated. The jurisdiction of the Court of Claims would thus have been confined to the adjudication of such war claims as originated in non-seceding States and belonged to residents of those States. Geographically, then, the jurisdiction of the court would extend to the line dividing the seceding from the non-seceding States. All claims growing out of the rebellion in the non-seceding States would have been adjudicated upon their merits without reference to the loyalty of the claimants, and all those of a similar character originating in a seceding State would have been rejected without examination or without reference to their merits upon the ostensible ground of the disloyalty of the claimants. One of the many advantages which would probably have attended this condition of affairs would have been the exclusion of a few fraudulent claimants. A few thousand dollars out of which the Government may have been defrauded might possibly have been saved to the Treasury and placed to the credit of the national debt.

But it is well known that this hypothetical condition of affairs did not and could not exist. From the very nature and object of the war such an imaginary state of affairs was practically impossible. It is a well-known fact that during the whole period of the war, from its commencement to its close, there was a large number of the citizens of each of the seceding States who opposed secession, who never voluntarily aided the rebellion, and whose political status among their neighbors was that of Union men. Amid all the changing scenes of the rebellion, through the sorrows of defeat and the joys of success, they remained firm, and earnestly and prayerfully desired the final success of the Union cause. It is also a well-known fact that in some of the non-seceding States there were many who during the whole period of the rebellion earnestly sympathized with it and on all suitable occasions gave to it their aid, countenance, and support.

Hence, to discriminate by law in favor of the loyal claimants in the non-seceding States and against the same class of claimants in the seceding States is to sectionalize loyalty and create an unfair and unwarranted distinction between citizens who were identified in making common sacrifices in a common cause and in behalf of an imperiled but common country. To grant a monopoly in the settlement of claims growing out of the rebellion to loyal citizens of the non-seceding States is to discriminate unfairly and unjustly against citizens of the seceding States, who have at all times and under all circumstances been warm and unwavering friends of the Government. Thousands of those citizens against whom the discrimination is thus made never conceived a disloyal thought, nor did they ever utter a disloyal sentiment.

Loyalty consists in fidelity to the Government and obedience to its laws. In a Government like that of the United States, where all men are permitted to enjoy equal privileges and have an equal voice in making the laws, it seems strange that any of its citizens should be disloyal. Yet, such was the ambition of a few political leaders in the southern States, and such was their power to deceive and mislead the southern people through the only channels of intelligence that these leaders would tolerate, that a majority of these people were led into an attitude of hostility to the Government. A large number of the citizens of each of the southern States, however, resisted the appeals of these leaders, and notwithstanding the unparalleled persecutions to which they were subjected, they remained true to their Union principles during the whole period of the war. They are true and loyal to-day, and even at this late day they are still the victims of rebel proscription and persecution.

Under ordinary circumstances no man is entitled to honor or preferment for his loyalty. Loyalty is due from the citizen to the Government which protects him. Hence the citizens of the non-seceding States in adhering to the Government during the war simply performed their duty. The Government gave them protection, and their present and future welfare depended upon its unity and perpetuity. For their loyalty, then, they are not justly entitled to any special privileges or preferments beyond those which are granted equally to loyal citizens in the southern States.

Loyal citizens of the southern States remained loyal under extraordinary circumstances. To be loyal in a disloyal State was to sacrifice business, friendship, property, and to incur social proscription, persecution in a thousand forms, frequently imprisonment, and in many cases death by the hands of rebel assassins. Notwithstanding these unfavorable circumstances under which these citizens maintained their loyalty they neither ask nor expect any privileges which are not equally accorded to all loyal citizens throughout the Union. They simply desire that their claims shall receive the same recognition that is granted to the claims of loyal citizens of the non-seceding States.

The provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, providing for the payment of quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States are confined, in their application, to States not in rebellion. By joint resolution approved June 18, 1866, these provisions of the law were extended to the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson in West Virginia, and on the 24th of July following the benefits of the law were again extended so as to include the State of Tennessee. These provisions of the act having been misconstrued by the attorneys of southern claim agents, and appeals having been taken from the decisions of the heads of the quartermaster's and commissary departments of the Government, another act was passed in February, 1867, explanatory of the act of July 4, 1864.

The act of February, 1867, declares that the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, shall not be construed so as to authorize the settlement of any claim for supplies or stores taken or furnished for the use of or used by the armies of the United States, nor for the occupation of or injury to real estate, nor for the consumption, appropriation, or destruction of or damage to personal property by the military authorities or troops of the United States where such claim originated during the war for the suppression of the southern rebellion in a State or part of a State declared in insurrection by the proclamation of the President of the United States, dated July 1, 1862, or in a State which by an ordinance of secession attempted to withdraw from the United States Government; provided, that nothing herein contained shall repeal or modify the effect of any act or joint resolution extending the provisions of said act of July 4, 1864, to the loyal citizens of the State of Tennessee or of the State of West Virginia, or any county therein.

These laws, then, prohibit the settlement of all claims originating during the war in any of the rebellious States, Tennessee and West Virginia excepted. They declare in effect that the loyal citizens of these States are not, according to the Constitution of the United States, entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States, nor are they entitled to just compensation for their private property that had been taken for public use. The mere residence or domicile of loyal citizens during the war in any of these States, is regarded as prima facie evidence of disloyalty, and is considered a sufficient reason to deprive them of those inherent and inalienable rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution of the United States.

These laws, however, are assumed to be constitutional upon the ground that the States which are excluded from the benefits of their provisions were at the time of their enactment in rebellion against the authority of the Government. They were then subject to the laws of war, and it is assumed that none of the citizens of those States could legally be entitled to any protection from the Constitution of the United States. All the citizens of those States, without regard to their private acts or opinions, were in contemplation of law public enemies.

The provisions of the Constitution to which reference has been made are applicable to a condition of peace, and could have no binding force in relation to the enemies of the Government. But even if binding, so far as they might apply to the loyalists of the southern States, such was the demoralized condition of society in those States at the date of the passage of these laws that the proper application of these provisions of the Constitution would have been impracticable. It was impossible to do justice to the loyal men of the South without doing great injustice in thousands of instances to the Government. The rights of both when practicable should ever be held sacred. In this case, however, it seems the rights of loyal citizens for practical purposes were held in subordination to the supposed paramount rights of the Government. The great obstacle in the proper adjustment of the claims of loyal citizens at that time was the extreme difficulty in discriminating in many cases between the loyal and disloyal.

For practical purposes, then, those States in which the rebellion had been suppressed were properly regarded as conquered territories or conquered provinces. By rebellion they had forfeited their rights as States in the Union. Hence, in the enactment of laws or in the establishment of rules and regulations for the proper government of these territories, Congress was not supposed to be limited in its action by that clause of the Constitution which enjoins equality of privileges and immunities among the citizens of the several States. These States by rebellion had ceased to be States, and the citizens inhabiting these conquered territories, without regard to their private acts or opinions, had ceased to be citizens of States within the meaning of the Constitution. These premises, then, being assumed to be correct Congress had the constitutional right in the enactment of laws to make such discrimination between the loyal and disloyal States, and between the citizens of these several States as are made in the laws of 1864 and 1867.

Politicians, however, have differed very widely in opinion as to the correctness of the theory upon which the war was conducted, and as to the effect of the war upon the rights of the rebellious States. The same difference of opinion exists as to the best mode of reconstructing those States. An appeal was taken from the congressional theory and plan of reconstruction to the people, and the people in the late presidential election decided emphatically in favor of Congress. From the people's decision there is no appeal. Whatever differences of opinion may exist as to the rights of States and as to the effects of the war in impairing or destroying those rights in the rebellious States, and in regard to the rights, privileges, and immunities of the citizens of those States, all private opinions must yield to the great aggregate opinion of the nation as unequivocally expressed at the ballot-box in the late election. The acts of Congress, so far as they relate to the reconstruction and government of the rebel States, have been so triumphantly indorsed by the people that the constitutionality of those acts has ceased forever to be a question of dispute.

Recognizing, then, to the fullest extent the constitutionality of these acts in relation to the settlement of claims originating during the war in the rebellious States, it is submitted that to continue the discriminating features of these acts against States which have been reconstructed and have been admitted into the Union upon terms of equality with the other States, would be contrary to good policy and to the best interests of the Government. To continue those discriminating features against the loyal claimants of the South after the States have been reconstructed and admitted into the Union would be to weaken that confidence which these men have always manifested in the justice and magnanimity of Congress. Notwithstanding the correctness of the congressional theory of the war loyal men in the southern States can never appreciate the justice of a law which authorizes the payment of a loyal claimant in a northern State, and prohibits the payment of a loyal claimant in a southern State where the claims are in point of merit and justice equally the same.

The object of the joint resolution now under consideration is to extend the benefits of the law of 1864 to the loyal citizens of Alabama. The law of February, 1867, to the contrary notwithstanding. This resolution might with propriety have included the other interdicted States which are now represented in Congress. But as the arguments in favor of Alabama apply with equal force to the other States it is deemed of no consequence that the others are not included. All that is sought in the resolution is that the loyal claimants of Alabama shall be placed upon an equal footing with loyal claimants in those States which are not excluded from the benefits of the law of 1864.

Alabama is no longer a rebellious State. Her legitimate and practical relations with the Union are now fully restored. A large majority of her people are loyal to the Government. They prefer the Government of the United States to every other Government, and in case of need an overwhelming majority of her fighting men would defend the Government against all other Governments on earth. She has a full representation of loyal men in Congress. A large majority of the Legislature of the State and of the State and county officers are loyal and always have been loyal. Her constitution and laws guaranty equal rights and privileges to all. They are pre-eminently liberal, and in entire harmony with Republican principles and with the enlightened and progressive spirit of the age. Alabama, then, being a State in the Union and of the Union, it is sincerely believed that if the benefits of the law of 1864 were extended to the undoubtedly loyal claimants of that State the law would be as safely and guardedly administered as in any other State of the Union.

The loyal claimants of Alabama have a war history very similar to that of loyal citizens in Tennessee, to whom claims originating during the war in that State are now authorized to be paid. Like the loyal citizens of Tennessee, those of Alabama resisted secession and rebellion to the full extent of their ability. When resistance was found to be hopeless they yielded a reluctant submission to a fate which they were powerless to avert. Like the Tennessee loyalists, thousands of the Union men of Alabama lay hidden in caves and mountain gorges and deep ravines awaiting their chances to escape to the Federal lines. Many thus situated were captured by rebel bloodhounds, and if not instantly shot they were carried in chains to loathsome rebel dungeons, and allowed to linger and die from bad treatment, or to be taken from their prison cells by vigilance committees and either shot or hung for no other crime than that of Unionism.

Like the Unionists of East Tennessee a large number of the able-bodied Unionists in North Alabama enlisted in the Union Army and fought with it until the end of the war. Though the Tennessee Federal soldiers largely outnumbered those from Alabama, this disparity in numbers is due to the greater difficulties to be overcome by the latter than by the former in reaching the Federal lines. It is fair to presume that the love of the Union was equally intense in the eastern counties of Tennessee and the northern counties of Alabama. The difference in the manifestation of that love was solely due to the difference in the geographical position of those two Switzerland of America. All the arguments, then, which have heretofore been urged in favor of the payment of loyal claimants in Tennessee apply with equal force and cogency to loyal claimants in Alabama.

To deny these men the small pittance which some of them claim for property taken by the Union Army, or for supplies taken by or furnished to the Union Army upon the simple plea that these men were citizens of a rebellious State, during the war, does not comport with that justice and magnanimity which have hitherto been characteristic features in the conduct of the Government toward its loyal citizens. It was not the fault but the misfortune that they were citizens of those States during the war. Nor was it their fault but their great misfortune that their homes had been the chosen battle-ground of a causeless and wicked rebellion. Moreover, it was not their fault but their exceedingly great calamity that the United States Government failed to extend its protecting arm to its loyal citizens in those States and save them from falling into the meshes of a rebel despotism. If there is any culpability in residing under a rebel despotism during the war the Government is entitled to a reasonable share of that culpability in permitting that rebel despotism to exist.

Allegiance and protection are reciprocal, and correlative obligations between the Government and the citizen. The citizen owes allegiance to the Government, and the Government in return owes him protection. If the citizen refuses to obey the behests of the Government and manifests a desire to overthrow or attempts to overthrow it he is a traitor, and forfeits his claim upon the Government for protection. And on the other hand, if the Government is unwilling, unable, or fails from any cause to protect the citizen, the allegiance which the latter owes to the Government is absolved. A Government which is unable, or fails from any cause to protect its citizens can justly have no claim upon the latter for allegiance.

At the commencement of the war a majority of the people in the southern States revolted against their lawful Government and organized in its stead a revolutionary one. A minority of the citizens of those States opposed the revolution and adhered to the lawful Government until they were overpowered by the revolutionists. The rightful Government, however, for four long years failed to protect this minority, and suffered it to be ruled and controlled by the revolutionary government. The citizens composing this minority were at all times anxiously desirous of resuming their allegiance, but during the whole of this gloomy period the protecting arm of the Government was too short to reach them. Finally, however, when the Government did succeed in conquering this revolutionary majority and resumed its sway over the rebellious States, the citizens of the minority with joy and exultation resumed that allegiance which for four years they had held in abeyance but had never absolutely relinquished.

Under such circumstances these Union citizens composing the minority had no right to expect that the Government, in resuming its rightful authority over those States and in establishing rules and regulations for the payment of claims growing out of the rebellion, would impose upon them the same disabilities as are imposed upon the revolutionary majority. By existing laws there is no distinction made in those States between the innocent and the guilty—between those who tried to destroy and those who tried to save the Government. The rebel assassin is classed with the Union man who was the victim of his assassination. The persecuted Union man is entitled to no more consideration than his rebel persecutors. No distinction is made between claims for supplies furnished to the rebel forces and those for supplies furnished to the Army of the United States. All are reduced to a common level by the laws of July 4, 1864, and that of February, 1867. As it was in the taking of property for the use of the Army, so it is in the payment of claims for that property. No distinction is made between loyalty and disloyalty. All are treated alike and equally excluded from the benefits of the law of July 4, 1864.

HO. OF REPS.

In view of the long suffering, privations, and persecutions to which the loyal citizens of Alabama have been subjected, it would almost appear to be a work of supererogation to ask Congress for such a recognition of the justice of their claims as has been granted to the loyal claimants of Tennessee and West Virginia. Four fifths of the loyal claimants in Alabama are small farmers of moderate or limited means. Their claims are generally small. But though small they are very much needed. They are in many cases small when compared with the resources of the Government to pay, but large in many cases when compared with the ability of the claimants to lose their claims. Their property that was taken for the use of the Army was such, in many cases, as was indispensable for the support of their families. In many cases their horses, mules, cattle, hogs, and corn were all taken, and they were thus left without the means of making a support for their families. Even the families of Federal soldiers who were at the time fighting the battles of the Union were thus stripped and left dependent upon the charity of their more fortunate rebel neighbors.

In the latter part of March and beginning of April, 1865, United States troops under the command of General Wilson marched through the very heart of Alabama, from the Tennessee river on the north to the Alabama river on the south. They lived on the country through which they passed, giving no receipts or vouchers for any of the property used or taken by the Army. The Union people were generally the greatest sufferers, because they would not conceal their property, while the rebels, whenever they had timely warning, would usually carry their property off to remote and secluded localities and conceal it on the approach of the Army. All that these Union men ask is simple, even-handed justice. They have committed no crime; they have forfeited no rights; they firmly adhered to the Government, so far as adherence was practicable, through good and evil report. They were the friends of the Government before the war and during the war, and are the friends of the Government to-day, and, if need be, would fight in its defense.

This joint resolution is no party measure, nor is it to be considered in the light of policy or expediency merely. It is a measure which addresses itself to the justice, magnanimity, and liberality of Congress. The reasons which induced Congress to extend the benefits of the law of July 4, 1864, to the States of Tennessee and West Virginia are equally forcible in the case of Alabama. The provisions of the law have been justly and wisely extended to those States without any important losses or any serious detriment to the interests of the Government. It is believed that the aggregate amount of loyal claims in Alabama is considerably less than it was in Tennessee, and that the payment of fraudulent claims can be guarded against with as much facility and efficiency in the former State as in the latter.

Congress has hitherto responded promptly and very favorably to the appeals of the loyal citizens of Alabama in matters of political reconstruction. For this the loyal citizens of that State are profoundly grateful. A few of these same loyal citizens again appeal to Congress for some degree of financial reconstruction. Their property has been taken and used by the United States Army. They appeal to Congress for compensation. It is confidently hoped and believed that this last appeal will be met with the same promptness and the same spirit of liberality that characterized the responses to their former appeals. The sectional and discriminating features of the law being removed, the long-neglected and downtrodden Unionists of the South will thus have cause to rejoice that their sufferings and sacrifices in behalf of an imperiled Union have not been in vain; that their faith and confidence in the justice and beneficence of the Government have not been misplaced. They will thus have fully realized that this great Government of the people, for the people and by the people, knows no North, no South, no East, no West; that the rights, interests, and welfare of all sections are equally favored and equally protected.

SPEECH OF HON. J. M. HUMPHREY,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 14, 1869.

The House having under consideration bill No. 1212, to provide for the construction of a ship-canal around the Falls of Niagara—

Mr. HUMPHREY said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In the discussion of this bill I shall not occupy any very great portion of the time of the House in considering the power of the Federal Government to engage in the work contemplated by it. It is sufficient for me to say that this is the first time in the history of this country that it has been proposed to set to work the Secretary of War or any of the officers of the Government in building canals or railroads. All that has been done by the Government heretofore has been simply to make appropriations to aid in the construction of such works, leaving the work to be done by the States or corporations having that subject in charge. This bill proposes to vest in the Secretary of War the power of going into the State of New York, take the territory of that State, and erect upon it a public work, irrespective of the giving or withholding of any approbation or consent on the part of that State. The policy of this bill strikes at the very foundation of State sovereignty.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are connected with this subject questions of a more practical character, economical questions which, in my judgment, should be sufficient to condemn a project of this sort at the present time, when the condition of our revenues is such that the Government can with difficulty meet its honest obligations incurred in carrying on the war for its preservation. Certainly we are not now in a condition to appropriate millions of money upon a work in which there can be no reasonable probability of advantage to the commercial interests of the country; a work, too, which affords every evidence of being no more and no less than one of those schemes whose projectors have been hanging around this Capitol during the last three or four years asking aid from the Government, because individual capitalists will not consent to be plundered and robbed by them.

By the first section of this bill it is proposed that the Army shall be taken to the frontier, and there, under the control of the Secretary of War, shall go to work and build this canal. I am not aware that there is more than one instance in the history of our country when the Army has been employed in digging canals, and that instance was one not very satisfactory in its results. But it is unnecessary for me to point out the impracticability and absurdity of this proposition. It was incorporated in this bill only as a screen to prevent this House from seeing its real objects and purposes, as the skillful hunter disguises his person so that he may better take his game.

Mr. Speaker, let us consider for a moment whether this bill does not come here under a false and fraudulent guise; whether it is not one of those schemes which should receive no support in any shape or form from Congress. I agree with everything that has been said by my colleague [Mr. VAN HORN] in relation to the duty of the Government to afford all the aid it can within its constitutional powers for the purpose of enlarging our borders, for the purpose of facilitating commerce—ay, for the purpose, if you please, of protecting us from the incursions of our enemies. The gentleman talks about this being a "military necessity." Why, Mr. Speaker, if war were declared to-morrow between Great Britain and the United States, there are Irishmen enough upon our border to take possession of Canada in less than twenty-four hours. Why, sir, this has been one of our great difficulties in keeping out of war. Within the last two years the exercise of the whole power of the Government has been required for the purpose of preventing the Fenians from taking possession of the Canadian territory. Yet now, when we are, as I suppose, under the reign of peace, we are asked to expend $12,000,000 for the purpose of defending us against this feeble colony of Great Britain. It is idle to talk about danger from that source. It can be done only for the purpose of bringing about results which, if the real state of the case were known, would not be countenanced for a moment by any intelligent or honest man.

It is a well-known fact that there are schemes before this House that will involve the expenditure of two or three hundred millions of dollars; and, Mr. Speaker, this scheme is presented as one fitted to take the lead of them all. There are appropriations asked for for the several Pacific railroads. One wants $56,000,000; another wants $50,000,000. And I say to the House that if we shall pass this bill we are pledged in honor or at least in consistency to stand by all the rest of the swindling schemes that may be presented.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the practical questions involved in this subject, it will take but a moment to present such facts as must, it seems to me, cause this House to hesitate before adopting any such measure. What are they? Why, sir, this is a proposition to connect Lake Erie with Lake Ontario by the building of a canal through the State of New York from one of these lakes to the other. It is a scheme which the gentleman who preceded me says was agitated as early as 1808. It has been agitated ever since by a few interested speculators, but it has never attained sufficient importance in the judgment of capitalists to secure a combination of capital sufficient to organize a company to build it. Nay, these speculators themselves either would not or could not raise sufficient money to pay the expense of such organization. Does any man suppose that in the great State of New York, with more railroads than any other State, with more money invested in canals and railroads than all the other States of this Union, if this work was feasible and would afford any profit to the men and capital engaged in its construction it would remain entirely untouched during more than a quarter of a century? I say, sir, that the very fact that it has not been is the very best evidence that it cannot be made of any possible utility or benefit to commerce.

A bill for the building this canal the House passed in the Thirty-Ninth Congress. It provided for the organization of a company, and appropriated $6,000,000 of the public money for the purpose. But mark! It was on this condition: that the company should expend $300,000 before it should be entitled to a cent of the public money; and that it should go on expending $300,000 and receiving $200,000 until the $6,000,000 were expended. That bill went to the Senate, where it was never finally acted upon. What is the reason that the same bill is not introduced here again? Why should the friends of this scheme present a different one? I will tell the House why. It was because when they began to talk to capitalists about subscribing and putting their own funds, dollar for dollar, with the Government into the scheme they could not get them to do it; and, sir, it is for that reason that they present this bill making an appropriation of $12,000,000 from the national Treasury sufficient to pay for the whole work. Does any man doubt, if this work could be made profitable, if it could be made useful, that there are capitalists in this country who would have been glad to have taken stock in a company where the Government paid half the expense? This, then, is another evidence that instead of being a work of merit, it is a scheme of demerit entirely, from the beginning to the end.

HO. OF REPS.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Again, Mr. Speaker, there are facts within the knowledge of every business man, demonstrating beyond the power of contradiction that this measure has no commercial value or importance whatever. I ask the attention of this House to some of them. The Welland canal through Canadian territory, connecting these two lakes, has been built upward of twenty years. It is of larger capacity than the New York canals, being sufficient to pass vessels of six hundred tons burden. The tolls are only enough to keep the canal in repair, and to pay for its superintendence; and what are the facts in reference to that canal? Since 1864, instead of the business of that canal increasing, it has fallen off. It has fallen off, sir, twenty per cent. since 1864, and this canal was built by the Canadian Government to accomplish the same purpose of this Niagara ship-canal; that is, of enabling the commerce of the West to pass from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario without change of vessels. By the report of the Canadian Government for the year 1867 in reference to the trade on this canal I find the following statement;

Total movement of property, passengers, and vessels on the Welland canal for the fiscal year 1867, and the three preceding years ending the 30th of June.

	1864.	1865.	1866.	1867.
Total tons.....	1,146,722	868,078	980,178	916,252
Total number of passengers.....	7,698	7,263	9,387	7,173
Number of vessels and boats of all kinds.....	7,443	6,347	6,149	5,405

Total tonnage..... 1,332,837 1,135,806 1,077,314 993,938

Percentage of decrease of 1867 compared with 1864 20.10 per cent.

Showing a falling off of a little over twenty per cent. in four years in the business of a canal connecting the same waters and accommodating the same commerce that the Niagara ship-canal will if it is ever built. Does this Government wish to engage in such an unprofitable undertaking? I hope not. But, sir, how is the commerce of the West to be benefited by building this canal? True, it can pass by it from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario without change of vessel, but it will not then attain any wider range of markets or diminish the existing rates of freight or other obstacles in reaching our own or foreign markets. The St. Lawrence river is not navigable from Montreal to Lake Ontario. There are forty-three miles of canal with twenty-six locks owned by Canadians, and upon their own territory, through which every vessel must pass before reaching the Atlantic ocean. And still it is gravely urged by the supporters of this bill that to build this canal with no outlet to the ocean except through a hostile or at least a foreign country, and through canals built by and subject at all times to the control of that foreign Government, which may whenever it sees fit exclude our commerce from them entirely by excessive tolls or otherwise, is a great national work and must be built by the Government out of the national revenues; but if we owned the St. Lawrence river and its canals, before this ship-canal would be available for western commerce these Canadian canals would require to be enlarged at an expense of not less than $30,000,000.

Sir, may it not be a part of this scheme to first commit our Government to the construction of this canal and then, after we have expended so much money for a work wholly unavailable to our commerce without the free use of the Canadian canals, to use it as an argument to force upon this country another treaty giving Canada the free use of our markets in consideration of the right to use their canals? There are now upon the files of this House two reports, sent here by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury made by Mr. Brega, who, I am informed, is the agent here of the Canadian Government, in the interest of a proposed treaty. The statements made and arguments used in these reports have led me to believe, and I doubt not will convince any member of this House who may read them, that the Canadian Government is deeply interested in the passage of this bill.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment? Do I understand my colleague to say that I am in favor of the revival of this reciprocity treaty with the Canadian Government, and that this bill is part of it?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I say that this scheme is a part of it.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I say that myself and friends are opposed to it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I say that this is a part of that scheme. Mr. Brega, it is said, is here with British gold to revive that reciprocity treaty.

In regard to the question of military necessity I will read an extract from an article written by a prominent citizen of Canada upon this subject. He says:

"Another argument against the theory of a new nationality is the exposed and defenseless condition of the colonies. The territorial formation of British North America presents an insurmountable obstacle to its defense against the United States. With three thousand miles of a frontier bordering upon a populous nation, with whom a casus belli might arise at any time, it would be utterly impossible to defend this country. Very reliable authorities are quoted in support of this generally conceded position, among which is Hon. Mr. Aytown, in the imperial Parliament, who said: 'He never had met with any man not a member of the Government who considered that it was possible to defend Canada against an attack in force by the United States;' and the decision of the writer is, that 'if British North America cannot be defended it cannot exist as a separate or dependent State.'"

Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this work can afford no relief to the commerce of the West, in view of the fact that it is a part and parcel of the schemes of plunder which infest this Capitol, it seems to me it is time that we should consider whether we have got so much money that we can afford to invest it in the manner proposed by this bill.

I am aware that it is supposed that the Representatives of the great West, being so deeply interested in any measure which proposes to cheapen transportation to the East, will favor this project without stopping to consider its practicability. This is one of the reasons why it is presented as the pioneer of all these schemes. I agree that the West should have every facility possible to reach the markets of this country and of Europe. But upon the question whether this canal will cheapen transportation I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that this canal simply enables the produce of the West to go to Lake Ontario without reshipment, and from there it must find its way to New York or some other market by the present routes. As I have already said, it cannot go from Lake Ontario out through the St. Lawrence river to a foreign market except by the canals of Canada, which must be first enlarged before they can afford any outlet for that trade. This is one route. The other is by way of the Oswego and Erie canal or the Champlain canal, or by railroad to New York city.

It will not be pretended that property can be carried by railroad from Lake Ontario to New York city, a distance of between three and four hundred miles, as cheap as from Buffalo to New York by the Erie canal. Neither can it be carried by way of the Oswego and Erie canals and Hudson river or the St. Lawrence river, Champlain canal, and Hudson river to New York as cheap or quick as by the Erie canal and Hudson river via Buffalo. The distances are greater, and the tolls and freights charged for the last twenty years more by the first two routes than by the last, the Buffalo route. The carrying capacity by the Oswego and Buffalo routes is the same, but by the St. Lawrence and Champlain route much less. It is apparent, therefore, that unless the Federal Government proposes to construct a ship-canal from Lake Ontario to the Hudson river, a distance of one hundred and eighty miles, the Niagara ship-canal, when completed, will not afford any relief to the western commerce, either by increasing the capacity for its transit or cheapening the cost to the markets of our own or foreign countries.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to put a question right here for my own information?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I will allow a question.

Mr. LOGAN. Why is it that wheat raised in California sells at a lower price in Boston than wheat raised in Illinois and Indiana, and flour also? Is it not the fact that water transportation—

Mr. HUMPHREY. I prefer to answer the question.

Mr. LOGAN. Then allow me to add another question. If the enlargement of this canal will decrease the length of railroad transportation between the West, or between Lake Erie or Lake Michigan and the East, so as to reduce it, according to the gentleman's own argument, to only two or three hundred miles by railroad, and if transportation by water is cheaper than by railroad, would it not to that extent advance the interest of the agricultural community, and in fact of the whole people of the western States?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The gentleman asks why the freights from San Francisco to New York are less than from Chicago to New York. It is for the same reason that freights from New York to Liverpool are less than from Chicago or Milwaukee to New York city, although the distance is much greater. There is a much larger amount of property shipped from New York to San Francisco than is brought back; consequently freights outward are much higher than on the return cargoes. Our eastern products are sent to California, and the ships in returning bring next to nothing, so that California wheat, as well as all other property, is brought back at merely nominal cost. Just so it is between New York city and Liverpool; the freight brought here far exceeds, both in amount and cost, that sent back. That is why New York city is the great market of this country for the products shipped to foreign countries. You can get at any time grain and flour carried from New York or Boston to Liverpool for less than you can get it carried through the waters of any one of the western lakes. Thus much in regard to the first question.

Now, then, for the next question. Add the freight and tolls from Lake Erie to the city of Oswego on the Welland canal and Lake Ontario to the charges on the three hundred and fifty miles of railroad from Oswego to New York city together, and it will exceed, by a very large percentage, the cost of freight and tolls from the city of Buffalo by water all the way to New York. That answers the gentleman's other question, as I understand it.

Now, for the purpose of furnishing a test in regard to this matter, I want to call the attention of the House to a comparison of the cost of transportation from the city of Chicago to the city of New York by way of the Welland canal and Lake Ontario, and the Oswego and Erie canal and the Hudson river, and by the way of Buffalo through the Erie canal and the Hudson river; and if there is nothing gained by the Welland canal route now, how can we expect to gain anything by building another canal, which will leave the produce in precisely the same place where the Welland canal leaves it? The building of a second canal, connecting Lakes Erie and Ontario will certainly not add anything to the cheapness of freights as long as the property must be carried from there by the same route and the same means of transportation that is used now. The cost of transportation of wheat and corn from Chicago to New York for the year 1864, via lake and canal, via Buffalo, was 28¹⁰/₁₀₀ cents on wheat, and 25¹⁰/₁₀₀ cents on corn; and via Oswego it was 28¹⁰/₁₀₀ cents on wheat, and 25¹⁰/₁₀₀ on corn—saving in favor of Buffalo one tenth of a cent on wheat, and four tenths on corn. Notice how evenly the charges are balanced in proportion to the work done by each route. The divisions of the charges by both routes for the average for the year were:

VIA BUFFALO.
	On wheat.	On corn.
Lakes freight.....	9.58 cents.	8.94 cents.
Canal tolls.....	6.21	4.83
Canal and river.....	12.57	11.72
VIA OSWEGO.
	On wheat.	On corn.
Lakes freight.....	15.37 cents	14.28 cents.
Canal tolls.....	3.54	2.75
Canal and river.....	9.45	8.87

Mr. CHURCHILL. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I have not time.

Mr. WARD. I hope my colleague will be allowed time to make his speech and to answer all questions.

Mr. HUMPHREY. If I can have all the time I need I am entirely willing to be interrupted; but for the present I must decline to yield. Sir, if the Welland canal, as I have shown, with a capacity to pass boats of six hundred tons burden from Lake Erie to Ontario, has not cheapened the cost of the transit of property from the West either to New York or a foreign market, and cannot add to the capacity of such transit without the building or enlarging other routes from Lake Ontario, I ask whether it is advisable that we should expend $12,000,000 for the purpose of opening another canal between these lakes, which cannot have any other or different effect than the one already built?

Mr. Speaker, it is known to every man who has any knowledge of the trade upon these lakes that within the last five years there has been a great falling off in the quantity of grain passing through the Welland canal. A railroad has been built by private capital upon its banks from lake to lake, and most of the grain destined for Lake Ontario is transferred from the vessels at Port Colborn, on Lake Erie, to the railroad and carried to Lake Ontario, and again delivered into vessels instead of using this canal; this is done as a matter of economy and advantage to those engaged in the trade.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word in relation to the bill which I have presented as a substitute for this bill. The main features of this substitute, as all members know who have taken enough interest in the matter to read it, provides for a grant by the Federal Government to the State of New York of the sum of $10,000,000 on condition that the State of New York shall enlarge the Oswego and the Erie canals to a size sufficient to enable the passage of vessels of two hundred and fifty feet in length and thirty feet in breadth; this will make those canals sufficiently large that steam-power may be used, an improvement which would reduce the tolls and freights to an enormous extent; it would obviate the necessity of but one transhipment at the city of Buffalo and at the city of Oswego from the large propellers and vessels of the lakes into boats upon these canals, carrying six hundred, eight hundred, or one thousand tons, and thence directly to the city of New York.

Now, a word in relation to the position which the State of New York, which I have the honor in part to represent, occupies in regard to this great question of inter-communication between the States, and particularly between the West and the East, over our canals and railroads. I undertake to say that there has been nowhere, either in this country or any other, a spirit and policy as wise, unselfish, and statesmanlike in favor of national commerce as that which has been exhibited by the people of New York. The people of the West should not look with any degree of dissatisfaction upon that State, for it is to its money and the wisdom and energy of its citizens that the whole West is indebted, more than to anything else, for the means of becoming the great and populous country it is to-day.

As early as 1808 some of the wisest men who ever lived in this country, Clinton, Morris, Livingston, and others, seeing the means of communication between the East and the West that was offered by the natural construction of the territory of New York, conceived the project of connecting the waters of the ocean with the waters of the great lakes by means of the Erie canal. They did not conceive that project in the narrow spirit of local pride or local interest, but it was in the interest of the nation. They prepared a memorial, which they came here and presented to the Congress, setting forth the advantages of this work, natural and otherwise, and asking that the General Government should make an appropriation for the purpose of constructing it. They asked for aid on the ground that it was a national enterprise. The Federal Government approved the project, but replied to the memorial that the General Government had no money to spare.

New York was then sparsely populated and poor, with less persons in the whole State than now live on Manhattan Island. But those men did not abandon this truly national work. They went home and agitated the project until they had aroused the interest of the people of that State, and in 1817 a law was passed by the Legislature authorizing the building of the Erie canal by the State. They did not stop for aid from the General Government. There was not then any lobby in this Capitol urging the Representatives of the people to let them put their hands into the Treasury and take out the people's money. I am sorry to say that there is a different state of things now from what there was then.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. Does my colleague [Mr. HUMPHREY] suppose that we have any lobby around this capital urging the passage of this bill? I will only say that the lobby is all on the other side, and the members of that lobby are in this Hall to-day.

Mr. COVODE. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HUMPHREY. For a moment, yes.

Mr. COVODE. I wish merely to correct an expression of the gentleman with regard to who was entitled to the credit of originating the communication between the waters of the East and the waters of the West. I will state to the gentleman that that credit belongs to those who first contemplated the construction of a water communication from the Mohawk river to Wood creek, which was the pioneer of the great enterprise which DeWitt Clinton led when the Erie canal was constructed. It dates back far beyond the period to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The gentleman has not informed us who those parties were. In the act which authorized the building of the Erie canal one of the reasons, purposes, and objects of the work was, as set forth in the preamble, to enable the commerce of the West to reach the markets of the East. It was in the interest of the whole country, and not in the exclusive interest of the State of New York, that this great work was conceived and carried out.

Mr. SYPHER. Will the gentleman permit me to make a single suggestion, which is directly in the line of his argument? The products of the West are now shipped to New York via New Orleans, and at from ten to twenty-five cents less per bushel on grain than the cost of transportation overland by rail.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It is sufficient for me to say, in answer to that suggestion, that I am not talking about railroads. I am talking about a means of communication infinitely cheaper than railroads and infinitely cheaper than the communication by the Mississippi river. There are natural obstacles connected with the navigation of that river which render it perhaps impossible that it shall ever become the great highway for the commerce of the West to the city of New York and thence to Europe. The State of New York built this canal within about seven years from the time of its commencement. The charges for transporting upon it per one hundred pounds from Albany to Buffalo were, for the first four years, forty-nine cents tolls and forty-five cents freight. The State has enlarged this canal; and the charges have been reduced in such a proportion as to facilitate, in the very highest degree, the transmission of the western produce to the eastern markets, and at the least possible cost. What are those charges to-day? Why, sir, on one hundred pounds the tolls are six cents and the freight six cents—a reduction equal to eighty-eight per cent. on tolls and eighty-seven per cent. on freight. It is a fact known to every man who has any knowledge of this commerce passing from East to West that the State of New York has reduced the tolls on the canals, and consequently the freights, just as fast as it could do so without levying taxes upon her people to pay for their construction and maintenance.

There is another fact of the utmost importance. These tolls are not subject to the fluctuations of supply and demand. They are established every spring, when canal navigation opens, and remain the same throughout the whole season. Upon the lakes there are times in the fall when the freights are fourfold what they are in the summer, the differences being caused by the law of supply and demand. But the State of New York, appreciating the importance of these canals to the whole country, has never taken advantage of the pressure of business to make an increase of the rates of tolls.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to make a single suggestion with reference to this matter of tolls on the Erie canal. I understand that the report of the auditor of the State of New York shows that this Erie canal has paid into the treasury of the State $15,000,000 over and above the entire cost of the canal, including the interest upon all the money invested and all the expenditures by the State for repairs.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I say that the gentleman is mistaken on that point. This allegation that the State of New York has been making money out of this canal is a matter to which I was just coming. It was built, as I have already said, with direct reference to the commerce outside of the State; and the lateral canals which have been constructed have been built for precisely the same purpose. The Erie and Oswego canal takes the trade of the West; the Chemung canal takes the trade of Pennsylvania; the Champlain canal takes the trade of New England and Canada. The whole canal debt is now only $10,000,000; and there has never been a dollar of the proceeds appropriated except to pay the debts incurred in constructing and keeping in repair the canals. The tolls have from time to time been reduced in accordance with what from the beginning of these canals down to the present time has been the avowed policy of the State and of its leading men. Why, sir, in the New York constitutional convention of 1867 the policy with reference to our canals was a subject of discussion, and every prominent leading man of the convention expressed himself in favor of making the canals, as soon as the tolls had paid this balance of $10,000,000, free, with the single exception of levying sufficient tolls to pay for repairs and superintendence.

This has been the policy of the State from

SENATE.

Miss Sue Murphey—Mr. Fowler.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

the beginning, and is now its policy; and I ask my friends here, and I ask all the Representatives of this great nation, if we are to expend money, whether it is not far better that we should do it in the same way in which it has been done in all like enterprises in this country up to the present time; that is, to let the appropriation be made to the State, and the work be done through its instrumentalities, under the condition that the State shall pledge, before it receives a dollar of money, that upon the repayment of the cost of these canals they shall thereafter be forever free to the commerce of the world.

Mr. Speaker, instead of this Niagara ship-canal being a work which the commercial men of this country are in favor of, the fact is quite the contrary; the men who put through the bill in the Thirty-Ninth Congress found that it was utterly impossible to get anybody to invest their private funds in this speculation, dollar for dollar, with the Government. I say that fact furnishes the best evidence that the commercial men of the country do not regard this as the way in which the commerce of the West, which has become of national importance, is to be benefited or advanced. But, sir, I have other evidence. I have before me the memorial of the national ship-canal convention, held at Chicago in 1863, and I wish this House to hear the conclusion to which these merchants and statesmen arrived. This memorial was published by the order of that convention, and I think my friend from Illinois [Mr. Judd] was a member of that convention.

Mr. JUDD. I was not in the country at the time.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I know if he had been in the country he would have been in this convention and one of its most distinguished members, and would have fully concurred in that memorial I have no doubt. I will read an extract from it:

"The configuration of the North American continent presents the most remarkable adaptation to internal commerce of any portion of the globe. The great interior basin drained by the Mississippi and its tributaries, with ten thousand miles of steamboat navigation; the lakes, with their shore lines of five thousand miles, and with more than ninety thousand square miles of surface; these great Mediterranean seas of the New World can be connected with the great river of the West by a steamboat and ship-canal only thirty-six miles long. The outlet to the Atlantic by the East is equally remarkable with that of the South, and equally favorable to the commercial development and unity of our country. The arm of Almighty God cut down the barriers of the Alleghenies, and ordained that the ocean tides should flow through the highland passes of these mountains. The broad Hudson, stretching away northerly toward the lakes, pointed to the sagacious statesman of New York the pathway to empire. The genius of De Witt Clinton, quick to catch the clear intimation, consummated what nature had so nearly completed and opened the way by the New York canals from the Atlantic to the lakes. Illinois, by the aid of the Federal Government, followed, completing the water-channel from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, and now we have only to follow the finger of God as interpreted by Clinton and consummate what is so nearly done, and we have an East and West Mississippi from the Missouri to the Atlantic."

The idea of building this Niagara ship-canal seems to be to get from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario. Our effort should rather be to open up all our avenues of trade, so that whatever commerce shall find its way into either of these lakes can pass with the least possible expense to the commercial center of the country, the city of New York, soon to be the center of the commerce and finance of the world.

Therefore it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if we are to engage in an enterprise of this character, it should be the one suggested in the substitute which I have offered for this bill. It appeals to every interest which should actuate conscientious men representing the people in an economical administration of the Government.

Now, sir, as to the question whether we are in a condition to appropriate this money at this time I want to say a word; but before doing so, let me state that I am opposed to the Federal Government engaging in works of internal improvement, such as building railroads and canals. These works should be left to the States, with such aid as the Federal Government may see fit to give. I believe that our unparalleled increase in wealth and population is because we have recognized as a controlling principle that each State must attend to these matters for itself. The States can provide for these works by incorporating companies or otherwise much cheaper and better than the Federal Government had it the constitutional power. The canals and railroads already built throughout the country in this way furnish the best evidence of the truth of this position; and the future prosperity, greatness, and power of this country depend, in my judgment, more upon a strict adherence to this principle than anything else.

Mr. Speaker, will the condition of the national finances at this time permit us to make the appropriation required by this bill? Upon this subject I am happy to be able to quote the opinions of gentlemen much better acquainted with finances in general, and especially the financial condition of the national Treasury, than I am. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] when the bill appropriating $6,000,000 for the improvement of rivers and harbors was before this House at the last session, said:

"Sir, if we upon this side of the House are to stand upon anything as to the policy upon which we propose to go into the next campaign it is upon economy of administration. We have only this floor to show that desire. The Executive Departments of the Government, which substantially control the administration of the finances, are not within our reach or within our control; and the people must look here upon this floor as the only place where we, as a party, can exhibit the principles upon which we stand. If, then, we vote away at this time six or eight million dollars let me say to you that the people will say, 'With our taxes we cannot afford to make the experiment,' and for this reason: without arguing the question as to whether these expenses are necessary or are promising great results or not, I say we are in no condition to meet these expenditures. You might as well ask one of the mill-owners of my State, who is so far in debt that his mill is mortgaged and he cannot get production to meet his expenditures, to go into great expenditure to improve his property and render it more productive at this moment. Wait until we are able, until we are able as a people, then I will vote for this and other expenditures of a like character."

I hope the gentleman will give this House his present views upon the question of economy. I want to know if he thinks, or this House thinks, that our present financial condition has so much improved in the past five months that we can afford to give $12,000,000 for the purpose of inaugurating a speculative scheme like this, while then we could not afford to appropriate $3,000,000 to improve all the harbors and rivers throughout the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAINE obtained the floor.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I ask the gentleman to allow me five minutes more.

Mr. PAINE. I yield five minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Sir, I hope this House will heed the words of that gentleman and that he has not forgotten them.

The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] also opposed that appropriation. He used language equally as strong as the gentleman from Massachusetts. But, Mr. Speaker, it was unnecessary for those gentlemen to use such language for the purpose of showing that this country is in a condition not at all fitted for the expenditure of money upon any scheme of this kind. Millions upon millions of debt is now resting upon the people. They are beginning to feel the burden, and will continue to for many years to come.

In view of these facts, in view of the condition of the finances of the country, in view of the burden of taxation that is pressing upon the people, I appeal to members of the House to pause before they sanction a scheme like this, a scheme which as I have already said, is merely the forerunner of others of like character.

Miss Sue Murphey.

SPEECH OF HON. J. S. FOWLER, OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

January 11, 1869.

The Senate having under consideration the bill (S. No. 625) for the relief of Miss Sue Murphey, of Decatur, Alabama—

Mr. FOWLER said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: Personally I have no interest whatever in this claim; politically, I do not care which way it is decided; still I have my views in regard to the justice and propriety of it. The case is simply this: an officer of the war of 1812, who served his country faithfully, and saved a small amount of means from his scanty earnings, purchased a small estate for his family, which he left at his death in their hands, supposing, of course, that he left them and the estate in the care of his country. The rebellion came and swept over that section of the country, and it became necessary for the officers of the United States to take the home of the two children of this officer for the purpose of erecting a fort upon it. These are the facts so far as the parties are concerned. It was taken in the nature of a contract. The land and house were valued. A fort was built under the express direction of the officer who had command of that place, and the building materials were appropriated by him. He says himself that the value of the property was fully equal to the amount claimed. The question now is whether this claimant shall receive pay or not. This property was taken in 1864.

First, let me say a word in regard to the condition of the country at the time. In 1861 the line of the rebellion extended from, perhaps, the Missouri river to Columbus, Kentucky, through the southern part of Kentucky to the Alleghany mountains, and then north-east to the Potomac river and on to the Atlantic ocean. As early as April, 1862, General Grant had penetrated to Shiloh, and had defeated the rebel army at that place. Halleck soon afterward took Corinth, and the actual line of the enemy had receded from the line already given to southern Arkansas and from that to Corinth and east through northern Alabama to the Alleghany mountains, and nearly all of Tennessee, Arkansas, and Kentucky had been restored to the command of the United States. That was in 1862. Practically no portion of this territory was ever afterward in the hands of the rebels except for a very short time, and, so far as the practical question is concerned, it was no more rebel territory than was the State of Ohio or the State of Indiana when John Morgan made his raid into those States. Practically the rebels were excluded from every portion of this territory at that time, so that, technically only, it may be considered as enemy's territory; and I shall call the attention of the Senate hereafter particularly to this point. I will admit for the sake of the argument, although I do not believe it, that the claimant here may have been technically an enemy. Now, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to these two facts, that those who have opposed this claim oppose it on the ground that this country was technically enemy's country, and that this claimant was technically a public enemy.

There were created during the war two classes of claims. The one class of claims originated from the necessity of the times. The Government was forced to put its bonds in the market, which were sold at a ruinous rate, and the bondholder obtained a bond, as a general rule, for double the amount that he paid to the Government, and six per cent. interest in gold on the entire sum. The sum that those bondholders claim from the Government amounts to something like twenty-five hundred million dollars. I admit, of course, that the Government needed this money, and that it was in some cases properly expended; but perhaps more than one third of it went to the benefit of speculators and contractors, and those who had the opportunity of selling the bonds in the market. We admit, of course, that we received their money, and I hope the Government may pay every dollar of it. There was another class of claims in the South. When the Army undertook to levy contributions on the people declared in insurrection, they received from the inhabitants large amounts of provisions and military stores which enabled the armies to complete the object for which they had been sent into that country. This class of damages, according to the report of the Secretary of War, amounted last year to about eighteen million dollars. All the claims from the entire southern States that had been preferred did not exceed $18,000,000. I am very confident that the whole sum will not at any time exceed $30,000,000. It is really remarkable, when you come to estimate the quantity of provisions supplied by these people, how small the amount of claims is. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] who, I believe, is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, to a statement, in his speech in the other House, made by Colonel Hawkins of my State, who was the son of a soldier of the war of 1812, himself a soldier of the war with Mexico, and who, when the rebellion broke out, left his home, sought our lines, and afterward raised a regiment of men, fought gallantly during the war, was taken prisoner and placed under the fire of our own guns in the city of Charleston for several weeks. He states that he has seen six thousand Federal troops fed at one place for two days, without any pay being asked and without any receipts being given for the amount received. The reason why I call the attention of the Military Committee to his name is because he was nominated here for a brevet last year, and that nomination slumbered in the Military Committee. Was it because he was technically a public enemy that his nomination remained there, and that his claims to recognition were allowed to sleep?

I wish to call attention to the fact that these quartermasters' claims have been paid by the Government under the law of July 4, 1864. Under that law the quartermaster's department and commissary department have continued to pay them whenever the proper proof has been furnished to them.

The two classes of claims rest upon precisely the same basis. The Government obtained from those in insurrectionary districts quartermaster supplies and commissary stores, and also the use of real estate, which were as essential and necessary for the purposes of the Government as the money which was obtained in the North and in Europe. Both were obtained for the same purpose and were applied to the same purpose, and the claims of both, in my judgment, rest upon the same ground as to the obligation upon the part of the Government to pay them. I think they rest upon the same basis and that both sets of claimants have the same right in law and equity to be paid, and both ought to be paid.

It is but reasonable that the claimants for whom I am now speaking should be paid. Why not? The objection to the fulfillment of this constitutional obligation, as I understand, rests upon this ground, and this ground alone, that the claimant was technically a public enemy, and that this section of the country was technically enemy's country. Every argument that has been adduced by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] whose argument has covered all the grounds of those opposed to the bill, has been based on the decision of the Chief Justice in Mrs. Alexander's cotton case, in 2 Wallace, 419:

"Being enemy's property, the cotton was liable to capture and confiscation by the adverse party. (Price Cases, 2 Black, 687.) It is true that this rule, as to property on land, has received very important qualifications from usage, from the reasonings of enlightened publicists, and from judicial decisions. It may now be regarded as substantially restricted 'to special cases dictated by the necessary operation of the war,' (1 Kent, 92,) and as excluding in general 'thesezure of the private property of pacific persons for the sake of gain.' (Id., 93.) The commanding general may determine in what special cases its more stringent application is required by military emergencies; while considerations of public policy and positive provisions of law, and the general spirit of legislation must indicate the cases in which its application may be properly denied to the property of non-combatant enemies."

What are we to understand by the doctrine advanced in the prize cases concerning enemies' property and public enemies?

It is manifest that the court intended nothing more than was embraced in their decision of the cases in question. All the cases were of ships seized on the high seas while attempting to run the blockade contrary to the proclamation of the President. There is no controversy as to the character of these vessels and their cargoes. What was said by the court applied wholly to the case before them, and not to the status of the citizens of the several States.

The rule adopted in these celebrated cases would never apply to the property of citizens seized on land of a very different character. This class of property could only be confiscated by the authority of the nation. No opinions of publicists and no practice of nations relative to property on the high seas has any reference to real estate. This is the limit of the use made of the terms public enemy and enemy property.

The Chief Justice in the Alexander cotton case referred to the prize cases. But it is very evident that he applied his own sentiments of justice and his enlarged understanding to the solution of the case. He makes the distinction clearly between property seized on the high seas and property taken on land. The general opinions of the court in the prize cases in such cases can never be safely applied to the proper adjudication of property seized on land.

The decision in the prize cases rested on public law, that of the case in question on statute law. It was not subjected to the rules adopted in courts of admiralty for the condemnation of property admitted to be the subject of seizure because it is enemy property, and because it may be and is made use of by the enemy to furnish him the sinews of war. To cripple his resources becomes a matter of the first importance, and is, therefore, resorted to. The rule, however, even in this case is a harsh one, and unworthy of the sanction of a just and honorable people.

In proof of this view of the case I refer to the opinions of Chancellor Kent, who says:

"Vattel condemns very strongly the spoliation of a country without palpable necessity; and he speaks with just indignation of the burning of the Palatinate by Turenne, under the cruel instructions of Louis XIV. The general usage now is not to touch private property upon land without making compensation unless in special cases, dictated by the necessary operations of war, or when captured in places carried by storm, and which repelled all the overtures for a capitulation. Contributions are sometimes levied upon a conquered country, in lieu of confiscation of property, and as some indemnity for the expenses of maintaining order and affording protection. If the conqueror goes beyond these limits wantonly, or when it is not clearly indispensable to the just purposes of war, and seizes private property of pacific persons for the sake of gain, and destroys private dwellings, or public edifices devoted to civil purposes only, or makes war upon monuments of art and models of taste, he violates the modern usages of war, and is sure to meet with indignant resentment, and to be held up to the general scorn and detestation of the world."

It was upon such a rule as that laid down by Chancellor Kent that the Chief Justice was guided in his more liberal and enlightened views. The same spirit of humanity and liberality is shown by Mr. Wheaton in the following summary of the progress of the customs of nations on the rights of enemies over property, part four, page 597:

"In ancient times both the movable and immovable property of the vanquished passed to the conqueror. Such was the Roman law of war, often asserted with unrelenting severity; and such was the fate of the Roman provinces subdued by Northern barbarians on the decline and fall of the western empire. A large portion—from one third to two thirds—of the lands belonging to the vanquished provincials was confiscated, and partitioned among their conquerors. The last example in Europe of such a conquest was that of England by William of Normandy. Since that period among the civilized nations of Christendom, conquest, even when confirmed by treaty of peace, has been followed by no general or partial transmutation of landed property. The property belonging to the Government of the vanquished nation passes to the victorious State, which also takes the place of the former sovereign in regard to eminent domain. In other respects, private rights are unaffected by conquest."

The conquest of England and the apportionment of the lands among the soldiers of the victorious leader was the last application of the terrific rule of national law advocated by the Senator from New Jersey. Then ensued a reign of tyranny the like of which never before or since has been witnessed for duration and cruelty. It is the rule of the highwayman, stand and deliver. It arose in an age when it was lawful to kill your enemy in battle and spoil him of his goods or lead him, his wife, and children into slavery. It is a rule worthy of the days when the captive enemies made sport for a Roman audience in the arena of the amphitheater amid the ferocious monsters of Africa that were dragged from their distant retreats to devour their human victims. It is a rule ever "more honored in the breach than in the observance," now tolerable only among nations destitute of either conscience or humanity. The rule of Christian civilization is to respect the private property on land. That the decisions in the prize cases are not free from grave objections in reference to the reasoning outside of the actual question before the court I will call the attention of the Senate to the remarks of Judge Sprague in the Law Reporter.

It is unfortunate for the cause of the country that the cases were decided during the heat of battle, when the minds of men were unsettled by passion, when every energy was directed to the immediate purpose of saving the Union in its then terrible condition. The whole country was intent on the present. The future was dark and uncertain and of no consequence at the time. The idea of subordinating action to the future good of the country did not enter largely into the calculations of men. The court took no care to limit their opinions to the simple decision of the case, but gave color to the idea that in their sweeping generalities they intended to embrace property on sea and land in the same category. This was neither right nor intended:

"An objection to the prize decisions of the district court has arisen from an apprehension of radical consequences. It has been supposed that if the Government have the rights of a belligerent, then, after the rebellion is suppressed, it will have the rights of conquest; that a State and its inhabitants may be permanently divested of all political privileges and treated as foreign territory acquired by arms. This is an error, a grave and dangerous error. Belligerent rights cannot be exercised when there are no belligerents. Conquest of a foreign country gives absolute and unlimited sovereign rights. But no nation ever makes such a conquest of its own territory. If a hostile power, either from without or within a nation, takes possession and holds absolute dominion over any portion of its territory, and the nation by force of arms expels or overthrows the enemy and suppresses hostilities, it acquires no new title, but merely regains the possession of which it had been temporarily deprived. The nation acquires no new sovereignty, but merely maintains its previous rights."—Law Reporter, June, 1862, case of the Amey Warwick.

When the flag of the nation made its appearance in Alabama, the authority of her laws was reestablished. The insurrection did not destroy the rightful authority of the Constitution, nor change in any respect the rights and obligations of the citizens. It suspended for a time the peaceful execution, and for a time obscured the light of our political sun; but like the national sun when the clouds pass away it shed over the whole land its life-giving and protecting rays when the insurgents gave place to the national soldier.

No new laws, no new form of government,

SENATE.

Miss Sue Murphey—Mr. Fowler.

no new authorities or rights sprung up; the same republican Government came back to its faithful friends, and covered them again with its protecting ægis. The laws of nations no more supplanted the Constitution than the moon in its transit over the disc of the sun supplants or mars the power and functions of that luminary.

Mr. Phillimore says:

"The United States, by their inferior courts, have decided that when a conquered territory is repossessed by its former sovereign, private individuals acquire a right to all property that belonged to them before it was taken by the conqueror."—2 Bay, 255.

This doctrine of constructive treason or enemy property would sweep away all rights, and reduce the people to a degradation worse than slavery.

Confining our attention to public law, and under the direct operation of the rules of war, we have a definite and well-established one applied to the question under consideration. The regenerating principles of Christian civilization have mitigated the asperities of war and rendered men under its awful ordeal humane toward those whom stern duty commands them to fight. Soldiers are not the less men because the ill-advised counsels of princes place them in conflict. So decided are the opinions of publicists on this question that Vattel lays down the following rule for the payment of property taken by the Government:

"The damages under consideration are to be distinguished into two kinds: those done by the State itself or the sovereign, and those done by the enemy. Of the first kind some are done deliberately and by way of precaution, as when a field, a house, or a garden belonging to a private person is taken for the purpose of erecting on the spot a town, rampart, or any other piece of fortification, or when his standing corn or his storehouses are destroyed, to prevent their being of use to the enemy. Such damages are to be made good to the individual, who should bear only his quota of the loss, (181). But there are other damages caused by inevitable necessity, as, for instance, the destruction caused by the artillery in retaking a town from the enemy."

The bill reported by the committee is based upon the admitted loyalty of the claimant. There is no question raised by them on the ground that there has been any failure on her part to maintain her faith inviolable with the Government. Her duty has been constant and complete.

How stands the case with the Government? The insurgents take possession of the government of the State; they overrun the country with their armed soldiers; they enforce compliance; they silence all opposition; not an officer of the nation appears; not a marshal, not a soldier, not a vestige of Federal authority is left. The people are taxed for a cause they detest; they are forced into the army and navy of a pretended Power. Their most sacred rights and dearest interests are trodden in the dust. Who, now, is to be censured? Has the long-delayed action of the Government to preserve its faith given it new and unknown powers over the neglected and ruined citizen? Has its timid action released it from its solemn constitutional duties? Has war made the nation an irresponsible tyrant, cut loose its constitutional restraints and obligations? Has it divested the citizen of any right with which he has been endowed by nature, and which the nation was formed to guard? Even the general laws of nations hold in check the conduct of men, and forbid either cruelty or pillage. The generous and magnanimous barbarian respects the rights of his brave foe, and would scorn to assail his friends and allies and rob them of their property.

What can be said of a nation's right to thus violate her admitted duties? If there be a distinction in actions there can be no mistaking the relation of these parties. Each must fulfill its specified and written duty. The nation must have resources. It can take them on one condition from its own faithful citizens. That condition is fundamental and constantly obligatory.

There is a solemn compact between society and the individual that he shall retain and use his property for his own happiness so long as he discharges his duties to it. Society promises protection for his property, so long as he shall observe the conditions affixed to the tenure. All civilized States have "prescribed the conditions under which property shall be held, aliened, transmitted, or forfeited." "No condition of enjoyment, no cause of forfeiture which they have not specified can be presumed to exist. An extraordinary discretion to resume or take away the thing without any personal fault of the proprietor is inconsistent with the notion of property." It is contrary to all reason and common sense to divest him of a right which the State was ordained to protect for a cause over which he had no control; and which was acting against his interests, his rights, and his will. In our Government those rights have been carefully guarded, not only by the common law, but by solemn constitutional enactment.

It has been urged that if the property of loyal men must be paid for the property of rebels must likewise. There are no distinctions between one class of citizens and the other within the lines of the enemy. The doctrine of writers on public law and the decisions in the prize cases proclaim all public enemies. The decision in favor of the payment of this case would involve the entire amount of all property taken and destroyed during the war.

If it were true that all are public enemies the distinction could still be made. But it is not true in any sense except so far as it refers to property taken on sea. But Congress has by its legislation made the distinction. By the law of July 17, 1862, all the property of those in rebellion was made confiscable. The property of loyal citizens was protected, and has been in all the acts of Congress and in all the proclamations of the Executive. There is, then, no ground to apprehend any difficulty from this source.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question on that point?

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand the Senator to argue that there is, by reason of the legislation of Congress, a distinction between the loyal and the disloyal. I do not wish to direct his attention to the question whether a statute could be operative against the Constitution, but to draw his attention to this point: the President of the United States has recently put out a proclamation of amnesty to all persons whatever who were engaged in the rebellion. That is more than a pardon, because a pardon must be delivered as a deed; it must be pleaded, and it must be proved, whereas an amnesty is an act of oblivion, and makes all acts of treason as if they had never been. Now, I ask the Senator, if that proclamation begood, whether it does not inevitably from this time forth sweep away all distinctions of the kind he speaks of between the loyal and the disloyal; whether by reason of that at all events they are not washed and become as white as any loyal person can be?

Mr. FOWLER. I will answer the Senator from New York in a moment; but before I do so I should like to ask him a question. It is, whether that proclamation of amnesty would relieve a person in the State of Missouri or the State of Tennessee at this time from disabilities imposed by the State in consequence of the rebellion, and also from those disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. CONKLING. My impression would be that the proclamation falls very far short of the effect which the Senator from Tennessee no doubt would assign to it. If he means to argue that it would not reach those disabilities I should very likely agree with him; and so if he were to say that it falls short of removing disabilities of other kinds. But my question to him was upon the hypothesis that that proclamation is of virtue. If it is of no virtue, of course it takes no effect; but if it is of doubtful virtue, of course the question would suggest itself to the Senate whether we had better anticipate the determination of its effect by acting upon a case like this; because if we hold that this woman, she being loyal, is entitled to recover her damages in this case, then if the proclamation of amnesty is held good, even if there would otherwise be a distinction between the loyal and disloyal, beyond all question traitors are put from this time out on a par with other persons. Indeed, no person could be heard in court to question their loyalty; because, more than a pardon, it is an act of oblivion which relates back and makes as if they had not been all their derelictions against loyalty. It is that question to which I beg to draw the Senator's attention. What the effect will be in that event upon the enactments or provisions of States within States I am not prepared to say, and should not be without knowing what sort of provisions within States he means to direct my attention to.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from New York entertains the opinion I was about to express. A proclamation of amnesty is a general pardon, which relieves all persons embraced in it. It differs in this respect from the special pardon, which must be delivered to the person. It can extend only to relieve the individual from the penalties inflicted for the crime he has committed, as treason or otherwise. It may be plead in bar of any action that may be had against him on account of that crime for which he has been pardoned. It could not restore him to his former status if there were any disability imposed upon him either by the State or the nation. The disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution, or by the constitutions of the States of Tennessee and Missouri, would not be affected by an amnesty or a pardon. It does not wipe out all the past and make the present as if the past had never been, only so far as the penalties prescribed in preëxisting laws are concerned. I come now to another and a much higher consideration of the subject: the moral obligation resting upon the nation to preserve good faith. So important is this in despotic Governments that the idea of bad faith on the part of the prince is not tolerated. No more can he do wrong than the divinity he is supposed to represent. The importance of preserving unstained the faith of the sovereign is so great that the standing maxim, "the king can do no wrong," cannot in thought be violated. It is no less important, indeed, it is far more important, to preserve the faith of the Republic free from the appearance of evil. The one reposes on power as well as justice; it addresses itself to the fears, not alone to the wisdom of its subjects. The other commends itself to the wisdom, virtue, and conscience of the people. Its dignity and power reside in its excellence alone.

There are in the hearts of all men distinctions in actions. Some are approved, others disapproved. These distinctions are fundamental, and no power can change them or our innate sense of their character.

The relation of the citizen to the State is one recognized and admitted in the hearts of all men, the humblest as well as the most exalted. It is as clear as the relative duties of parent and child. The one renders obedience and faith for protection and happiness in the enjoyment of his God-given rights. This relation no mortal or immortal power can destroy with impunity. Sever it once, and then look for the end of your civil institutions. Among the infeasible rights of men that of using and enjoying the proceeds of his own labor is undeniable. Property of all kinds is the representative of his toil, which he treasures up for the support of his hours of decline or for the enjoyment of his children, dearer far than life. The Government that violates its faith in respect to the citizen's property sets at naught all law human and divine. In the consideration of this question faith is everything. It has led the nation to its present position of power and usefulness. It has carried it successfully over every obstacle in its triumphant history. The people will not now abandon it for the sake of a few millions of dollars. The Government cannot afford to turn bandit for many thousand millions. It cannot say there is no distinction between right and wrong, between innocence and crime. To take the property of a faithful citizen without just compensation is a crime compared with which robbery sinks into insignificance. The more obscure and helpless the citizen the more heinous and fatal is the crime of the nation.

I stated that it had been the policy of the Government always to respect those who were loyal and to pay, or at least promise to pay, them for their property used or destroyed during the insurrection, and I will call your attention to the wishes of General Washington expressed in his first message after the whisky insurrection in Pennsylvania, in regard to this very question:

"Among the discussions which may arise from this aspect of our affairs, and from the documents which will be submitted to Congress, it will not escape your observation that not only the inspector of the revenue but other officers of the United States in Pennsylvania have, from their fidelity in the discharge of their functions, sustained material injuries to their property. The obligation and policy of indemnifying them are strong and obvious. It may also merit attention whether policy will not enlarge this provision to the retribution of other citizens who, though not under the ties of office, may have suffered damages by their generous exertions for upholding the Constitution and the laws. The amount, even if all the injured were included, would not be great; and on future emergencies the Government would be amply repaid by the influence of an example that he who incurs a loss in its defense shall find a recompense in its liberality."

It appears to me, so far as these States and their people are concerned, that if the whole question of right and of law were set aside the policy of the measure is sufficient alone to recommend this claim to the respectful consideration of Congress. A liberal policy would convince them that the Government of the United States was a Government such as they had supposed it to be; that when it had plighted its faith it would not violate it; that they might rely upon the faith they had always reposed in the Government established by the Constitution framed by our fathers and on which they had always relied for their protection and for their rights. Mr. Lincoln, when he issued his proclamation of 22d September, 1862, solemnly promised—

"That the Executive would in due time recommend that all citizens of the United States who shall have remained loyal thereto throughout the rebellion shall, upon the restoration of the constitutional relations between the United States and the respective States, be compensated for all losses by acts of the United States, including the loss of slaves."

He states distinctly in that proclamation that he will recommend to Congress that loyal persons be paid for all losses by acts of the United States, including even the loss of slaves. This doctrine was maintained, according to my recollection, in all the proclamations he issued relating to the subject. In my judgment the distinguished judge who delivered the opinion in the case of Mrs. Alexander's cotton gave sanction to the doctrine which I maintain here, that claims for property taken and appropriated by the Government should be paid for, unless the owner were disloyal; and then of course he is deprived of the opportunity of making his claim good by statute law, not by the authority of any writer or public law in modern times. You could not even then, by any decision of the Supreme Court, find any sanction for confiscating rebel property by the authority of a military commander.

Perhaps my own State is more interested in this question than any other, and for this reason: we had forty thousand soldiers in the armies of the United States, and while they were from home the Federal troops in Tennessee subsisted for a long time off our people. A large amount of supplies were obtained from the families of those very soldiers, so that they were themselves deprived of the means of living. The women and children went into the fields and cultivated the soil while the soldiers were in the Army. These privations and self-sacrifices do not affect the law of the case, provided they are to be regarded in fact and in morals as public enemies. Upon such a miserable technicality as that of a public enemy as understood in national law no gambler would seek to strip his victim of his money. What is there in this disgraceful pretext that preserves even the appearance of truth? What an insult to common decency to call such men as the soldiers of the Union Army from Tennessee, Alabama, and Arkansas public enemies; with what anguish and sorrow the children of those who died that their country might live, as they deck the graves of their heroic fathers upon each returning spring, will recall the heartless Congress that proclaimed all that was honored and dear to them on earth worse than traitors; for they become twice traitors: once traitors to friends and neighbors, to fight for home and country, then to be registered traitors by that country for which their life's blood was poured out as an honored libation would be a deplorable record for fidelity.

The Government has uniformly acted on the principle that no distinction should be made between the loyal citizens South and North. The act of July 4, 1864, was extended February 19, 1867, to the States of Tennessee and West Virginia. Since that period claims from these States have been regularly paid at the quartermaster's and commissary departments.

Government did not refuse to pay the southern soldier for his services. How, then, can it refuse to pay for his property that has been taken and used? The corn, hay, wagons, horses, and houses are the representatives of the soldier's labor. His services in the Army are nothing else. How do you become obliged to pay for the one and not the other? Is it quite reasonable that you are bound to pay him for service in the Army and when you take his labor in the form of quartermaster's or commissary stores you are relieved from any such obligation? No; it has ever been the custom of this nation to pay its citizens for their property, not to rob them.

Two classes of claims have been considered, those of the bondholders and money-changers for bonds purchased at ruinous rates, and those of the loyal South for property taken as a forced loan. Reject the latter because these people have been proclaimed falsely public enemies, and you will not command one vote from the Delaware bay to the Rio Grande in favor of paying the bonds. There will then be found no human being so degraded as to become the slave of the bondholder. You will have set at naught the nation's faith and honor, and who so mean as to do it reverence will be found in all that sad and blasted country? When a mere geographical line shall make an end of right and wrong, of patriotism and treason, there can be no love, no duty, no honor, no faith in such a Government. The Union soldier will scorn to fight the battles of a land that proclaims him infamous. The confederate soldier will toil with reluctance to pay a debt that he hates.

Notwithstanding that he has fought against his old flag long and bravely he has not therefore become insensible to faith and duty. He will never admit the right of the nation to repudiate its honest obligations and dishonor its own citizens. Sad as it may be for him to pay the bonds that overthrew his cause, he will love as ever to serve a country that preserves unstained its promised faith. Animated with a heroism that led him, although unpaid and unfed, to achieve such success, that the world stood astonished, he will in the future as in the past follow with a devoted heart the march of his country's glory. From the South no step will be taken to sully her fame or stain her history.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] has presented, as his most polished and effective argument, the following against this claim: if this lady were loyal to the United States she was an enemy to the confederacy. If she was an enemy to the confederacy her property was liable to confiscation, and therefore worth nothing. The Government should not be required to pay for that which was of no value. I apprehend that a soldier who had fought through the rebellion, and upon returning to his home should find it leveled to the ground and used by the Government, his family turned out to the storm, would find but little difficulty in solving such a fallacy without the aid of logical rules. In the whole range of the debate there has been no argument so well constructed, and I must say so creditable to the genius and even the morals of the opponents of loyal claimants from the South.

The honorable Senator from New Hampshire stated that loyal citizens from New Orleans and Mobile had been refused payment at the War Department for property seized and used by the Army during the war. This fact has been adduced to prove that all such claims have been rejected.

I know of two claims that were paid for houses seized and used for forts in Tennessee under circumstances similar to those under which Miss Murphey's was taken. These were both fine houses. The one cost the Government about thirty-eight thousand dollars, the other twenty-nine thousand. I give the amounts in round numbers. The actual sum cannot vary far from these figures. I am not aware that this account was ever preferred to the Department.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to inquire of the Senator where that property was situated?

Mr. FOWLER. The property was situated in Nashville, Tennessee. One of the houses was taken during General Buell's term of service, the other by General Rosecrans, who appointed a commission to assess the value of the property. This was done, the house removed and used, the fort built, and the owner received his pay. The other house was paid for on the award of a commission appointed by the Secretary of War, at the head of which was General Canby.

One argument of a most singular character has been advanced: that it is not the business of the national sovereignty to protect the interests of the individuals. The protection of private rights belongs to the States and not to the sovereign power, which is alone concerned with the general interests of the nation and with the relation of the States.

The object of the Federal Government is better set forth in the preamble to the Constitution than in any other part. Its framers undertook to express the purpose for which it was founded. They said their purpose was "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and posterity." This was not between the States alone, but also among the people individually and personally.

They had tried already a Government of States, operating alone on States and dependent on their legislation, and it had most signally failed. They now formed a Government of their own, for the purposes set forth in the Constitution, which they gave it, to act on the citizens directly, and upon the States indirectly. The primary and fundamental element of the Federal Government is its direct interest in the personal welfare of the individual. It is the forum in which the whole people individually and collectively appear for the enforcement of their rights or the redress of their wrongs.

The General Government is no sovereignty in the sense of that term as used in the books. That idea has been derived from nations that vainly believed that their prince derived his authority from the Deity, whose representative he was. There the citizen is subordinate to the State, and derives all his privileges from it. In them are no rights but those of the sovereign. The citizen has privileges, not rights. This doctrine has been greatly modified until, through successive efforts of the more advanced peoples, it has vanished into a brighter hope and holier faith in humanity.

It is the glory of the American people that they had learned the nature, worth, and dignity of the individual, and embodied their faith in their political institutions. Here the individual is the prince and is endowed with rights from his Creator. In forming his institutions he created an agent and clothed it with certain specified and limited privileges. To that agent he gave a power of attorney which he called a Constitution. Beyond the clear and expressed meaning of its terms that agency has no power to go. Absolute compliance within the spirit and letter of the document is demanded. This agency was created to guard his rights and to execute his will.

The term sovereignty does not apply to our institutions in the sense of the writers on public law, and as derived from old and different institutions which typify a different order of thought and an antagonistic civilization. The authority of the Government is a divided one. The local State governments are more immediately charged with local and sectional interests, general and personal, so far as that limited territory is concerned. To it there is due full and ample allegiance within the sphere of its action and in the discharge of its admitted authorities and privileges, which are subordinate to and within the limits of the rightful authorities of the Federal Government. The citizen owes a double allegiance or obligation, not in conflict but in strict harmony with each other. This allegiance is based upon the unchangeable condition of protection and compliance with the delegated authority of the State and national Governments. The failure to fulfill the condition relieves the citizen from any culpability for yielding to a power he could not resist when deserted by his own admitted Government, and for yielding a certain allegiance to the usurper. Such conduct on the part of the citizen under such circumstances does not impair his allegiance to his own Government, and when it resumes again its authority it must respect the rights and conduct of its citizens. It could not fail to regard him as having acted within the line of duty, provided always that he acted in good faith to his own Government and complied only from force. Such conduct must entitle him to the full measure of his rights as a citizen.

As the people who formed the Government gave it no authority to divest a citizen of his personal rights and guarantees without a fair trial for an admitted and legal crime, it could by no means seize and appropriate his property unless upon the condition set forth in its power of attorney; and that is, no "private property shall be taken for public use without just compensation." The Government may seize the property and use it. It has that privilege conceded; but the condition to its taking is imperative—it must pay for it. Taking property by the Government is only relieved from highway robbery by a strict and generous compliance with the constitutional condition under which it may be taken.

Society has authorized the Government to seize and confiscate the property of a traitor or an enemy. Even this must be condemned according to law. It cannot be taken at the beck of a military chief under the wretched pretext that war sanctifies all villainy and crime; much less can it tolerate outrages against loyal and unprotected citizens.

There never prowled over land a bandit gang or roamed over the ocean a pirate crew that had not a better pretext for their rapine than the miserable doctrine of "public enemy" that has been applied to the loyal men and women of the South, to defraud them of their rights and to stain their memories for coming ages. In every battle for the nation's honor, glory, and life they have shed their blood freely and grandly. In this the last great struggle for its independence and integrity, they have kept their faith and discharged their duties to the utmost limit of the letter and spirit. To deny them justice because some forgotten publicist under different ages and a different form of government was guided by different ideas and a different religion is the climax of stupidity and villainy.

Nor can I agree with those who maintain that the States committed treason, and are therefore punishable with death. States are but corporations, and have only an ideal being, and can do nothing that partakes of the character of crime. It is only a human being that can do right or perpetrate crime. Right and wrong are only predicable of the actual person, not the figurative. The Union will, I trust, be perpetual in all its elements. From it no one can fall for an instant without destruction of the whole. It is the citizen alone in his personal responsibility that must stand or fall by his conduct. The State is but the expression of the citizens' will in its action. To admit for a moment the power of the State to remove itself or its citizens from their rightful relations to the Union is to proclaim the dissolution of the Government. No more can a member of the Union be severed from its place and live, or be restored, than can a limb be severed from the body and not perish.

I deprecate a recurrence to the memories of this fearful struggle. The glowing description of the Senator from New Jersey of the ravages in the valley of Virginia reminded me of Mr. Burke's terrible description of Hyder Ali's march through the Carnatic. It was but little less thorough, and equally opposed to the more enlightened laws of modern warfare. Nothing but unrelenting savage war, maddened by the fury of battle and terrible provocation, can redeem them from the disapproval of a Christian conscience. It was the sad necessity of the time that induced that course.

From such scenes lessons of wisdom may be learned, but they tell us to avoid the causes that tend to inflame the passions and turn loose the furies. They alone are to be dreaded and shunned. They furnish no examples for our imitation. These divinities should be banished as they were by the Romans from the presence of men, and have their abode among the gods of the regions below.

Nor can I envy the sensibilities of the man who derives his rules of justice from the merciless scenes of flagrant, vindictive civil war. Rather learn to treat every section of our common country from the examples furnished by the triumphs of peace. Happily, passion is of short duration. No nation or individual can afford to indulge its rage. It is the benign reign of forgiveness and sympathy that lasts long and grows more beautiful and useful with its increasing years. The people will again learn to forgive and love each other as in the past, all proud of their country and their race.

From this great national drama that has covered the whole land with blood and heaped mountains of debt upon coming generations may we not hope for an adjustment that shall reconcile every section of this vast and bountiful land to the generous and peaceful rule of the Republic? With the overthrow of the only discordant element, human slavery, a reconciliation of all the people upon common principles of mutual love, equal justice, and a generous forbearance will more than compensate for the sublime sacrifices made by both sections. Since peace has returned partisan and sectional prejudice, nurtured under the unhappy auspices of an institution based upon cupidity, pride, and violence, should give place to an enlarged statesmanship that will prove that universal personal liberty is the safeguard of the nation's perpetuity. Let justice and faith have their temples founded in every section and their worship cultivated by every citizen, irrespective of State lines or political associations. Under their benign rule the public faith will be strengthened as the prosperity of the nation is advanced.

State Passenger Taxes.

SPEECH OF HON. O. P. MORTON,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

January 21, 1869.

The Senate having under consideration the bill (S. No. 798) to punish the collection of illegal taxes upon passengers—

Mr. MORTON said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: In order that the character of this bill may be understood, I will begin by referring to the statutes of two States. I will first refer to the law of Maryland, passed in 1832, by which a tax is levied upon passengers between the cities of Baltimore and Washington.

By the eighth section of that act it is provided that "one fifth of the whole amount which may be received for the transportation of passengers on said railroad by said company during the six months last preceding shall be reserved and paid to the treasurer" of the State of Maryland. It is then provided—

"That the charge for conveying each person the whole distance between the cities of Baltimore and Washington shall not be reduced below the maximum of $2 50 hereinbefore established, unless by the consent of the General Assembly."

It is then provided further:

"That in no case shall the amount received by the State from the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, for the conveyance of each person the whole distance between the two cities, be less than twenty-five cents."

The substance of this statute is, first, fixing the rate of passage at $2 50 between the two cities, and providing that one fifth of the passage money shall be paid to the State of Maryland. It then provides that the Legislature may reduce the fare, but that in no case shall there be paid to the State of Maryland less than twenty-five cents for each passenger carried. Afterward, in 1844, there was an amendatory act passed by which the company was authorized to reduce the rate of fare to $1 50 to each passenger; "provided always," says the act in conclusion, "that one fifth of all such passage money so received be accounted for and paid into the State treasury, as now required by law."

The second section provides for a reduction of fare where there are a certain number of passengers to be carried from one city to the other, and to be returned within three days, in which event the rate of fare is to be reduced, which would be an anomaly now in railroad fares; but the section concludes:

Provided always, That one fifth of all such passage money so received be accounted for and paid into the State treasury as aforesaid."

The provision that I first read is in substance that fifty cents shall be paid to the State of Maryland by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company for every passenger carried between these two cities. The amendatory act authorizes the fare to be reduced to $1 50, and provides that one fifth of that amount, shall be paid to the State of Maryland, which is in effect a provision that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company shall pay to the State of Maryland thirty cents for each passenger carried. So much for the legislation of the State of Maryland.

I will now refer to the legislation of New Jersey in regard to the Camden and Amboy railroad and the different branches and extensions of that road. By the twenty-third section of the act of 1830 it is provided—

"That from and after the completion of the said road or roads it shall be the duty of the treasurer of the said company, under oath or affirmation, to make quarterly returns of the number of passengers and the number of tons of goods, wares, and merchandise transported on said road or roads to the treasurer of this State for the time being, and thereupon to pay to the said treasurer of the State at the rate of ten cents for each and every passenger, and the sum of fifteen cents for each and every ton of merchandise so transported thereon, and that no other tax or impost shall be levied or assessed upon the said company."

The law of New Jersey provides that for every passenger carried on these roads the company shall pay to the State ten cents, and for every ton of merchandise carried fifteen cents.

Now, Mr. President, my first proposition is, that these several provisions in the statutes of Maryland and New Jersey are, in substance and effect, a tax upon passengers, or perhaps the phraseology might be better to say a tax upon travel; and upon this point I will refer to several authorities. But, first, as we all understand, a tax to be paid by a railroad company upon each passenger carried is, in substance, a tax upon the passenger; because, in the nature of things, it is added to the price of the passage. Duties collected upon imports we know are in fact levied upon the consumers. The importer cannot afford to pay the duty on the goods imported unless he adds it to the price of the article imported; so that, in point of fact, the consumer, the purchaser of the goods from the importer, pays the tax; and every tax required to be paid by a railroad company for each passenger carried, whether it is said to be thirty cents upon each passenger or whether it is said to be one fifth of the whole amount of money paid by the passenger, is in substance a tax levied upon the passenger.

This position is so fully sustained by the authorities that it is hardly worth while to elaborate it. The first case that I will refer to is the case in 7 Howard, the case of Smith vs. Turner, commonly known as one of the passenger cases. The syllabus of the case is as follows:

"A State law which requires the masters of vessels engaged in foreign commerce to pay a certain sum to a State officer on account of every passenger brought from a foreign country into the State, or before landing any alien passenger in the State, is inoperative, by reason of its conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States."

In that case the State of Massachusetts and the State of New York had each of them passed statutes. In the case of New York, the one under consideration, the statute provided that the health commissioners should be entitled to demand and receive from the master of every vessel that should arrive in the port of New York from a foreign port one dollar and a half for every cabin passenger and one dollar for each steerage passenger; and from each coasting vessel twenty-five cents for every person on board. The statute of Massachusetts was the same in substance, perhaps almost in language. There the statute did not say it was a tax upon the passenger. The tax was not levied upon the passenger in terms; but the ship bringing the passenger had to pay so much on account of bringing the passenger; and in the case of these railroad companies they are required to pay so much for each passenger carried. In other words, the cases are precisely analogous. In the very able opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court, in the case of Crandall vs. The State of Nevada, (6 Wallace, 40,) he uses the following language, after quoting the New York statute:

"That statute does not use language so strong as the Nevada statute, indicative of a personal tax on the passenger, but merely taxes the master of the vessel according to the number of passengers"—

Just as in New Jersey and in Maryland—

"but the court held it to be a tax upon the passenger, and that the master was the agent of the State for its collection. Chief Justice Taney, while he differed from the majority of the court and held the law to be valid, said of the tax levied by the analogous statute of Massachusetts, that 'its payment is the condition upon which the State permits the alien passenger to come on shore and mingle with its citizens, and to reside among them.' It is demanded of the captain, and not from every separate passenger, for convenience of collection. But the burden evidently falls upon the passenger, and he, in fact, pays it, either in the enhanced price of his passage or directly to the captain before he is allowed to embark for the voyage."

The laws of Massachusetts and of New York cannot be distinguished in principle from the laws of Maryland and New Jersey that I have read. Now, Mr. President, I will refer to a recent case in the Supreme Court, in which the opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice Miller. It is a case which came up from Nevada. In 1865 the Legislature of that State passed an act enacting that "there shall be levied and collected a capitation tax of one dollar upon every person leaving the State by any railroad, stage-coach, or other vehicle engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers for hire;" and that the proprietors, owners, and corporations so engaged should pay the said tax of one dollar for each and every person so conveyed or transported from the State. For the purpose of collecting the tax another section required from persons engaged in such business, or their agents, a report every month, under oath, of the number of passengers so transported, and the payment of the tax to the sheriff or other proper officer.

That was the statute of Nevada. It is true the statute first declares that there shall be a tax levied of a dollar on each passenger; but it is not collected off the passenger. The operative words of the statute are those which declare the stage company shall pay for each passenger carried from the State the sum of one dollar. And this was held by the Supreme Court—and I believe the court was unanimous—to be a tax upon the passenger. The court say:

"It is claimed by counsel for the State that the tax thus levied is not a tax upon the passenger, but upon the business of the carrier who transports him."

"If the act were much more skillfully drawn to sustain this hypothesis than it is, we should be very reluctant to admit that any form of words, which had the effect to compel every person traveling through the country by the common and usual modes of public conveyance to pay a specific sum to the State, was not a tax upon the right thus exercised. The statute before us is not, however, embarrassed by any nice difficulties of this character. The language which we have just quoted is, that there shall be levied and collected a capitation tax upon every person leaving the State by any railroad or stage coach; and the remaining provisions of the act, which refer to this tax, only provided a mode of collecting it."

And that is precisely the case with these statutes of Maryland and New Jersey. They did not say that there shall be a tax levied upon the passenger any more than the statutes of New York and Massachusetts said so, but that the company shall pay for each passenger so much money to the State, it being in substance a tax upon the passenger, and the railroad company being simply made the agents for the collection of it. The authorities on this point are so strong and so direct that it is hardly worth while to occupy the attention of the Senate by commenting further on it.

Assuming, then, that this is a tax upon passengers or upon travel, which amounts to the same thing, my next proposition is that it is in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and is therefore void. I do not mean to say that it is in violation of any particular provision of the Constitution of the United States, but I assume that the Constitution guarantees to every citizen of the United States the right of free travel throughout all the States and Territories, without taxation, interruption, or obstruction by State laws; that it is a right springing essentially from the character of our Government, from the very nature of the Union. Our Constitution gives to us a common country, and every citizen of the United States has a right to travel into or out of or through any State or Territory without being subject to any tax or obstruction by State laws. This is my general proposition, and in support of it I will read from the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case to which I have just referred:

"The people of these United States constitute one nation. They have a Government in which all of them are deeply interested. This Government has necessarily a capital established by law, where its principal operations are conducted. Here sits its Legislature, composed of Senators and Representatives from the States and from the people of the States. Here resides the President, directing, through thousands of agents, the execution of the laws over all this vast country. Here is the seat of the supreme judicial power of the nation, to which all its citizens have a right to resort to claim justice at its hands. Here are the great Executive Departments, administering the offices of the mails, of the public lands, of the collection and distribution of the public revenues, and of our foreign relations. These are all established and conducted under the admitted powers of the Federal Government. That Government has a right to call to this point any or all of its citizens to aid in its service, as members of the Congress, of the courts, of the Executive Departments, and to fill all its other offices; and this right cannot be made to depend upon the pleasure of a State over whose territory they must pass to reach the point where these services must be rendered. The Government, also, has its offices of secondary importance in all other parts of the country. On the sea-coasts and on the rivers it has its ports of entry. In the interior it has its land offices, its revenue offices, and its sub-Treasuries. In all these it demands the services of its citizens, and is entitled to bring them to those points from all quarters of the nation, and no power can exist in a State to obstruct this right that would not enable it to defeat the purposes for which the Government was established."

"The Federal power has a right to declare and prosecute wars, and, as a necessary incident, to raise and transport troops through and over the territory of any State of the Union."

"If this right is dependent in any sense, however limited, upon the pleasure of a State, the Government itself may be overthrown by an obstruction to its exercise. Much the largest part of the transportation of troops during the late rebellion was by railroads, and largely through States whose people were hostile to the Union. If the tax levied by Nevada on railroad passengers had been the law of Tennessee, enlarged to meet the wishes of her people, the Treasury of the United States could not have paid the tax necessary to enable its armies to pass through her territory."

"But if the Government has these rights on her own account, the citizen also has correlative rights. He has the right to come to the seat of Government to assert any claim he may have upon that Government, or to transact any business he may have with it. To seek its protection, to share its offices, to engage in administering its functions. He has a right to free access to its sea-ports, through which all the operations of foreign trade and commerce are conducted, to the sub-Treasuries, the land offices, the revenue offices, and the courts of justice in the several States, and this right is in its nature independent of the will of any State over whose soil he must pass in the exercise of it."

If the State of New Jersey and the State of Maryland have a right to levy a tax upon passengers, they have a right to prevent travel, because they can make their tax so high as to make it prohibitory in its character. If they have a right to levy ten cents they have a right to make the tax $100, or they have a right to make it $1,000. This is very fully stated in this opinion. The court say:

"It is not possible to condense the conclusive argument of Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch vs. State of Maryland, and it is too familiar to justify its reproduction here; but an extract or two, in which the results of his reasoning are stated, will serve to show its applicability to the case before us. 'That the power of taxing the bank by the States,' he says, 'may be exercised so as to destroy it is too obvious to be denied. But taxation is said to be an absolute power, which acknowledges no other limit than those prescribed by the Constitution, and like sovereign power of any description, is trusted to the discretion of those who use it. But the very terms of this argument admit that the sovereignty of the State in the article of taxation is subordinate to and may be controlled by the Constitution of the United States.' Again he says, 'We find, then, on just theory, a total failure of the original right to tax the means employed by the Government of the Union for the execution of its powers. The right never existed, and the question of its surrender cannot arise.'"

"That the power to tax involves the power to destroy; that the power to destroy may defeat and render useless the power to create; that there is a plain repugnance in conferring on one government a power to control the constitutional measures of another, which other, with respect to those very means, is declared to be supreme over that which exerts the control, are propositions not to be denied. If the States may tax one instrument employed by the Government in the execution of its powers it may tax any and every other instrument. They may tax the mail; they may tax the Mint; they may tax patent rights; they may tax the papers of the custom-house; they may tax judicial process; they may tax all the means employed by the Government to an excess which would defeat all the ends of government. This was not intended by the American people. They did not design to make their Government dependent on the States.

"It will be observed that it was not the extent of the tax in that case which was complained of, but the right to levy any tax of that character. So in the case before us it may be said that a tax of one dollar for passing through the State of Nevada, by stage-coach or by railroad, cannot sensibly affect any function of the Government or deprive a citizen of any valuable right. But if the State can tax a railroad passenger one dollar, it can tax him $1,000. If one State can do this, so can every other State; and thus one or more States, covering the only practicable routes of travel from the East to the West, or from the North to the South, may totally prevent or seriously burden all transportation of passengers from one part of the country to the other."

This is a hoary abuse. It has not been the interest of the railroad companies to resist this, because the States might then take from those companies their special privileges. It has not been to the interest of any one passenger to resist, and therefore for a quarter of a century have these States almost supported their State governments by levying a tax upon the traveling public.

We have various other illustrations of this question. For example, the State of Maryland on another occasion passed a law levying a tax upon the notes of the Bank of the United States circulated within the limits of the State of Maryland. This bank was created by authority of the General Government. The State of Maryland assumed that she had a right to tax its notes within her limits. The Supreme Court decided that the law of Maryland taxing the notes of the bank was in violation of the Constitution of the United States. And why? Because, if Maryland could tax those notes at all, she might levy a tax sufficient to drive them out of the State of Maryland; and if Maryland could do it, every other State could do it, and thus the Bank of the United States be virtually destroyed by State legislation.

There is another illustration of this doctrine. The Supreme Court, in the case of Weston vs. The City of Charleston, some forty years ago, decided that the city of Charleston had no right to levy a tax upon the stocks and securities of the United States; and why? Because the Government of the United States had a right to borrow money; the Government could not borrow money without issuing stocks and securities, and if the city of Charleston or the State of South Carolina had a right to tax those securities they could make it unprofitable for any man to hold a Government bond in the State of South Carolina. They could, therefore, tax every Government bond out of that State; and if South Carolina could tax Government bonds out of that State, Maryland and every other State could do the same; and hence it was held that the States had no right to levy a tax upon the stocks or securities of the Government of the United States, and that decision has been since followed and is now recognized as the law of the land.

Again, Mr. President, on another occasion the State of Maryland provided that no person could sell in that State imported goods in the original packages without first procuring a license from the State. It was held by the Supreme Court of the United States that this was in violation of the right that every citizen had who had imported goods; that if the State of Maryland could require a license to sell goods by a man who had imported them Maryland could prohibit importations by making that license so high that no man could afford to pay it. Therefore, that law was held to be void.

Then, Mr. President, the general principle is, that wherever a right exists under the Constitution of the United States the exercise or enjoyment of that right cannot be taxed by any State, directly or indirectly. It makes no difference in what way the tax is levied, if it is in fact and in substance a tax upon the enjoyment or exercise of any right secured by the Constitution of the United States it is in violation of that instrument. And now I will refer to the recent amendment, the fourteenth article, which is also directly in point, but was not in operation at the time these decisions were made, and which goes to strengthen and, in fact, directly establishes the point that I make. The fourteenth article provides—

"That no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States."

That is a part of the new amendment, which is now a portion of the Constitution, that no State shall make or enforce any law that shall abridge any privilege or immunity of a citizen of the United States. Now, sir, the right of free travel all over this country of ours is an immunity that belongs to every citizen of the United States, and any tax that is levied upon it, directly or indirectly, is an abridgment of that right.

I do not think it is necessary to read further. I will, however, read an extract from the opinion of Chief Justice Taney in the passenger cases already referred to. In those cases the court held the statutes void for the reason I have described; but Chief Justice Taney dissented from the opinion upon the ground that the tax there levied was upon aliens coming into the United States, and he said that each State had a right to protect itself against foreign paupers, against persons bringing contagious diseases, and the States might do it in the form of taxes; but lest he might be misunderstood, lest his dissenting opinion should be carried further than he intended, he made the following declaration, which I will read:

"In speaking of the taxing power in this case, I must, however, be understood as speaking of it as it is presented in the record; that is to say, as the case of passengers from a foreign port. The provisions contained in that law relating to American citizens who are passengers from the ports of other States is a different question, and involves very different considerations. It is not now before us, yet, in order to avoid misunderstanding, it is proper to say that in my opinion it cannot be maintained. Living, as we do, under a common Government, charged with the great concerns of the whole Union, every citizen of the United States, from the most remote States or Territories, is entitled to free access, not only to the principal Departments established at Washington, but also to its judicial tribunals and public offices in every State and Territory of the Union. And the various provisions in the Constitution of the United States—such, for example, as the right to sue in a Federal court sitting in another State, the right to pursue and reclaim one who has escaped from service, the equal privileges and immunities secured to citizens of other States, and the provision that vessels bound to or from one State to another shall not be obliged to enter and clear or pay duties—all prove that it intended to secure the freest intercourse between the citizens of the different States. For all the great purposes for which the Federal Government was formed we are one people, with one common country. We are all citizens of the United States; and, as members of the same community, must have the right to pass and repass through every part of it without interruption as freely as in our own States. And a tax imposed by a State for entering its territories or harbors is inconsistent with the rights which belong to the citizens of other States as members of the Union, and with the objects which that Union was intended to attain. Such a power in the States could produce nothing but discord and mutual irritation, and they very clearly do not possess it."

"But upon the question which the record brings up the judgment in the New York case, as well as that from Massachusetts, ought, in my opinion, to be affirmed."

In this opinion Chief Justice Taney says, that while he believes a State has a right to impose a tax upon aliens coming into it from a foreign country as a police regulation, yet as between the several States and citizens of the United States a State has no such power. Sir, it is not an open question; it is fully covered by the decisions of the Supreme Court. And now the question is, what ought Congress to do? It has been submitted to for a quarter of a century. Millions have been drawn from the pockets of the traveling public to pay the State expenses of New Jersey and Maryland, and unless there is some action taken by Congress this abuse will be continued. I propose to cut this abuse up squarely, by making it a misdemeanor for these corporations to pay any tax to any State on account of passengers carried, and to make it a forfeiture for any State officer or State agent to receive from any corporation or from anybody else any sum of money as a price, condition, or tax for the transportation of passengers across the State, into the State, or out of the State. Sir, this abuse has been borne long enough; but it will continue to exist unless it is met by legislation like this. Let us pass this bill, and the question must be settled at once. My bill gives to the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction in all these cases. If the officer of a railroad company is fined for paying over this tax to the State, either party has the right to appeal to the Supreme Court and have the question settled at once. If the State officer is proceeded against by action of debt for receiving the tax he has his right of appeal, or the State has the right of appeal, and the question can be settled within one hundred days or within six months from this time. But unless we pass this bill, or something like it, we may for the next twenty-five years, as we have for the last, continue to support the State governments of Maryland and New Jersey by taxes levied upon the travelers from other States and countries.

The Tariff.SPEECH OF HON. JAMES BROOKS,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

December 15, 1868.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1349) to increase the revenue from duties on imports, and tending to equalize exports and imports—

Mr. BROOKS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The bill before us is from the Ways and Means Committee, reported in the hot summer months of the last session of the Fortieth Congress, then referred to the Committee of the Whole, and now this winter, after the recess, suddenly reappearing before us and hot-pressed, as we see by the ayes and noes just taken, for immediate action. Unprepared as I am at this moment on this sudden and unexpected call for action, I cannot do justice to a bill in my judgment so unjust, so unequal, so iniquitous, and so destructive to some of the best interests of the country. But little preparation, however, is necessary to expose such a bill as this, if the House will give me a little attention to the analysis. Facts in everybody's hand or head supply all the logic necessary for its overthrow, and the amazement will be, as I exhibit these facts, that so high-standing a committee as that of the Ways and Means should ever have had—I will only say the politeness—the courtesy to give this bill here a standing; for their judgment could never have approved it, and its presentation must have been only in courtesy to Pennsylvania, or to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] who, for his State, is fathering it.

THIS TARIFF BILL A PENNSYLVANIA BILL.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, is but a local bill, with no real nationality, not even the odor of nationality about it; and it is almost exclusively a Pennsylvania bill, with a few plums thrown in for the copper miners of Michigan or the copper capitalists of New York and Boston, or a few other plums to comparatively small special interests, in order to tempt enough votes in this House to carry the Pennsylvania burden in it. To New England the bill is a blow, a destructive blow, and to New York as fatal a blow as this House can well give, while to the great West it is nothing but blows, and blows of the hardest kind. But this bill, Mr. Chairman, this short bill, is only the premonitory system of a long bill, a very long bill which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOOREHEAD] is concocting for you, [Mr. BROOKS here held up a big roll of paper, the bill in preparation,] and which you are expected to take as soon as you have swallowed this. That bill leaves nothing in iron, in steel, in wire "unprotected," as the wicked phrase is; that is, nothing unsecured to some existing monopoly by a bounty rising from forty to five hundred per cent. It would seem from the reading of this bill that there was scarcely a rich manufacturing Pennsylvania capitalist who had not come here and asked for "bounty," and who had not touched the heart of the gentleman from Pennsylvania enough to win it. Not only is iron, rolled, hammered, known as "T," "L," and "H," provided for, but rods, nail, slit, hoop, band, trip, scalp, tubes, scroll, and chains, trace-chains, halter-chains, and fence-chains, anvils, blacksmiths' hammers, bolts, rivets, tubes, and flues, hinges of all kinds, saws, frogs, fish-bar, side-bar, splice-bar, finger-bar, crow-bar—ay, everything and anything, the product in iron of Pennsylvania upon which a levy can be laid to extort taxes from the farmer of Missouri or Illinois or Minnesota or from the South and West generally. Not the plow nor the anvil of the man, nor even the crinoline of the woman, is respected, for on all, more or less, there is an increase of duty of from twenty to one hundred per cent.

HIGH WHIG TARIFF THIRTY PER CENT.—PRESENT AVERAGE TARIFF OVER FORTY-EIGHT.

Sir, I am admonished as a Whig of the school of Henry Clay and Daniel Webster, who went far beyond the five and ten per cent. protective school of Alexander Hamilton, to stand twenty, ay, even thirty per cent. of protection, which was the limit of the line we were expected to stand, but now, while living under a tariff which runs from thirty to five hundred per cent. of "protection," and averaging over forty-eight per cent., we are called upon for a further increase, and that is so arranged that no man can well understand the increase proposed, but which means from five to five hundred per cent. more of additional bounty.

CONGRESS PLEDGED IN 1861 TO REDUCE THE EXTERNAL TARIFF WHEN IT REDUCED THE INTERNAL TARIFF.

Mr. Chairman, you will recollect, this House will well recollect, that when during the war, June 30, 1864, we levied an internal revenue tax on manufactures to meet the expenses of that war, we also increased the external tariff act in a per cent. of like proportions. You reasoned, and we all admitted, that it would not be just to increase the burdens of the manufacturers at home to support the war unless at the same time we increased the burdens upon the foreign manufacturers. While this proposition of equality was met with general assent, it was then also the general assent, the concurrent agreement I may say, if not compact, that when we took the percentage of increase off from the American manufacturers, in like manner we should take off the percentage of increase from the foreign manufactured articles imported.

Thus, when we levied the internal revenue taxes by the act of June 30, 1864, we levied an additional tariff duty, varying from five to fifty per cent., at the same time, with the understanding, if not the actual compact, that if the internal tax came off the external tax should come off also. This compact has not been kept. By the act of March last we took off the internal tax upon manufacturers to the amount of $60,000,000 without reducing the prices to the consumer upon their articles to any appreciable extent. Or, in other words, we relieved the manufacturers from $60,000,000 taxes, leaving nearly all other impositions upon the people, while now some of those manufacturers have the impudence to call upon Congress not only to break the compact of June 30, 1864, but actually to increase their protection or bounty, some of them to an enormous percentage. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania is the organ of this breach of faith, though pig iron, an especial product of his State, is dearer now than it was before the tax was removed!

PROPOSED INCREASED TAX ON COPPER.

Now, let us analyze the bill before us. The first item proposed is a fresh copper tax which, estimating the ton at twenty-two hundred and forty pounds, actually proposes an additional duty of $54 40 on imported copper in ores, a prohibitory duty, because the Lake Superior mines, with this enormous profit per ton guaranteed them by law, could always afford to undersell the smelters in this country, who are obliged, by the nature of this domestic ore, to admix foreign ore with domestic ores in the act of smelting. Under the existing tariff the duty on imported copper in ores is now computed at about three quarters of one per cent. per pound. The bill before us proposes to increase this tax to three cents per pound; that is, to increase it by two and a quarter cents per pound.

	Present tariff per pound.	Proposed tariff per pound.
Regulus of copper, black and coarse copper.....	2½ cents.	4 cents.
Old copper.....	1½ cents.	4 cents.
Copper, in plates, pigs, and other forms.....	2½ cents.	5 cents.
Copper in ores.....	¾ of 1 cent.	3 cents.

The owners and the workers of the Lake Superior mines tell us this bounty is indispensable for their prosperity, and they draw deplorable pictures of the copper villages in that region in order to influence the sympathies of this House. Sir, I do not believe that in any agricultural State of this Union the people can long suffer from starvation where farms may be had from the nation by the mere squatting upon them; but if this be so, I know of no right which copper men have to claim bounties from that nation to work copper mines more than farms. If copper cannot be successfully worked upon Lake Superior potatoes can be. The lakes abound in fish and the forests in wood and lumber, which command the highest prices. The Lake Superior mines, it is estimated, averaged from 1845 to the close of the year 1867 but about nine million pounds per year, while the consumption was twenty-four million pounds per year, and it is these fifteen millions per year, which it is proposed by a prohibitory duty to drive from market in order that it may be furnished at a higher price than it can now be bought for. Sir, if I am correctly informed as to copper mining and the copper trade, one cause of the depression of Lake Superior mining is the less demand for copper in the markets of the world, and the greater difficulty of mining copper than in Chili and elsewhere. The copper product of Great Britain has largely declined, namely, from fifteen thousand nine hundred and sixty-eight tons in 1860 to ten thousand eight hundred tons in 1867.

The East Indian no longer absorbs copper as once he did, but uses gold and silver instead. Iron steamships, which need no copper sheeting, have now superseded the wooden copper-sheeted ships. Copper mines in some countries are surface mines easily worked, or on the coast, whence freights are cheap therefrom, while the Lake Superior mines are far in the interior and not cheaply worked, not only because of their locality, but from the necessity of bringing labor and provisions to remote districts there. Sir, I know of no duty of the great American people, the consumers of copper, to pay tribute to a few unprofitable copper mines on Lake Superior any more than to pay tribute to hot-houses to raise sugar or grapes there. I know of no right one has to tax the brass-founder, the brass-worker, or the boiler-maker, or any employment into which copper enters, for the benefit of a few copper-workers in northern Michigan, or for the benefit of a few capitalists in my own New York district, or Boston, that own the greater part of the stock of these mines, more especially when the smelters of copper are compelled by the laws of nature to mix a certain quantity of foreign carbonate ores into the local sulphuret ores of the United States.

This proposed act contemplates (estimating the ton at two thousand two hundred and forty pounds) the following duties:

On the estimated product of fine copper from ores imported, a duty per ton of.....	$67 20
On the estimated product of fine copper from regulus of copper, and all black or coarse copper, a duty per ton of.....	$89 60
On old copper, fit only for remanufacture, a duty per ton of.....	$89 60
On all copper in plates, bars, ingots, pigs, or in other forms not above enumerated, a duty per ton of.....	$112 00

SHIP-BUILDING INTEREST.

Sir, there is a greater interest in this country, a great national interest, that reaches far higher than the copper mining of Lake Superior, and that is the shipping interest of the United States. Congress, sir, has already, by the enormity of its taxation upon iron and cordage and copper, driven from the ocean every American steamer not supported by a subsidy from the Government. Our predecessors in Congress carefully fostered the American ship, the American sailor, and the American flag. The fisheries were struggled for and secured to train the American sailor. The treaties with Great Britain in 1783, and in 1816, carefully secured us equal rights on the sea. Our fathers, in the primitive days of our Republic, at the close of the last century, and in the beginning of this, by their wise legislation, spread our canvass and our flag from the Arctic to the Antarctic, and from the Indies of the West to the Indies of the East. "Free trade and sailors' rights" were emblems emblazoned on the pendants of our ships at the close of the war of 1816, under and over the stars and stripes; and it was under these emblems that the Constitution captured the Guerriere, and that our sailors illumined the sea in every quarter of the globe by the splendor of their valor and the glory of their arms.

DESTRUCTION OF COMMERCE—FOREIGN SHIPPING.

But, alas! what now is the picture? The British, the French, or the Bremen flag floats over every ocean steamer in the great port of New York, where a subsidy is not paid for carrying our mails. All our fathers have done for the sailors, we, their degenerate children, have undone. There are times in the city of New York when not a single American flag is seen on a vessel from a foreign port, while the harbor is full of foreign flags from Great Britain, France, Prussia, Bremen, Hamburg, the Hanse Towns, Italy, Sweden, and even Norway. Our countrymen travel to Europe, to and fro, under foreign flags. Our emigrants are first ushered into our ports under British or Bremen emblems. Our letters carried over the Atlantic seas are in foreign ships. We cannot even hold intercourse over the sea with our wives and children but under a foreign flag. Our fathers reasoned, and reasoned well, from historical lessons, that the nation whose flag can command the sea commands the world, and that the sailor was as essential an element for home protection as the soldier. The best outward bulwarks of a people against foreign invasion or coastwise raids are the bulwarks of ships of war, manned by heroic seamen:

"Britannia needs no bulwarks,
No towers along the steep;
Her march is o'er the mountain waves,
Her home is on the deep."

What fortresses are to the land the forts of the sea are as ships of war, and a nation with these floating bulwarks may dispense with many land-anchored forts at home. How can there be safe commerce where there are not national ships? We are respected abroad only as our flag makes itself respected while floating over our sailors and their guns. Now, all that we have left under our destructive congressional legislation is the nursery of our coastwise trade—a great nursery to be sure, stretching, as it does, thousands of miles from Maine to Texas on the Atlantic, and from southern California to Alaska on the Pacific—but no adequate nursery for the seamen necessary to protect and to honor a flag which has hitherto flown from the Arctic to the Antarctic, and which has made the heart of the American jubilant in every land, in every quarter of the globe he lived. Sir, a Congress insensible to these important facts, or not sensible to the importance of commerce, and its protection the world over, forgets one of its first duties, if it does not commit a great national crime. But what has Congress done, and what greater destruction does this bill propose? Let us see.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

SHIPBUILDING HERE—THE COST.

One of the elements of ship building is copper, and this bill doubles or triples the duty on copper, while it is full, all over, of heavier and heavier taxation upon iron. The present taxation on American ships and American shipbuilders is enormous; but the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania cries for "more," "more." Mr. D. McKay, about the largest ship-builder in the United States, February 15, 1868, stated, under his own signature, the following to be the tariff-taxation entering into the construction of a new ship of one thousand tons:

Tariff in Gold.

AN AMERICAN SHIP IS AN AMERICAN MANUFACTORY AS MUCH AS A ROLLING-MILL.

The moment an American ship leaves an American port it enters upon a free trade—a free competition with all the nations of the earth. It is not, like an iron rolling-mill in the interior of Pennsylvania, protected by the cost of freights at home and the cordon of custom-houses on the ocean, (seventy cents per one hundred pounds,) but it is an American manufactory launched upon the high seas, stripped of all protection, and in competition with all the industry on the earth. It is as much a manufactory as the rolling-mill of Pennsylvania and as much in competition with the cheap labor of the world; but Pennsylvania, herself covered all over with bounties at home, levies upon the New England or New York one thousand ton ship some ten thousand dollars or more in currency to depress, to burden it in competition with that outside world. The crying injustice of this is so far from being felt by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that, not content with this enormous levy, he cruelly proposes now to run up this ten thousand dollar currency tax on the one thousand ton ship to some twelve thousand dollars or more, by his increase upon the iron elements that enter into the composition of the American ship. Our ship-carpenters are idle, or working for lower wages in paper than they hitherto had in gold. Glasgow, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick are driving our ships out of the freighting markets of the world, though North and South we have the best ship lumber in the world. Our sympathies are appealed to for the sufferers of the copper miners of Michigan in order to pass this bill, but not one word is said by its advocates in behalf of the greater suffering ship-carpenters of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and New York.

We begged, but begged in vain, the last session of this Congress to give shipbuilders in the United States a drawback upon their $10,000 duties they paid on their one thousand ton ships; but the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania successfully rallied his Pennsylvania cohorts against it, and the maritime States of this Union, staggering under that blow, have in despair, at least, given up all hope, except in their coastwise trade.

THE TARIFF DESTRUCTIVE OF AMERICAN SHIPS.

Sir, the rebel ship Alabama swept our commerce from the seas wherever or whenever it was touched by that fatal crew; but the Alabama was never so destructive upon American shipping, and American commerce therein, as the legislation of this Congress, which the bill now before us proposes to make worse. Peace has brought us no restoration of our ships; but, on the contrary, the decrease seems to go on during the peace as during the war, for the high tariff is as great a curse to commerce as was the Alabama. When the war began (in 1861) the tonnage of the globe was as follows:

	Tons.	Tonnage June 30, '68
Owned by the United States.....	5,530,813	4,318,369
Great Britain and dependencies.....	5,898,369
All other nations.....	5,800,767
		17,235,949

Of this total the United States owned nearly one third, Great Britain over one third, and all other maritime nations the remaining third. Nearly one third of the international ocean carrying trade of the civilized world has been in the hands of our young Republic; but as Alabama killed us during the war tariffs have killed us since the peace. We had as long ago as 1855 115,045 tons of foreign steam tonnage. Now not an American-European steamer, not one.

FOREIGN STEAM TONNAGE, 1867.

Great Britain's estimate.....	775,000
United States.....	175,520
Difference.....	599,480

This difference of nearly six hundred thousand tons is more than the combined commercial steam tonnage of the United States and Great Britain five years ago. There are now eight lines of foreign-built steamers running from New York owned by foreign capitalists and protected by the flags of England, France, and North Germany. Ten steamers are in one of these lines, and more on the stocks. The following table tells a fatal tale:

	No. of ships and barks.	No. of schooners.
1855.....	375	528
1856.....	302	438
1857.....	248	398
1858.....	118	367
1859.....	88	276
1860.....	109	347
1861.....	105	327
1862.....	43	167
1863.....	83	153
1864.....	106	282
1865.....	105	350
1866.....	84	419
1867.....	81	476
1868.....	69	458

Showing that while with schooners our coastwise monopoly saves us from foreigners, we perish when we enter into competition with them in ships and barks.

"The building of ocean steamers is also in an exceedingly depressed condition. During the year ending June 30, 1868, there were but six ocean steamers built in the United States, whose aggregate tonnage amounted to fourteen thousand eight hundred and fifty-five tons. Nearly all the steamers built in this country during the last five years have been intended to meet the demands of our coastwise trade.

"The depletion of our forests of ship timber renders it probable that within the next ten years we shall be compelled to resort to iron as a ship-building material. The iron ship-building enterprises which sprang up at several points in this country before the war enjoyed for a while a degree of prosperity which gave promise of great future success. That interest is now prostrated.

"During the year ending June 30, 1868, there were but six iron vessels—all steamers—built in the United States, whose aggregate tonnage amounted to two thousand eight hundred and one tons, all of which were built by Messrs. Harlan & Hollingsworth, of Wilmington, Delaware, and were designed for river navigation.

"In order to show our relative inferiority in this branch of ship-building it may be stated that during the year 1867 there were ninety-nine iron sailing vessels built in England, Scotland, and Ireland, whose aggregate tonnage amounted to fifty-nine thousand and thirty-three tons, and two hundred and twenty-four iron steamers, whose aggregate tonnage amounted to ninety thousand eight hundred and twenty-three tons; the iron sailing vessels amounting to thirty-four per cent. of the total sailing tonnage built, and the iron steamers to ninety-six per cent. of the total steam tonnage built."—Extract from the official report of Mr. Nimmo to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Sir, in view of these facts, how can, how dare the gentleman from Pennsylvania demand the doubling or trebling of the duty on copper and a great increase of the duty on iron? Has he no love for the flag? Has he no heart for the gallant sailor who carries that flag on every sea? Has he no pride in American commerce and American trade? Or is he ceasing to be an American, and becoming only one of the Chinese, with their old shut up, shut out policy, which even they have exploded at last? But if the honorable gentleman himself is deaf and dumb to all but his own supposed local interests; if he cannot look out upon the world beyond the shops of his own foundries and forges, I appeal to the people of his State to remember Decatur, Bainbridge, Hull, Lawrence, Perry, Farragut, and to remember that ships and sailors and commerce alone have raised and can raise such men, and that what he is doing is destroying them all while it is exposing our coasts to be a prey to the Norsemen of the world. A nation without ships is a nation without arms or legs or hands; a nation within a shell, with its head to be cracked whenever it thrusts it out. While I respect I do not mean to decry the industry and prosperity of Pennsylvania, yet I must say, when I see her Representatives waging war upon almost every other State in the Union, I would not give up the fame Decatur, Bainbridge, Hull, Lawrence, Perry, and Farragut have given this nation for all the forty rolling-mills of Pennsylvania.

SOAP, GLASS, PAPER.

Mr. Chairman, there is comedy as well as tragedy in this Pennsylvania bill. One cannot well help laughing when one sees how it has been gloved, and furred, and velvet-pawed to suit certain Pennsylvania interests. It is tragic to sweep out of existence a nation's flag upon the open seas; but it is comic to hide up and cover in a tariff bill such innocent looking items as these:

Line 76 (of the bill).—On sal soda and soda crystals, one cent per pound.
Line 77 (of the bill).—On caustic soda, two cents per pound.

Line 78 (of the bill).—On chromate and bichromate of potassa, four and a half cents per pound.

Now, this looks well enough on paper, for it is only the rise of a duty on—

	Present Tariff.	Proposed Tariff.
Sal soda and crystals per pound.....	1 cent	1 cent
Caustic soda per pound.....	1 cent	2 cents
Chromate and bichromate per pound.....	3 cents	4½ cents

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

The Tariff—Mr. Brooks.

HO. OF REPS.

Salt Soda.—Present value in Europe per ton, £4 5s, is $4 84, equal to $20 57, first cost per ton. Proposed duty 1 cent per pound, per ton $22 40, equal to about 109 per cent., equal to about 54½ per cent., present duty.

Soda ash.—Present value in Europe per ton, £7 10s, is $36 30, equal to $22 40, first cost per ton. Proposed duty per ton, $22 40, equal to about 61.70 per cent., equal to about 30.85 per cent., present duty.

Something of a raise on materials that enter into the making of paper, soap, glass, &c., so necessary to the great body of the people, and yet not so alarming as the more glaring demands for bounties in the other parts of this bill; but look further on in the bill, section three, twelfth in the line, next to "eggs" and fashion plates, in the free list, is hid away "kryolite," duty free. Salt soda, caustic soda, and kryolite, or kryolite—innocent words; but what does all this mean? There is in the district of the gentleman from Pennsylvania a great company, known as the Pennsylvania Salt Manufacturing Company.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Not in mine.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, near him then; in a neighboring congressional district.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Not in mine.

Mr. BROOKS. In Mr. WILLIAMS'S district, then.

Mr. MOORHEAD. That is so; but it is not in mine.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, the mere locality matters not; but there is in a Pennsylvania district near that of the honorable gentleman a great company, known with the innocent name of the Pennsylvania Salt Manufacturing Company, for the manufacture of this soda ash, of course, as soda is, by one process, a direct product from salt. This company has filled the whole West with its packages of soda for the making of soap, and where wood ashes cannot be had from the scarcity of wood, as on the prairies of the West, the monopoly of soap-making is altogether in the hands of this company in Pennsylvania. For this species of enterprise it deserves credit; but when it goes further and demands bounties from us and monopolizes the kryolite of the world, that kryolite which is the mineral from which soda in its various commercial forms and in the greatest purity can be obtained, and the only natural product from which it can be obtained to supply the demands of commerce, then we begin to suspect that profit is its patriotism and pelf its great object of pursuit. Kryolite (from the Greek words kruos, ice, and lithos, stone—ice-stone—thus named from its resemblance to ice) is a compound of three chemical equivalents of sodium, two of aluminum, and six of fluorine. The mineral was first discovered by the Esquimaux in Greenland, and the Danish Government has made a monopoly of it. The Pennsylvania Salt Company have, with the consent of the king of Denmark, concluded a contract with the Kryolith Mine of Handels Selskabet—as the Danish Kryolite Company is called—for the continents of North and South America.

"No pent up Utica contracts our powers,
The whole boundless continent is ours."

And they come to Washington, and demand the admission of kryolite "free,"—with a double duty on salt soda, prepared, no doubt, to sing the missionaries' hymn:

"From Greenland's icy mountains,
From India's coral strands,
Where Afric's sunny fountains
Roll down their golden sands."

Well, I shall not blame them for thus singing, if the soap-makers of the West, the paper-makers of the North, and the glass-blowers of the East are willing to give them these bounties, and secure them these monopolies.

But salt soda, caustic, and kryolite are not the only comic Pennsylvania actors. In this bill, page 2, items are as follows:

Line 20.—On nickel, nickel oxide, alloy of nickel with copper, 40 cents per pound, (now 15.)

Line 22.—On nickel matter or spieess, 30 cents per pound, (now 15.)

Line 23.—On manufacture of nickel 50 per cent. ad valorem, (now 35.)

Line 24.—On aluminum and all its alloys, 50 per cent ad valorem, (now 29 per cent.)

It is the aluminate of soda, the saponifier of the Pennsylvania Salt Company, which produces the thirty million pounds of soap used by our people, mainly in the West. Here in this item the Pennsylvania company seems to be in a conspiracy with the Michigan copper men, the iron-rolling men, and others to keep dirty the faces and hands and clothes of twenty million people in the West by increasing the price of soap. Alumina it is, too, which possesses the property; more than almost any other substance, of uniting and forming distinct chemical combinations with coloring matter. Scarlet, crimson, and the bases of water colors consist of alumina united with the coloring principle. The permanent calico color would be useless for the tints of red, crimson, scarlet, and chocolate but for the property alumina has of uniting with it and forming a compound which adheres so firmly to the tissues of the texture as to resist the ordinary action of soap and other chemicals in household use. The bill, then, is a combination not only to keep the people dirty but to increase the cost of coloring matter to prevent them showing their dirt.

BICHROMATE OF POTASH.

Before the war the bichromate of potash was twenty cents in gold; during the war the price advanced with the currency. A house in Baltimore, having the control or monopoly of the chrome ore, supplied the world—certainly the American part of the world—with chromate and bichromate of potash, and made an immense fortune thereby. Since the war some process has been discovered in Europe of cheapening the price, and which has brought it down here to twelve and a half cents per pound in gold. The house in Baltimore is selling for seventeen cents and is making money yet, but still wants the increased "protection" of four and a half cents per pound.

NICKEL.

There is a nickel mine in Pennsylvania, in the Lancaster district, the only one in the United States, I believe, the district lately represented by Thaddeus Stevens, who, when chairman of the Ways and Means, ever devoted himself to its "protection." I asked him there once what the mine could be bought for. He then thought for one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand dollars. When urgent and ardent for the ten or fifteen per cent. protection it now has, I begged him to insert in his appropriation bill, which the Ways and Means then had the framing of, a $200,000 item for the purchase of it, so that the United States could own it and make its nickel cents without paying a bounty to the owners for the privilege; for these per cents., ten, fifteen, (now proposed forty,) would make it far wiser for us to buy the mine outright than thus to be buying it with bounties. He laughingly and yet sarcastically replied, that would not read well; and the nickel mine owners had better sell it their (his) way. I think it would be better for the country to buy this nickel mine now for $1,000,000 than, as proposed, nearly to triple the duty on nickel and double it on nickel matte, or spieess.

The bill before us, however, is not content with raising the tax from thirty-five to fifty per cent. ad valorem on manufactures of nickel, but—

Line 26.—On albatra, or white metal, Argentine, German silver, and the like mixed metals, and the manufactures thereof, fifty per cent. ad valorem— is proposed in lieu of the present thirty-five per cent. The German silver or argentine manufacturers have recently become of importance in this country, and the extraction of nickel has been undertaken on a large scale. It seems to have mortified the Pennsylvania concoctors of this tariff that the common people should be using German silver forks, spoons, table-servants, &c., in lieu of iron, and they have therefore demanded this bill to make us all pay for it.

WAR ON LIGHT, SALT, AND IRON.

Now, sir, I have graver charges to make against this bill, and the architects thereof, than the destruction of our shipping, or even the punishment of our people for being clean, or for not using iron forks and spoons; and that is, for the war they make upon the three great elements of human life, namely, light, salt, and iron. Bread, sir, is the staff of life; but light is as indispensable as bread; and salt, if not as indispensable, is certainly not dispensable, while without iron there is no progress in life; no civilization, ay, little but the barbarism of the savage. Upon all these three great elements of life this bill wickedly proposes additional taxation, when the tax already is enormous, and more than can well be borne.

ON LIGHT.

Line 82.—On all unpolished cylinder, crown, and common window glass, ten by fifteen inches square, two and a quarter cents, (now one and a half cent.) above that, and not exceeding sixteen by twenty-four inches square, two and three quarter cents per pound, (now two cents,) above that and not exceeding twenty-four by thirty-nine inches square, four cents per pound, (now two and a half cents,) all above that four and a half cents per pound, (now three cents.)

The tax on window glass is now almost, though not quite, prohibitory, and importers of glass are able to sell at only a little, if any, above the cost of importation; but to secure the monopoly the proposition here is to double the tax and then to shut off all competition to the householder or tenant, or to force us to live without the necessary light. Such a necessity of life, so indispensable to every house in the land, should be taxed as lightly as possible; but of light here is prohibition from abroad to install monopoly at home without a possible rival in the market. A box (fifty feet) of eight by ten German glass, which ten years ago could be sold for $1 50 and pay an importer a good profit, now yields little or no profit to the importer at $3 50 per box. The rate on the small sizes is enormous when compared with the foreign cost, and yet it is proposed to add fifty per cent. to it, to make it $2 25 in gold for one hundred pounds, a burden which will fall mainly on the South and West, where the smaller sizes are most used. Whatever tariff movement there is on glass should be for its reduction, certainly not for its increase.

ON SALT.

Sir, there is less respect in this bill, if possible, for salt—which the Scriptures, old and new, above almost all things, teach us to respect—than there is for light. Ye who framed this bill are neither that "salt of the earth" nor "light of the world" recognized in the Sermon on the Mount. What in the East is the symbol of hospitality, (bread and salt,) what was enjoined on the Israelites in their offerings to God—the use of salt (Lev. 2, chapter 13; Numbers 18, chapter 19; 2 Chron. 2, 13, chapter 5)—the covenant of salt, ye have impiously disregarded and contemned. You will not hear man. You may hear God in his prohibition of salt as a monopoly, or for bounties, for the few against the many. Salt has a sacred character, a divine mission, and how dare you, then, make such propositions as these in your bill?

Line 89.—On salt in bulk, and on all rock salt, or mineral salt, twenty-four cents per one hundred pounds, (now eighteen cents.)

Line 91.—On salt in bags or sacks, thirty cents per one hundred pounds, but no return of duties shall be made on account of damage to sacks containing salt, (now twenty-four.)

Sir, the duty on salt at the present moment is unendurable. It is one of the most outrageous impositions of the existing outrageous tariff, and it requires an amount of audacity and impudence to come here and cry "More!" "More!" than I can comprehend.

Under the present tariff, without this in-

Ho. OF REPS.

The Tariff—Mr. Brooks.

40TH CONG...3D SESS.

crease now proposed, here are the actual duties paid on cargoes of salt at the port of New York, that have been carefully prepared:

Cost of a cargo in Cadiz, in gold.....	$1,160
Duty, 170 per cent.....	1,937
Cost of a cargo in Turks' Island.....	3,980
Duty, 116½ per cent.....	3,591
Cost of a cargo in St. Martin's.....	504
Duty, 128½ per cent.....	648
Cost of a cargo in Bonaire.....	1,500
Duty, 144 per cent.....	2,160
Cost of a cargo in Liverpool.....	2,531
Duty, 115 per cent.....	2,913

The present tariff doubles the cost of salt to the consumer, but the bill here piles on more and more. And this, too, upon a necessary of life, without which our beef and our pork could not be preserved for market at home or export abroad, an article almost as indispensable to human life as bread. And this demand for this enormous duty comes from a few, a very few, salt monopolists, who now, as owners of the salines, rule over and reign in the market and almost dictate their prices to the farmers of the country. Free salt, free light, like free air, are worth more than any political or constitutional freedom, for they are elements of existence without which there is no freedom of life, but here is a bill which, while it bars out light, also seizes hold of and monopolizes what God Himself consecrates to man as the savior of life. Tell me not, then, sir, of the freedom of the slave; talk not to me of emancipation, while upon thirty-odd millions of Americans you are imposing slavery for salt and light.

ON IRON.

Mr. Chairman, when I see how, and in what things, the ingenious monopolist exacts his bounties from his fellow-men, and lives and profits and luxuriates upon their earnings and toil, I have not the patience, perhaps, that a public man ought to have when analyzing wrongs. No one can doubt that the discovery of iron, with all its manifold uses, has done more than anything else to advance mankind in arts and arms. The same ore furnishes the plowshare, the sword, the pruning hook, the needle, the gavel, the spring of a watch or a carriage, the chisel, the chain, the anchor, the compass, the cannon, and the bomb. On three pages of the little bill before me are increased taxes upon steel and iron, and on fifteen or twenty pages of the long bill, yet threatened from the Ways and Means, further increased taxes are threatened upon every man using or working in iron or steel. The following table will exhibit the there proposed increase of the tariff from the already enormous tariff taxes of 1864, and subsequent acts, upon a few articles only:

In this enumeration I have not touched upon a twentieth part of the fresh taxation threatened. Mechanics' tools, implements, fire-tongs, shovels, are increased from thirty-five per cent. to fifty. All machinery is more or less affected. There is scarcely a trade or class of trade upon which the Pennsylvania cormorants have not made a fresh levy to satiate, if possible, their insatiable maws. Human ingenuity, sir, is wonderful when prompted by self-interest. The device of ad valorem duties, mingled with specific duties, is one of these efforts of human ingenuity to extort great bounties, and to concentrate while extorting. This is well illustrated by the duty on files:

FILES.

Statement of combined, specific, and ad valorem duties actually paid on invoice of best quality files imported into New York in 1863.

$661 3 5 is $3,200, or over 51½ per cent. duty.....$1,644 90

"On the best files over ten inches, the specific duty of six cents per pound is equal to an additional ad valorem duty of over twenty-one per cent.

"On the best files, ten inches and under, the specific duty of ten cents per pound is equal to an additional ad valorem duty of over twenty-one per cent.

"On the medium quality of files (not the best) the specific duty is from eight to ten per cent. higher than on the best, making a duty of about sixty-five per cent.

"And on common files, which are largely imported, the specific duty, with the ad valorem duty, is equal to a duty of seventy per cent. ad valorem."

Now, enormous as is this duty on files, the proposition is to increase it from ten cents, the present tariff, to twelve cents, and six to eight cents per pound. And yet files are used more or less by every machine shop in the country, and by farmers and blacksmiths, too; every one who works in iron or metals uses them. Every lumber or saw-mill is a consumer.

TABLE CUTLERY.

The table cutlery companies are now dividing large profits from their manufactures of butcher knives, shoe knives, cooks' knives, spatulas, and palettes also. Table cutlery costing less than 20s. 6d. sterling, or five dollars, is that which is used by the poorer classes of people, and large quantities of this grade of goods were formerly sold when the duty (old duty) was at twenty-four per cent.; and it is now proposed to change the present thirty-five per cent. to forty per cent., upon this grade especially.

As to table cutlery with ivory, pearl, or metal handles, it is proposed to add one dollar per dozen, and increase from thirty to forty-five per cent. The table of calculations below shows that the increase of duties (varying, unsettled, and annoying to the merchant and to the custom-house officials) is much more than would at first appear. From thirty-five per cent. ad valorem the duty, as shown, is increased by this compound duty to from eighty to one hundred and twenty-five per cent. on these particular goods. It is also provided that ivory, unmanufactured, should be exempt from duty, which of course provides for additional profits, beside the additional duty, for the American manufacture of ivory handles for table cutlery and other cutlery.

As to the table cutlery with other than ivory, pearl, or metal handles, the compound duty of twelve cents per dozen, and forty per cent. ad valorem, increases the present duty from thirty-five to one hundred per cent., and even higher. This particular clause, the last referred to, seems to have been framed without reference to the provision previously made relative to "table cutlery valued at not over five dollars per gross," and if some alteration is not made in one or other of these clauses, and they should both become a part of the law, there will be confusion at the custom-house.

On "butcher knives, cooks' and shoe knives, and spatulas and palettes," the advanced duties proposed are enormous, as the values of these goods range from fifty cents to about two dollars per dozen, and of course those costing fifty cents by paying twelve cents per dozen and fifty per cent. ad valorem would be taxed equal to seventy-five per cent. ad valorem, and those costing higher than fifty cents per dozen would be taxed proportionately at less ad valorem. As to the duty on pocket-knives now proposed, the table annexed shows the differences in the ad valorem duties thus: those now taxed at fifty per cent. will be by proposed tariff taxed at from seventy-one per cent. to six hundred and seventy-five per cent. duty. These calculations cover nearly all the grades now or likely to be imported.

All cutlery, other than pocket, now paying thirty-five per cent. duty, with all expenses added, now costs to import about sixty-seven and a half per cent. advance, or at the rate of $7 50 per pound sterling in gold, equal in gold to thirty-seven and a half cents to the English shilling.

Pocket-knives, paying fifty per cent. duty, as now, cost to import (adding all other expenses) about eighty per cent. advance, or about eight dollars per pound sterling in gold, or forty cents in gold to the English shilling.

All these goods, (pocket and table cutlery,) when in former years they paid twenty-four per cent. duty, cost only about fifty per cent. advance, or say $6 67 per pound sterling, and could be sold at a profit by importers for $7 50 per pound sterling, or thirty-seven and a half cents to the shilling sterling.

STEEL, OR RATHER, STEAL.

The steelmen—and the reporter will report me rightly, s-t-e-e-l, not s-t-e-a-l—propose a heavy levy upon us now. They demand an enormous bounty, though under existing bounties they have been doing wonderfully well. They began in 1859 with a protection of only twelve per cent. ad valorem, and have now reached a prosperous production of over thirty thousand tons per annum, and they are demanding a further increase of at least fifty per cent.

That the vast increase of duties proposed is not for protection but for monopoly, in its most odious form, is fully shown by the domestic manufacturers themselves in a memorial addressed to the Thirty-Ninth Congress, a copy of which I have in hand. In that memorial, signed by all the domestic manufacturers in the country, they say:

"The duties on steel in 1861 were agreed upon by the representatives of the foreign and American manufacturers before the Committee of Ways and Means of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate, as being well adapted to the existing state of the steel manufacture in this country. A small increase was allowed in 1862 to compensate in part for the domestic tax then first levied. Always before 1861 steel was admitted at about half the revenue rate, there being no American cast-steel of the better quality made until 1859, when its manufacture in this country became an assured success. The American manufacture of steel had attained, from 1859 to the commencement of the rebellion, very considerable proficiency, and during the succeeding four years made rapid progress, competing successfully for the market with the best English brands, which had previously enjoyed the monopoly of the trade.

"The defeat of this monopoly during the war conferred advantages on our Government in the purchase of this indispensable material which should, of itself, entitle the home manufacturer to the fostering care of Congress." "A few years of such support will place the manufacture of American steel beyond the reach of foreign competition, and enable us to dispute, on equal terms, with our English antagonists for the markets of the world."

If the manufacture of steel in this country became an assured success in 1859, with a protection of only twelve per cent. ad valorem, and if, with the increase of duties by the tariff of 1861-62, the domestic manufacturer was enabled to compete for the market with the best English brands, and defeat a monopoly previously enjoyed by the foreign maker, with the certainty that the continuance for a few years longer of such duty would enable the American manufacturer to dispute with the English "on equal terms for the markets of the world," with what face can these same parties now come before Congress and demand an increase of sixty per cent. upon the present extravagant rates? Was there ever such effrontery as this? What must be the opinion of the steel-makers of the Congress to which such an impudent appeal is made?

RAILROAD IRON—STEEL RAILS.

A nation's highways are the veins and arteries of a nation—what the circulation of blood is to human life, and as indispensably necessary for the common wealth of a nation. They convey the pulsations of the great heart of the nation to its every limb and branch, and as that heart beats, the head, the hand, the eye, the finger, and the brain all respond. Fulton did wonders for the American people upon its rivers and highways, and hastened its progress westward and southward years and years; but it was the locomotive that first threaded the passes of the Alleghanies, stretched itself out to the great lakes, then shot across the prairies, and now heaves and pants and thunders on the Rocky mountains, and opens for us rapidly the highway to the Pacific sea. There are, at the present time, about forty-two thousand miles of railroad in the United States. Their cost in round numbers is estimated at $1,600,000,000. They transport one hundred million tons of merchandise annually, having a value of $10,000,000,000. Upon this immense interest, which conveys the farmer's produce from the distant West to the eastern market, and which in return takes back to that farmer the manufactures and tools he must use, what folly it is to increase the cost of transfer by heavy taxes upon railroad iron, the basis of all this traffic and highways! The economy of railway transportation depends, in a good degree, upon the cheapness of the rails, and yet this bill and other bills before us propose enormously to increase the tariff on steel rails, only to benefit some forty-odd rolling-mills in Pennsylvania—of the sixty now in the whole United States—when these rolling-mills now are so prosperous that they can hardly supply the demand upon them for rails.

The cost and duty on iron rails now in New York is as follows:

	Gold.
Cost of iron in Wales, £6 10s. at $4 84.....	$31 46
Freight averages twenty shillings sterling per ton, or.....	6 00
Insurance, in gold.....	1 50
Duty to United States, seventy cents per one hundred pounds, say 2,240 pounds to the ton.....	15 68

Actual cost to the importer.....$54 64

Lighterage, storage, &c., on arrival, to be added.

This is "protection," which would seem to be enough when we remember the tax is $15 68 in gold, or about $21 25 in currency, per ton of iron, without the incidentals alluded to. The dissatisfaction of the rolling-mills of Pennsylvania, however, is not now so much with this "protection," though they are asking for more, as it is with the new Bessemer process of making steel rails.

HO. OF REPS.

The Tariff—Mr. Brooks.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Experience has long since proved the utter inadequacy of the iron rails, now in use, to resist the enormous weight and speed of the trains passing over them. The need of another improvement in locomotion, as valuable as was the substitution of the T for the flat bar laid upon wooden sleepers has become imperative. Upon it depend the lives and safety of travelers as well as immense reduction in the cost of transportation. To meet such needs the skill of the inventor and mechanic is always adequate and timely. By the Bessemer process steel rails are now manufactured in England at a cost of a little over three cents per pound; thus bringing the price of an article, indispensable to safety and a proper economy, within reach of all our roads. A steel rail, it is now ascertained, will outlast ten iron rails, and the economy is as five to one. Iron, consequently, is no longer a suitable material for railways. Iron has a fibrous structure; steel, granular. Iron soon laminates under heavy pressure; steel wears uniformly. The iron-mongers of Pennsylvania are therefore alarmed by the importation of Bessemer or pneumatic rails, the patent on which in this country as well as in Europe secures a complete monopoly to the manufacturer. The present duty is forty-five per cent. ad valorem, which, with one and a half cents per pound additional, makes three cents per pound in gold—a prohibitory duty which will stop the importation of steel rails and secure the monopoly, if such rails are used at all, to the Bessemer patent men in this country. The present duty equals $27 50 per ton, which it is proposed to raise to $65 10, so that the cost shall be here, in gold:

Cost in England.....	$60 00 per ton.
Freight.....	6 25
Duties.....	65 10

$131 35

Interest, insurance, lighterage, and storage to be added.

The proposed duty exceeding the cost of the article is a prohibitory duty, and therefore an irresistible victory for the steel-rail monopolists.

Sir, there is great and just complaint in this country of the bad quality of the rails used, and of the loss of life and limb therefrom. The British send here their refuse rails and we re-roll them and sell them as American iron. We tempt the roads in every way to use poor rails. We use in this country every year seven hundred thousand tons of such rails, owing to the enormous duties we impose upon foreign railroad iron, while we are proposing to have no steel rails at all, unless the patent Bessemer process men here will in mercy make them for us to use at any price they name. By act of Congress the Pacific roads are compelled to use American, that is, Pennsylvania iron, not steel railroad iron, for that is not yet made in the United States; and the Central Pacific road is actually compelled to take its iron from the interior of Pennsylvania, and to transport it the whole length of the South American continent twice, via Cape Horn, to land it in San Francisco, where it costs $100 per ton, when Welsh iron could be delivered there for about half the price the Pennsylvania iron costs. All the railroad materials that enter into these roads must be of American, that is, of Pennsylvania iron. The whole thing is cruel to commerce and trade and transportation, and it is cruel to part a continent in this way when a nation is giving subsidies to cement it, too. Pennsylvania ought to be content with her duty on coal, which shuts off from New England about all the Nova Scotia coal, for it costs more in New York to get coal from western Pennsylvania and western Virginia than it would to bring Pictou coal to New York, for Pictou coal could be delivered there at five dollars per ton, while we have been paying eleven or twelve dollars for anthracite and nine dollars for Cumberland. The whole thing is wrong, wrong, wrong; and no words are strong enough adequately to condemn it.

THE WEALTH OF THE IRON-MONGERS.

But, sir, I am told the iron men and coal men of Pennsylvania are making no money. I know better. The iron and coal mines of Pennsylvania are owned largely in the city I represent, and I know no better property. The capital to work them comes from my constituents, and I know their wealth, their prosperity. I represent iron men and steel men and coal men. I know hundreds of them, and I see daily the wives and children and equipages of these men when at home. I meet them in social life here, there, and everywhere, and I know the immense profits which these men are realizing from the existing enormous bounty. Look at their wives and daughters in the parlors of New York, with thousands and tens of thousands of dollars' worth of diamonds or jewels encircling their fair arms and necks, and glistening and adorning their persons. These iron and coal men are reveling in wealth from the bountiful protection of this Government, and yet they come here crying poverty and asking for more and more protection from the laborers and the hard-fisted mechanics and farmers of this great country. It is shocking, it is barbarous. It is vain, utterly vain, to tell me, or those that are seeing the sights that I am seeing daily in the great metropolis of New York, that the iron men or the coal men in any part of the country are suffering for the want of protection; and yet they come here asking for a doubling and tripling of those duties on some sorts of iron, for more and more protection, as it is called, on almost everything, and they expect, by combination and log-rolling, to carry all they demand. Shame! Shame! Shame upon the cupidity of all concerned.

FELT CARPETS, FELT DRUGGETS—COST, ETC.

The iron-mongers of Pennsylvania know human nature well enough to know they cannot get anything without giving something, and hence we have several little sops in this bill—among them one as follows:

On felt druggets, felt carpets, and carpeting, printed and colored, or otherwise, twenty-five cents per square yard; and in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

The carpet men have been to Congress five times since the civil war began to increase their bounties: first, in 1861; second, in 1862; third, in 1863; fourth, in 1864-65; and fifth, March 2, 1867. The duties are now as follows, in gold:

	Previous to 1861.	Now.
Aubusson and Axminster.....	24 per cent.	50 per cent.
Wilton carpets.....	24 per cent.	77 per cent.
Velvet carpets.....	24 per cent.	62½ per cent.
Brussels carpets.....	24 per cent.	74 per cent.
Tapestry carpets.....	24 per cent.	75 per cent.
Ingrain carpets.....	24 per cent.	58½ per cent.
Druggets carpets.....	19 per cent.	97 per cent.
Average.....	23 per cent.	70 per cent.

Well, they got enough in 1867; but keen and acute as they were they forgot felt druggets, as they call felt carpeting; and so, in 1868—lo presto, here they are again! The carpet manufacturing in this country is now mainly in the manufacturing hands of five or six great capitalists, or houses, that own the Bigelow patent; and rolling in wealth, as they are, inflicting upon every one of us who own or tread upon a carpet from forty to fifty cents clear bounty to them per yard, they naturally enough waxed fat and rich on profits, save in this single but slight forgetfulness of the "felt." To purchase five hundred yards of assorted carpets and druggets (the average supply for an ordinary house) formerly cost about $1,000. It now costs $2,500, or two and a half times as much. Of this increase the Government gets say $500, and the manufacturers $1,000. And now will they not let the poor, in peace, buy a little felt, whether it is colored or printed, or not?

Felt carpeting is now admitted at forty per cent., but in this bill the desire is to classify it as a drugget, to pay a duty of twenty-five cents per square yard, and in addition thirty-five per cent. ad valorem. A quality costing in England—

One shilling and nine pence (forty-two cents), at twenty-five cents per square yard and thirty-five per cent. duty, is forty-seven cents a yard—equal to one hundred and twelve per cent. ad valorem.

Two shillings and two pence (fifty-two cents), at twenty-five cents per square yard, duty as above, is fifty-one cents a yard—equal to ninety-eight per cent. ad valorem.

TAX ON CHEAP BOOKS, BIBLES, ETC.

Once more, Mr. Chairman, I shall trouble you with statistics, and then I am done with them, and though I might go on with them for hours, yet I will select but one more, to show the spirit of this bill, and that is in the tax on books and knowledge:

Lines from 175 to 186.—On all books printed and manufactured prior to the year 1850, five cents per pound; provided that no more than five copies of any book shall be imported in any one invoice.

On all bibles and testaments, the value of which is less than fifty cents each, ten cents per pound.

On all books in the English language, bound, stitched, or in sheets, printed since the year 1849, of which editions are printed in the United States, and all printed matter not otherwise provided for, twenty-five cents per pound.

To show how the workings of such a tariff would not only be entirely prohibitory as to any revenue therefrom, but would also deprive the people of cheap reading, I have herewith appended some calculations exhibiting the difference between the present duty and the proposed duty of about one hundred and twenty-five per cent. on cheap reading, and only about five per cent. difference on the reading for the rich. The books upon which these calculations are based have been weighed and found as noted for the purpose by Mr. William W. Swaney, of Brooklyn, New York, the importer:

Books for the People.	Cost.	Dutiable.	In gold. Present rate of duty 25 per cent. ad valorem .	Weight each.	In gold. Proposed duty at 25c. per lb.	Proposed duty, specified, equal to an ad valorem duty of Wayside Posies.....	12s. sterling.	$2 88 gold.	72 cents.	3 lb. 8 oz.	87½ cents.....	Proposed equal to an ad valorem duty of only 30 per cent.

HO. OF REPS.

THE CONCLUSION.

And now, Mr. Chairman; though conscious that I have done but feeble justice in the analysis of some few of the items in the tariff bills to be acted upon this session, I must stop. There is a limit to human endurance of such dry topics as I have dwelt upon, and though surprised by the earnest attention you have given me, when on a subject so dry, I will not exhaust that patience by a longer draft upon it. Read the bills yourselves, members of the House. Take nothing on trust. Every item or almost every item in this bill is full of money, and full of bounties, and full of reflection, too. Listen not to the rich lobbies that envelop you, but to your own studies, and to the interests of your constituents at home. The British tariff, the greatest manufacturing and now the greatest commercial nation in the world, has but fifty-five items in it for all the various branches of business. The English Custom-House Manual for 1867 is a little pamphlet for the vest pocket, not quite four inches long by two and a half in width. Our American tariff contains some nine hundred and fifty dutiable articles of drugs and druggists' goods alone, and the whole is a profound study, a vast puzzle. Smuggling and fraud and corruption have increased under it to an enormous and frightful extent, and are daily increasing. Reduction, abolition, is what ought to be done with the most of it; but here is increase, increase, and nothing but increase, proposed. What is bad we are called upon to make worse, and in nothing to do better. Will the House, then, assent to all this? I see some men of my own party, on the Democratic side, voting with those on the other, the Radical side, men from Pennsylvania, who think they must respond to the passion or prejudice of their own associates. But, thank God! I see at last, some on the other side who, emancipating themselves from the thralldom of the past, now vote for the people as a whole, and for the interests of the consumers of the country.

Let not this matter, then, be mingled with party politics. Let it be looked at as a question of great public interest. Let the farmer be heard; let the mechanic be heard; let the laborer be heard; let the man who lives on a paltry salary be heard; let all other interests be heard except these tremendous monopolies now thronging the Halls of this Capitol and overwhelming us with their cries for protection, protection, everlasting and eternal protection, more and more, louder and louder, the more we give.

Funding the National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. W. H. KELSEY,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1869,

On the bill (H. R. No. 1287) to provide for funding and paying the national debt and for taxing the interest-bearing bonds hereafter issued by the United States, and for other purposes.

MR. KELSEY. Mr. Speaker, one of the most important duties that this Congress is called upon to perform is to establish and settle a financial policy for the Government that shall be just to the public creditors and satisfactory to the people. To do this there must be no taint of repudiation in any form mingled with the policy to be established, and it must provide for the payment of our debt within a reasonable time, just as the public creditors had a right to understand and believe that it would be paid when they lent their money to the Government.

There is no subject upon which men have differed more widely than upon this, and there is none that requires a more careful examination, to the end that the best possible system may be established. The bill passed at our last session, and which failed to become a law because it did not receive the sanction of the Executive, contains some wise provisions, but I doubt very much whether it is entirely satisfactory to half a dozen members of this House. Almost every member doubtless has a plan of his own that he deems better than the bill that was passed within half an hour of the adjournment of our last session. A careful examination of the various plans that have been submitted and that will be submitted may enable us to adopt the one that is best, or out of these various plans we may extract the material for a system of finance that will be acceptable to the country. It is in this spirit and in this hope that I ask attention to the bill I have introduced upon this subject.

On the 22d of June last I had the honor to introduce a bill (H. R. No. 1287) to provide for funding the national debt and for taxing the interest-bearing bonds hereafter issued by the United States, and for other purposes. Since that time I have revised and amended it in some particulars, and I now ask the attention of the House to its provisions, because I have reason to believe that while it would, if adopted, establish a financial policy entirely just toward the public creditors, it would at the same time give as general satisfaction to the people who are not public creditors as any plan that has as yet been submitted to this House. A careful analysis of the bill will determine whether I am right or not on these points.

The first section of the bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to issue registered or coupon bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, and of denominations of $100 or any multiple of that sum, payable, principal and interest, in coin, at such places in Europe or the United States as he shall designate, and bearing interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, and bearing date so as to require the payment of an equal amount of the interest quarter yearly; such bonds to be payable in fifty years from date, and to be redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the United States after twenty-five years from date; to be issued to an amount sufficient to cover all outstanding or existing interest-bearing obligations of the United States, and to be exchanged for such obligations or disposed of in such manner and on such terms, not less than par, as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem most conducive to the interests of the Government; and the said bonds and the proceeds thereof shall be exclusively used for the redemption of or in exchange for the existing interest-bearing securities of the United States.

The second section provides that the bonds issued under the first section of this act shall be known as the "consolidated debt of the United States," and the same shall be exempt from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the same and the interest thereon and the income therefrom shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States, except that there shall be deducted and retained in the Treasury from the interest or coupons of said bonds at the time of paying such interest or coupons one half of one per cent. on said bonds semi-annually as taxes, which taxes shall be semi-annually, and immediately after they are so deducted and retained, invested in the bonds hereby authorized to be issued, and shall, together with the interest that shall accrue upon the bonds in which such taxes are invested, form a sinking fund for the payment of the national debt, and the sinking fund hereby created shall be in lieu of the sinking fund provided by the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February 25, 1862.

The third section provides that whenever any bond shall be purchased for and on account of the sinking fund created by this act it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the same to be legibly stamped, as follows: "this bond belongs to the sinking fund of the United States," and the said bond shall be immediately entered by its date, number, and amount in a book to be provided by said Secretary and kept for that purpose; and all bonds so purchased shall be safely kept by the Secretary of the Treasury, and all the interest accruing thereon shall be semi-annually invested in the bonds authorized to be issued by this act, and added to the sinking fund created by this act.

The fourth section provides that the several interest-bearing bonds of the United States already issued that are redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, after a certain number of years from their date, shall at the option of the holder thereof be exchanged for the bonds authorized by this act; provided that such bonds as are now redeemable at the pleasure of the Government shall be presented for exchange within six months after this act takes effect; and such bonds as hereafter become so redeemable shall be presented for exchange within six months after the same become redeemable, and such exchange shall be made at such places and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Section five provides that the bonds issued pursuant to the provisions of this act may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, as security for the redemption of national bank notes, pursuant to the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States stocks, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved February 25, 1863; and after six months from the passage of this act no other bonds than those authorized to be issued by this act shall be received or held by the Treasurer of the United States as security for the redemption of national bank notes; and in all cases the amount of bonds deposited with said Treasurer as security for the redemption of national bank notes shall be fifteen per cent. greater than the amount of national bank notes that shall be delivered to any national bank for issue and circulation.

Section six provides that it shall be lawful for any number of persons, not less than five, to establish a bank having a capital of not less than $100,000, pursuant to the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States stocks, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved February 25, 1863, by depositing with the Treasurer of the United States bonds of the United States authorized by this act to be issued, to an amount exceeding by fifteen per cent. the amount of national bank notes to be delivered to such bank by the Treasurer of the United States for issue and circulation, and complying with the other provisions of said act, approved February 25, 1863, except as to the security to be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States for the redemption of the circulating notes of such bank, which security shall be given as required in this act.

The seventh section repeals all provisions of law inconsistent with this act.

The objects of this bill are so apparent that it may be entirely unnecessary to attempt to explain or enforce them. But having the opportunity to do so, I will say a few words to prevent any misapprehension or misconception of my object in submitting this bill for your consideration.

First. I desire to reduce the amount of interest we are paying on the national debt. It is conceded on all hands that we are paying too much interest. We can certainly borrow money now upon more favorable terms than we could when we were engaged in a deadly struggle with a powerful enemy to maintain the existence of our Government; and we ought to do so. In making a new loan for this purpose we ought to fix the terms and time of its payment and provide the means for its payment, so that there shall be no misunderstanding as to the terms of the contract and no failure on the part of the Government to perform it.

It is proposed by this bill to issue new bonds, payable, both principal and interest, in coin, at five per cent. interest, payable semi-annually, the principal to be payable in fifty years from date and to be redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the United States, after twenty-five years from date, to an amount sufficient to cover all the outstanding interest-bearing obligations of the United States. And these bonds are to be used solely for the purpose of redeeming the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, either by exchanging the new bonds for old ones or selling them for money and using the money to redeem the present outstanding bonds. Great complaint has been made because the present outstanding bonds of the Government are not taxable by State, municipal, or local authority, nor by the General Government, except upon their interest or income.

I shall not stop to show that the United States Government can never permit the securities it issues, when compelled to borrow money, to be taxed by any authority save its own, and that it cannot tax them itself without committing a breach of faith, unless the provision is made for such taxation in the law that authorizes the borrowing the money, or at all events before the lender has parted with his money to the Government. All this has been demonstrated so often that it is only necessary to allude to it here. This bill provides that the bonds we propose to issue shall be taxed for one purpose, and for one purpose only, and that is to form a sinking fund to pay the principal of the national debt. This tax is to be retained out of the interest as it becomes due, and invested in the same kind of bonds, so that the interest on the sinking fund will be compounded every six months, and this sinking fund—according to a computation made by a competent and careful mathematician, which I have before me—will absorb and redeem the entire national debt in forty years and nine months if the Government shall always be able to purchase the bonds for the sinking fund without paying more than their par value for them. But it is believed that these bonds will within a few years command a premium in market, so that it will require nearly or quite the entire fifty years that the bonds have to run to redeem the whole debt.

It may be said that there is no necessity for taxing the bonds at all; that we might just as well issue the bonds at four per cent. and exempt them from taxation entirely, and appropriate from the Treasury a sum equal to one per cent. on the amount of the bonds to the sinking fund. This is merely another way to accomplish the same object, and not so good a one as that proposed in the bill. If the bill as it stands is adopted, whenever the appropriations are made to pay interest the appropriations for the sinking fund are included in them; so that the sinking fund will not be neglected or forgotten, as is very likely to be the case if any other course is adopted. There is a law on your statute-books now creating a sinking fund, but I cannot learn that any money has been invested pursuant to that law or that the sinking fund has tangible existence. It seems to me that the provisions of the bill will render it more certain that the law will be executed in all its parts than to separate the appropriations for interest on the debt from the appropriations for the sinking fund.

The three leading points in the bill are: first, to reduce the amount of interest the Government must pay; second, to tax the bonds proposed to be issued; and third, to create a sinking fund that will absorb the bonds and pay off the entire debt within the time the bonds have to run.

The question naturally arises, will the holders of the present securities issued by the Government bearing six per cent. interest be willing to exchange them for the new bonds bearing five per cent. interest, and subject to a tax that leaves the holder only four per cent. of net income? There are several considerations that will have a material influence in deciding this question. The length of time the new bonds have to run will add to their value. The fact that no question can arise as to how or in what kind of currency both the principal and the interest are to be paid will aid in giving them value in the markets of the world; and the further fact that they will be the only bonds that can be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States as security for the redemption of national bank notes will give them additional value in our own country, and, it is believed, will induce the holders of our present bonds in this country to exchange them for the new issue. If they should not be willing to make the exchange the Secretary of the Treasury can sell the new bonds and redeem the old ones. The removal of the restriction upon the establishment of national banks, as provided in the bill, will create a demand for a large amount of these new bonds to furnish security for the redemption of their circulating notes; and the circulating notes will furnish to the people a sound currency sufficient in amount to transact the business of the country and prevent anything like panic or even pressure in the money market when we return to specie payments; which ought to be done at the earliest practicable moment. But it seems to me that the most formidable obstacle to the resumption of specie payments is the fact that we have no settled financial policy.

I have purposely avoided making any provisions in relation to the funding of the legal-tender notes, because I think we can resume specie payments as soon as the present interest-bearing bonds are provided for by a proper funding policy and the expenses of the Government are reduced to the lowest practicable point. We shall then have only the legal-tender notes to redeem in specie, and the people will not be anxious for their immediate redemption, because they will be much more convenient for use than the specie itself. Of course, there must be a general resumption of specie payments by the banks and the people at the same time the Government resumes such payments. But I do not now propose to discuss this branch of the financial policy that should be adopted, and have alluded to it mainly for the purpose of stating my views as to what ought to be done with the legal-tender notes, and to show that the bill proposed leaves them to be provided for as Congress shall hereafter direct.

Some policy must be adopted to pay our national debt. And it would seem that the wisest and best policy is that which sets apart from the taxes collected from the people and securely invests a specific sum every year or every half year for that purpose.

REMARKS OF HON. G. W. JULIAN,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1869,

On the bill (S. No. 570) granting land and the right of way over the public lands to the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, so much has been said already on the proposition before the House that I do not think it worth while to consume much time in its further discussion.

It comes here from the Senate in a very questionable shape, and, however honestly drawn, is certainly open to very diverse interpretations. The right of the road to the subsidy asked is, to say the least, very debatable, and the importance of the bill in other respects demands for it the most careful consideration; and yet the bill has never been sent to any committee of this House. It is taken from the Speaker's table for action without the customary reference and report, and in disregard of the well-settled and wholesome usages of this body; and I propose, therefore, if the opportunity shall offer, to move the reference of the bill and its various amendments to the Committee on the Public Lands.

But the measure is now before us for action, and I desire, in the first place, to say a word on the general subject of land grants in aid of railroads. I do not agree with my colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] in their hostility to all such grants. I think they forget the wholesome duty of discrimination. Neither common sense nor a regard for the true interests of the country will warrant their wholesale opposition to such legislation. I have recently been much interested in the facts and figures of Commissioner Wells on the subject of railway extension, and the able speech of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] on the same subject, showing that our foreign immigration increases in the ratio of our railway extension; that our exports and imports increase in the same proportion, as does also our domestic trade; that the settlement and population of our western States and Territories obey the same general law, thereby increasing production and supplying the means of paying our national debt; and that railway extension, as shown by our military commanders, is the true and only solution of our Indian problem, which is costing us so many millions.

These are very pregnant facts, and they call for a liberal policy on the part of Congress toward railroad enterprises. Under proper restrictions I would grant them public lands, and this House has already decided that these restrictions shall be such as I have proposed in the amendment I offered to this bill the other day, namely, that the lands shall be granted on the express condition that they shall be sold to actual settlers only, in quantities not greater than one quarter section to one purchaser, and for a price not exceeding $2 50 per acre. This will avoid the complete monopoly of the lands, as sanctioned by the old system of land grants, and at the same time devote to settlement and tillage the odd-numbered sections granted, while creating in this way established communities and a local business along the line of the road. This, sir, is the true policy; and the whole land grant system of our country will be repudiated by the people, and ought to be repudiated, unless it shall be made to conform to the conditions I have stated.

A word only, Mr. Speaker, on the question of subsidies. I do not think our financial condition justifies these expenditures in addition to subsidies in lands. I believe, also, that the most important of these enterprises will be carried on without such aid. They will construct themselves; and the gentleman from Minnesota admits this, as to the Northern Pacific railway, in concluding his argument in favor of aiding it by the Government. During the railway period of thirty years, ending with the year 1865, we have built in the United States annually an average of eleven hundred and fifty-six miles, and since that year, and including it, the average of miles annually has more than doubled. Last year we built twenty-five hundred miles, and the work does not promise to slacken. Commissioner Wells estimates that the gross earnings of our roads pay for building them in a little more than four years. Who believes, in view of the energy and spirit of adventure of our people and the manifest fact that these enterprises pay, that large subsidies in money are necessary to keep them alive? Who does not see, in the enormous profits of the Union Pacific road and the frightful monopoly which is sure to follow, reasons for withholding like aid to kindred enterprises? We need, to be sure, competing lines, and we shall have them, subsidies or no subsidies. No legislation or failure to legislate can prevent it. I heartily wish we were now able to aid this and other projected lines to the Pacific, and thus quicken and hurry forward the energy and progress which are the sure attendants of railway extension, as I have already said. I wish we were financially able to be as liberal and as lavish to all our great roads as we have been to some. The misfortune is that we are not, and I think our duty is to confess it, and to trust to the spirit and enterprise of our people and the evident tendency of railway development to go forward of itself rather than to continued subsidies in the present greatly burdened condition of our Treasury.

Denver Pacific Railway.

SPEECH OF HON. A. F. STEVENS,

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1869,

On the bill (S. No. 570) for a grant of land and granting the right of way over the public lands to the Denver Pacific railway, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, in the investigation of this subject, which involves the question of granting additional aid to the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, I have sought to derive the information which is to guide my action from sources at once disinterested and responsible. I have listened with great interest to the debate on this floor. I have heard the fierce and violent denunciation against the measure uttered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VAN TRUMP.] I have heard the measure opposed on the ground of unconstitutionality and on the ground of extravagance.

Having been reared in a school which recognizes the power of the General Government to aid the great work of internal improvements, and belonging to a party which illustrated its devotion to that policy by inaugurating and maintaining a system of Pacific railroads, even in the midst of war, which are to unite the interests and the civilization of the continent in bonds of iron, if not of steel, I have nothing to offer in response to the former objection except my general dissent to a doctrine which may be considered as antiquated and out of date, useful only to some ancient politician seeking a sensational or short-lived notoriety in the revival of an old political heresy contemporaneous with State rights, nullification, and the "resolutions of '98." To the latter, as a practical question of the highest moment, of the greatest importance in our present condition, and never to be lost sight of, even in the midst of prosperity, I accord the highest regard and consideration. If this is a measure of extravagance it cannot have my support. I will go further, sir, and bring it to the test of a severer criticism. If it is not a measure of economy it shall not receive my support. And it is in the light of this protestation, earnestly and sincerely made, that I propose very briefly and succinctly, I trust, to discuss this bill.

It is very evident that much of the heated and declamatory denunciation indulged in by gentlemen in opposition to this bill has no bearing, even in its terms, upon the corporation which seeks aid at our hands. There is another corporation, known as the Union Pacific railroad, on which gentlemen have expended a vast amount of vituperation, and which, if it was capable of being annihilated by words, high-sounding and defiant, would not have survived the early stages of this debate. I was greatly stirred by the earnestness of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VAN TRUMP] in this particular. I had listened with the most considerate attention to the charges so ardently enunciated by the gentleman from Illinois, and was, I confess, somewhat disappointed to find his philippics directed principally against a corporation not benefited by this bill, and whose road is a hundred and fifty miles further north.

Then came the gentleman from Ohio, to whom I listened with attention; and when I heard him pouring the hot-shot of his fiery indignation into some imaginary and soulless monster I drew nearer in order to get a glimpse of the victim, and found it, not the party provided for in this bill, but the same terrific and monstrous production of our former legislation, the Union Pacific railroad. Now, sir, I have little to say in this connection about the Union Pacific railroad. If it has any interest in this bill it has an interest to defeat it, for that defeat would give it a practical and permanent monopoly in the transit of our commerce and travel across the continent. If the gentlemen from Illinois and Ohio had been the special advocates of a railroad monopoly across this continent, I know of no way they could have discharged their office more efficiently than by the identical opposition they have made to the passage of this bill. Whatever else their remarks tend to promote, whether it be the true interpretation of the Constitution or the interest of economy, one thing is most apparent, that they are particularly the ardent advocates of a gigantic railroad monopoly. It needs no enlargement of statement or argument to prove this. If this bill does not pass, and the Kansas branch of the Pacific railroad is suspended in its extension, the commerce of the continent is at the mercy of the corporation which these gentlemen so earnestly denounce. That is the result. If they were the feed advocates of this mammoth serpent that winds its inevitable coil along the valleys of our western rivers and through the gates of the Rocky mountains they could not have struck a better lead or more effectually urged the establishment of a gigantic monopoly over the widespread region which separates the two great oceans.

Mr. Speaker, I have said that the railroad which had drawn down the lightning of these invectives is not the beneficiary of this bill. Let us take a look at the map of our western domain, and see what is in fact the subject of controversy. If we spread out before us the map of our western possessions we shall find a line of railroad reaching from Chicago, on and near the parallels of forty-one and forty-two degrees, westwardly through Omaha, in Nebraska, to Salt Lake City, the land of Brigham Young and the Mormon, thence to unite with the Central Pacific railroad coming east from Sacramento, and when united forming a continuous line from the Missouri to the Pacific ocean. That is the Union Pacific railroad about which all this noise has been made, and which stands as the common target of the gentlemen from Illinois and Ohio.

Cast your eye down the map till it reaches the parallel of St. Louis, in Missouri, and you will see a line of railroad stretching westerly from that city to the western border of Kansas. That portion within the State of Kansas is the Union Pacific railway, eastern division. That is the corporation which to-day asks the aid of your legislation. These roads at the nearest point are some one hundred and fifty miles distant from each other. The lower road is completed nearly to the western border of Kansas, and its construction has been suspended for want of funds.

That want of funds arises not from any fault of the corporation, but from the policy which allowed a change of location without fixing the limits to which the loans of the Government should extend. This railroad stands rectus in curia. It has violated no law. It rests, in all its operations, under the sanction of your own law, and its actions have been confined within the terms of the statute passed by Congress. It asks you now to lend the aid of the Government to extend it fifty-four miles further, and to a point known as Cheyenne Wells, from which it is to deflect to Denver, in Colorado, where it unites with the Denver Pacific railway, thus making a line which will tap the Union Pacific railroad at or near Cheyenne, near the one hundred and fifth meridian. It asks, however, no grant of land. We are not by this bill to tear from the public domain the valuable slopes of the Rocky mountains or their fertile summits, which my friend from Illinois rates at three dollars per acre. I hope, sir, he will never be obliged to inhabit them long at any price. The bill asks and proposes no additional grant of land; but it does ask of the Government a loan of $16,000 per mile to enable the corporation to make this connection, amounting in all to $860,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a large sum, not so much indeed as the Government agreed to pay for the transportation of the mails across the continent for one short year, but still a very considerable sum; a sum I do not propose to grant or vote unless demanded by the best interests of the Government and the strictest economy. Now, sir, I want to look at it in the light of the public welfare and economy. It seems to be admitted on all hands that without this loan of the credit of the Government this road must stop where it is. If we do not assist it it can go no further. What has been the experience of the past in relation to the opening of this avenue of transit? I want to call in here the authority whose testimony I invoked at the outset of my remarks, the disinterested and responsible witnesses whose observation, character, and experience give weight to their words. If I antagonize the statements of my friend from Illinois with that of any of his distinguished friends I must appeal to the records as my justification. But I will venture to call a gentleman whose word is soon to become law, and who, if he has no policy of his own, has at least a mind of his own, and pretty clearly expounds this question of aid to the Pacific railroads. Let us hear General Grant:

"During the last summer and summer before, I caused inspection to be made of the various routes of travel and supply through the territory between the Missouri river and the Pacific coast. The cost of maintaining troops in that section was so enormous that I desired, if possible, to reduce it. This I have been enabled to do to some extent from the information obtained from these inspections, but for the present the military establishment between the lines designated must be maintained at a great cost per man. The completion of the railroads to the Pacific will materially reduce this cost, as well as the number of men to be kept there. The completion of those roads will also go far toward a permanent settlement of our Indian difficulties."

The gentleman from Illinois says the railroads have set the Indians to fighting. General Grant says their extension will give us peace. Well, sir, I will ask the House to listen to the opinion of another gentleman who has never disagreed with his distinguished chief since the latter started from Vicksburg in 1863. Says General Sherman on this subject:

"The completion of this road during the present year to Fort Lyon would be a most important event to the military interests of that frontier, and the completion of the other branch (Denver branch) to coal and wood would also be most important to all the interests along the valley of the Smoky Hill, chiefly so to us who have to guard that line and provide for the wants of the necessary garrisons. It seems to me that we can, with great propriety, recommend to Congress at its present session to extend their subsidy to this company at the present rate for two hundred and fifty miles more, the aggregate amount being $4,000,000 in bonds. This road is a military necessity."

And by a singular coincidence another general, who is having some such experience with the hostile tribes of the plains and mountains as General Jackson had with the Creeks before railroads were in operation in Tennessee, gives us his opinion in about as distinct and terse language as we heard from New Orleans before he was relieved from that command. General Phil. Sheridan tells us:

"I know that peculiarly it would be to the advantage of the Government to help this road; certainly as far as Fort Wallace, and also to Fort Lyon. But, in addition, it almost substantially ends our Indian troubles by the moral effect which it exercises over the Indians, and the facility which it gives to the military, in controlling them. No one, unless he has personally visited this country, can well appreciate the great assistance which this railroad gives to economy, security, and effectiveness in the administration of military affairs in this department."

And a communication from General Schofield, Secretary of War, in a letter to Senator DRAKE, in July last, enters more largely into the reasons for this aid to the lower road. He says:

"In reply to your communication of July 2, respecting the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, in which you desire to know the wishes of the War Department as to the proposed extension of Government aid to that road as far as Cheyenne Wells, I have no hesitation in recommending the proposed extension."

"By reference to a letter from General Sherman to General Grant, dated March 4, 1868, now before Congress, it will be seen that a much greater aid is recommended than that now proposed, and that the road is spoken of as a military necessity."

"No man could be better able to judge of this matter than General Sherman, and I have no hesitation in endorsing his opinion."

"I believe near Cheyenne Wells is the most easterly point where a temporary depot for the supplies destined for Fort Lyon and the posts beyond can be made so as to conveniently subserve the military interests."

"Abundant water and forage at that point make it more suitable than any other point further east for such depot, while the distance (about forty miles) from Fort Wallace to Cheyenne Wells will be saved in wagon transportation of supplies."

"The proposed extension appears to be a measure of economy to the Government."

I add also the letter of General Hancock, written to the Secretary of War in July last, in which he says:

"I have the honor to state that from my knowledge of the facts concerning this road—which is probably as intimate and extensive, and, as regards actual experience, in some respects more minute as to details than that of those who have spoken favorably of the enterprise—I feel at liberty to offer the weight of my testimony in a few words, believing that the interests of the Government may be benefited thereby. I commanded the department of the Missouri last year, during an Indian war, and from my personal experience, obtained while I was on the plains, with respect to the transportation of troops and supplies by the railroad in question, as well as its great importance in connection with the settlement of that country, I feel that I can speak in strong language of the necessity of this road being extended as rapidly as possible."

"I consider any assistance given by the Government to this enterprise as most wisely and advantageously applied."

No person can fail to see in the light of this evidence that the most potent and imperative reasons are here adduced for the relief asked for in this bill. Public welfare, the industry of these newly-settled regions, the cessation of Indian hostilities, and public economy, all demand the prompt passage of this measure.

This testimony is general, though to my mind conclusive. Still there are no figures such as all political economists demand as the basis of their action. Let us, therefore, see if we can gather any light from a comparison of expense between the old system of travel in these western wilds and the new one inaugurated by this extension of railroad facilities.

Fortunately we have official evidence on this branch of the subject also. On the 25th of May, 1868, the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a letter from the Secretary of War, inclosing a letter of Lieutenant General Sherman, dated March 4, 1868, recommending Government aid to extend the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, as a military necessity and a measure of public economy, submitted a report unanimously concurred in by the committee, a portion of which I read:

"That they have carefully considered the statements therein made, and have found them confirmed by the following facts, drawn from official record."

The cost to the Government for transportation on the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, in 1867, was.....$511,998 24

If the military supplies had been wagoned and the mails carried by stage and the troops marched, (taking the average rates at which the Government made its transportation contracts for that year, as shown by certificates of the department of the Quartermaster General and Postmaster General,) the cost would have been.....1,358,291 06

Saving to the Government in 1867.....$846,382 82

"At this rate of saving all the United States bonds issued in aid of this road, principal and interest, would be extinguished in less than four years."

"These are the results of the use by the Government of the finished portion of the road in Kansas in the last year."

"In regard to the extension of the road beyond the point in Kansas at which its subsidy ends, the committee find that there are three regiments of troops in New Mexico, (two of infantry and one of cavalry,) nearly all of the supplies for which are wagoned from the end of the Kansas Pacific railway at a cost of $1 28 per hundred pounds per hundred miles. At the present freight rates of the railway, as shown by their printed schedule, the saving in transportation on these supplies to Albuquerque, on the Rio Grande, a central distributing point in New Mexico, would be per annum $851,880. We have ascertained that the additional saving to the Government in the transportation to Albuquerque of the mails, troops, and Indian supplies would be $231,992. Total annual saving, $1,083,872."

"But there is another consideration of economy in the public expenditure as the result of constructing the road. Lieutenant General Sherman has testified that one half of the military force in New Mexico could be dispensed with if the road was constructed, owing to the great mobility of the remainder and the growth of self-protecting settlements on the line of the road. As his estimate of the cost of maintaining the two regiments of infantry and one of cavalry was about four million dollars a year, the committee find that an additional saving to the Government of $2,000,000 annually would thus be effected by the road. This saving, added to the saving in the transportation of the diminished military force that would be left in New Mexico and of the supplies to maintain them, including the carriage of the mails and Indian goods and supplies, would, in less than six years, reimburse the entire loan necessary to extend the road from its present terminus to the Rio Grande."

Now, a calculation of the difference per annum in the expense on the fifty-four miles to which this loan would apply, made on the basis of the foregoing facts and figures, shows the following result: I quote from the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. CLARKE,] made in this House during the discussion of this bill. He says:

"If this bill does not pass there will be more taken from the Treasury next year, and every year thereafter, by $94,000 than heretofore, and I challenge a contradiction of the fact. Last year the Government transportation on route No. 2, beyond the present end of the track to New Mexico, as stated by General Easton, of the quartermaster general's department, was over 20,000,000 pounds, or 10,000 tons. The above 10,000 tons carried over the 54 miles for which this bill grants aid would cost, at the railroad tariff, 10-10 cents per ton per mile, which would amount to $58,300. The United States mails carried over the same distance at contract rates by railroad, $150 per mile per annum, amounts to $8,100."

"The United States troops carried last year numbered 6,225 over an average of 173 miles of road, equivalent to 2,692 taken to the end of track, which is 400 miles. The cost of transportation of these troops on the 54 miles to be constructed would amount to $12,123. Total amount of Government transportation on the 54 miles, $78,523, of which the Government would pay the railroad company under the present law but one half, or $39,262."

"Now, if these supplies should continue to be transported by wagons over the 54 miles, the mails carried by stage, and the troops marched, I estimate the cost as follows: Government freights, 10,000 tons, at 28-40 cents per ton per mile, $153,360; United States mails, at $243, per mile per annum, $13,122. The saving by transportation of 2,692 troops by railroad is estimated at one third the cost of marching the said troops; so that this saving would be one half of $12,123, or $6,062. From this statement the following facts are shown: the total cost under the present system would be $184,667. If the railroad were constructed the actual outlay of the Government would be $39,262. The yearly retrenchment on existing Government business over this 54 miles would be $145,405. Total aid in Government bonds, $864,000. Interest at six per cent., $51,840. Yearly saving to the Government over the interest, $93,565; which would wipe out the entire principal of the Government loan in less than eight years, leaving for the twenty-two years thereafter, until the bonds mature, $93,565 yearly to the Government of the United States. This sum placed at interest by the Government would yield over five million dollars by the time the bonds will become due. It is with such facts as these with which I oppose the inaccurate statements of the gentleman from Illinois."

Mr. Speaker, upon those facts I am so confident of the merits of this proposition that I am amazed, after a full examination, to find it opposed, not by facts and arguments, but by accusation and declamation. I am persuaded that the demands of the public and military necessity of this measure have been overwhelmed by the general clamor against the policy of subsidies. But this is an independent and well-recommended measure, and as such shall receive my conscientious support under the demands of that public policy which is so well established by the evidence I have read in the hearing of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I have been accustomed to bring to the consideration of questions arising here and on which I am called to act a fearless and independent judgment. While I am against the policy of granting large subsidies in the present condition of our finances I am not to be drawn from the support of an isolated, meritorious measure like this by any general clamor. The interests of the Government must be sustained, and there is in this case an array of proof conclusive upon this measure as one of economy alone. I feel, sir, that if I were to vote against this bill in the light of the evidence which I have read I should be derelict and false to the just demands of the public welfare. This is not an original question. The extension of this road is called for by the necessities of the Government, by military necessity, by the dictates of economy. I know there may be an honest difference of opinion among members on the merits of this measure, but it is one upon which every gentleman must vote under his own convictions of duty; and, guided by the investigation which I have been enabled to make, I give my support to the provisions of this bill in the full and conscientious belief that the public welfare imperatively demands that we should make the pending measure an exception to that policy which denies any further aid to our Pacific railroads.

REMARKS OF HON. W. LOUGHRIDGE, OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1869,

On the bill (S. No. 570) for a grant of land granting the right of way over the public lands to the Denver Pacific railway, and for other purposes.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I should really almost despair of anything like economy in the expenditures of the Government by this Congress if I thought there could be any probability of the passage of this bill in the form its passage is asked for by its friends upon the floor. I regard this as one of the most bare, bald, and inexcusable attempts to deplete the Treasury for private gain that I have ever known; and I say this without any personal feeling in the matter, and after having carefully listened to the speeches—I cannot say arguments—made by its friends in its advocacy.

Sir, what is the case made out? We have sat here, the Representatives of the people, and heard the claim of this railroad company to this $864,000 of additional subsidy, and now it is for us to say, representing the interests of the people and as the guardians of the Treasury, whether the claimants have made out such a case as will justify us in adding that amount to the already crushing national debt. Gentlemen of experience and of talent have advocated the claim, and if there were any sound claims or good reasons I have no doubt they would have been brought to our notice. But I must say, with all due deference to its advocates, that I have heard no one good, sound, sensible reason in support of this subsidy.

What is this case? The Government, with a great stretch of liberality, in 1862 granted to this company subsidy amounting to $16,000 a mile, and every alternate section of land for ten miles on each side of the road, to build their road from the Missouri river at the mouth of the Kansas, and to unite with the Union Pacific at the one hundredth meridian of longitude. In 1864 Congress, with a still further stretch of liberality, authorized the company to place a first mortgage upon the road for $16,000 a mile, to take precedence of the Government lien, which act they, of course, took advantage of to the last dollar. In 1866 this company applied to the Government for permission to change the route of their road, for some reason best known to themselves, and this was also granted. But the law especially provided that the company should be entitled to only the same amount of subsidy that they would have been entitled to had they connected their road with the Union Pacific at the one hundredth meridian, the distance being ascertained to be three hundred and ninety-four miles; and it further provided that the company should connect with the Union Pacific at some point not more than fifty miles west of the meridian of Denver.

Now, after having received all the subsidy they were granted, they come and ask in this bill for an additional subsidy for fifty-four miles. Why grant a subsidy for fifty-four miles to Cheyenne Wells and no further? The same reason that would justify it to Cheyenne Wells would require it clear through to the point of intersection with the Union Pacific railroad, and the reason would seem to be stronger; for the further out they get the nearer they are to the "poor Indian," who at this time seems to be a god-send to these railroad lobbyists.

Sir, what kind of a showing does this company make to us and to the country of its disposition of what it has already received with such lavish hand? It has received already—

In subsidy	$6,303,000
By first mortgage, in cash	6,303,000
Two million five hundred thousand acres of as fine land as lies in America, unless they themselves are trying to deceive the people, worth	$6,250,000
	$18,856,000

This is what they have received and have either expended or have in their possession. Their right under the law to subsidy terminated at three hundred and ninety-four miles, and they have built the road five miles beyond the point where their subsidy ceases by the present law. The company has made no showing here of the cost of that four hundred and five miles of road, as they could have done, as they ought to have done—ay, sir, as they would have done had they presented here a just and equitable claim for this fifty-four miles additional subsidy. They have the figures, the actual outlay and expense; and yet, although it has been charged upon this floor that the company has received vastly more than the road actually cost them, and have pocketed the surplus, yet not one word do we hear from them on this point. We can tell nothing of it from the contracts, for the contractors are the owners and controllers of the road, and they could gauge their contracts to suit the interests of the company.

It is computed by the Government engineer, Jesse L. Williams, that eleven hundred and ten miles of the Union Pacific road cost an average of $34,824 the whole route. This includes the portions of the road where the company received $32,000 and $48,000 per mile, the grades being heavy. It is therefore reasonable to conclude that the four hundred and five miles of this road through Kansas has not actually cost more than $25,000 per mile, which, I doubt not, is a liberal calculation. How, then, does the account stand?

Amount of cash received by the company...$12,606,000
Value of lands at $1 25 per acre...3,125,000

$15,731,000
Cost of four hundred and five miles of road, at $25,000 per mile...10,025,000

Leaving in company's hands...$5,706,000

But putting the cost as high even as $28,000 per mile, and the account stands thus:

Received by company cash...$12,606,000
Lands...3,125,000

$15,731,000
Cost of road, at $28,000 per mile...11,240,000

Leaving in hands of company...$4,494,000 of which $1,360,000 is in cash, and $3,125,000 in what they call the finest lands in America, and rated at the very low price of $1 25 per acre, many of them actually worth twenty-five to fifty dollars per acre, and I have no doubt the entire lands for the first four hundred miles average a value of three dollars per acre.

Now, sir, with this surplus in their hands, this company by their spokesman upon this floor, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, tells us with apparent candor, to use his own language, that this "great highway of nations," this "great thoroughfare between eight hundred million people in Asia and two hundred millions in Europe, has been constructed by the company and ends nowhere, and now it wants fifty-four miles of subsidy to enable it to finish the road up to Cheyenne Wells;" that if this is given the road will be carried to Cheyenne Wells, and that by so doing we will secure to the Government three hundred miles from Cheyenne Wells to Denver without subsidy, and the reasonable conclusion is that if this fifty-four miles of subsidy is not granted this great world's highway will fail to connect at Cheyenne Wells.

Now, sir, almost any American citizen of reasonable sense would naturally inquire why cannot the company take this surplus they have in their hands, over and above what the four hundred and five miles cost them, and build the fifty-four miles with that, and then have enough surplus left to give every director in the road a reasonable competence? At least they will have plenty of good lands left, where they can go to work like the mass of our constituents and earn an honest living, if they cannot make a living off a road already built and given to them by the Government.

And again, sir, the inquiry naturally suggests itself: supposing that this company had got no surplus of assets, if they can build a road from Cheyenne Wells to Denver, three hundred miles, without subsidy, why can they not build this fifty-four miles in the same way? Why must the failure to get this fifty-four miles of subsidy stop this mighty enterprise?

Sir, they can build it. They have the money to build it, and they intend to build it. But it would, of course, be very agreeable on their part to have a gift from the Government of $860,000. It is worth struggling for.

But, sir, I cannot permit myself to fear that the demands of this company will be complied with in this respect. Of one thing I am certain: the toiling millions of the people, the common people of the nation, they who have saved it by their sacrifices of treasure and of blood, and who by their toil are supporting it, have their eyes upon this Congress. They demand economy; they demand that the voting of their money to rich railroad corporations shall cease; and, sir, a political death that knows no resurrection will be the destiny of those of us who shall not heed their demands; and so it ought to be.

Gentlemen may, when they get into position, boast that they care not for "popular clamor;"

but if what is meant by "popular clamor" is the voice of the people, then he who is not influenced by it or who disregards it is, in my opinion, unfit for a legislator in a free country, where the voice of the people should be the law of the land.

Denver Pacific Railroad.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN A. LOGAN,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1869.

The House having under consideration the bill (S. No. 576) for a grant of lands granting the right of way over the public lands to the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, and for other purposes—

Mr. LOGAN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know that I will be able to throw any additional light upon the proposition now before the House, but will be very glad if I can obtain the attention of members while I refer briefly to the law heretofore passed in reference to this railroad, as well as reply to some of the remarks of gentlemen who again advocate a further subsidy for the same.

I must confess, sir, that I was surprised at some of the remarks submitted to the House the other day by the two gentlemen from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COVODE and Mr. KELLEY.] It seems to me that all that has been said by these gentlemen and others on that side of the question was an attack on the opponents of the bill designed to draw attention away from the main points in discussion; not that we have or do now oppose the extension of railroads, but that we were clogging the advance of civilization and the development of the great resources of this country. To them let me say that I allow none to be in advance of myself in a desire that the civilization of this age should extend everywhere, and that the great hidden wealth and resources of this country should be rapidly developed; and in all proper legislation for that purpose, not onerous or oppressive to the masses of the people, that will not create certainly greater liabilities on the General Government, I am, and will be at all times, ready to join them. Viewing this measure, however, in a different light, I hope they will pardon me if I cannot go with them to the extent that they claim we should. For, sir, in all the arguments which gentlemen have made in favor of this subsidy they have failed to give one solitary reason addressed to the intelligence of this House why the subsidy asked for by this bill should be granted. It is not a question of the advance of civilization—it is not a question of the development of the great resources of this country; but the question before this House and before the country is this: can this road of fifty-four miles, covered by this bill, be built at all by this company without the aid of the Government of the United States in the manner in which it is asked to be applied? They ask us to increase the public indebtedness to the extent of $16,000 per mile as subsidy to this railroad.

The question, then, is this: is it necessary to the advancement of the interests of the country that the aid asked by this bill should be granted, or can the object sought be accomplished without this aid? I contend that it can; that the company is amply able to complete this road to the point mentioned (Cheyenne Wells, fifty-four miles) without such additional aid as is now asked.

This Government has already given a subsidy to this road of land and money, and without intending any attack upon individuals or upon any person connected with this road or any other road allow me to say here to the House, from the reading of the laws passed by the Congress of the United States, taken in connection with the action of the company,

HO. OF REPS.

Denver Pacific Railroad—Mr. Logan.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

that there has been a deception practiced upon the country and upon Congress in the subsidizing of this road. I will state the facts which justify me in making this assertion. In the original charter that gave a subsidy to the Union Pacific railroad and its branches it was provided that the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, starting at Kansas City, might tap the Union Pacific railroad at the one hundredth meridian; further, that the central branch, that part from St. Joseph to Atchison and from Atchison out, might tap this eastern division of the Union Pacific railroad at or near Republican fork. This was the proposition; but afterward a law was passed allowing this Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, to swing out south or west, like the swinging round of part of an army; and when it swung round to the west it left this Atchison or central railroad standing out in the air. Why was this done? It seems to me that there must have been not only design in the whole matter, but some very sharp railroad practice, in which both companies must have engaged. A law was then passed allowing the Atchison road to extend itself at or near the one hundredth meridian, where the eastern division was to tap the Union Pacific railroad originally, thereby providing, by a little chicanery in the management of legislation, a subsidy for two roads instead of one. By this strategic maneuver the Atchison road was subsidized for one hundred miles, and this eastern division to the same extent and the same distance, as though it had been built under the former charter to the one hundredth meridian.

Allow me to repeat that by the act of July 3, 1866, it is provided that the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, shall receive no more bonds than they would have been entitled to provided they had tapped the Union Pacific railroad at the one hundredth meridian. That is the law, showing clearly that the original intention was that this division should tap the Union Pacific at the one hundredth meridian, and that this little Atchison road—and if you look at the map you will agree with me in concluding that, standing out in the air as it does; no better name can be given to it than the "stump-tail road"—was to tap at or near Republican fork, this road being about one hundred miles in length to that point, and having already received $1,600,000 subsidy from the Government. But the eastern division swung round, and both roads are subsidized. And to-day it is attempted to make you believe that by passing this act you will grant no more subsidy than it was the intention of Congress to grant when the original act was passed.

But, sir, what do we see other than the game of the old cat and her kitten? The old cat comes along and flays the game, and the kitten comes along and helps to devour it. This bill comes here from the Senate, and you are asked to give $16,000 per mile subsidy to the eastern division, or old cat. Then the little kitten, or "stump-tail road" running from Atchison, follows along, the project being under discussion in the Senate at this very time; and by the time we shall have passed this bill through the House this little kitten will come from the Senate, and we shall be asked to give additional subsidy to the amount of $2,000,000 for it. This is the way these projects are connected together.

That is the condition of these two roads. The eastern division is swung round from its original base so as to allow this Atchison road to slip in on their line and get the subsidy that the eastern division was to have; and then the eastern division is at the same time to be subsidized all the way to the town of Denver. An examination of the law and the maps will show that my statements are correct. By the act approved July 3, 1866, this eastern division of the Union Pacific railroad was to receive subsidy for only the same length of route that it would have had if it had tapped the Union Pacific at the one hundredth meridian.

What are the facts? I assert here to-day, in the face of those who advocate this subsidy, that the eastern division has received a subsidy of $16,000 per mile for seventy miles more of said road than the law authorizes them to take. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] or any of the friends of the bill to answer me this question: how is it that they have continued the eastern division of the Union Pacific road to Fort Wallace and received $16,000 per mile subsidy to that point, amounting in all to $6,000,000 paid to this eastern division, which is seventy miles more than the distance which Congress authorized, measuring from Kansas City to the one hundredth meridian at the Union Pacific, being $1,120,000 more than they are entitled to? Now I will give way to any one who will answer that question. I want it explained.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I will undertake to answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois. He asks how it is that the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, has received a subsidy of $16,000 per mile to the present terminus of the track at Fort Wallace. Am I correct?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir. I do not want the gentleman to take up my time. I just want the information.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I propose to give it. The law approved July 1, 1862, provided—and I call the particular attention of the House to this clause—as follows:

"The route in Kansas west of Fort Riley to the aforesaid point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude to be subject to the approval of the President of the United States, and to be determined by him on actual survey."

It has been stated often on this floor, under a misapprehension of this law, that the route was to follow the valley of the Republican river, and I suppose it is by that valley the gentleman has made his measurement. But I say, without fear of successful contradiction, that the route, under the direction of the President, might have followed, as I said the other day, any other route, any other one of the streams running into Kansas from the northwest, provided upon actual survey it was proved to be the most practicable route and it had united with the main line of the Union Pacific railroad, as provided by the original law, on the one hundredth meridian, between the north margin of the Platte and the south margin of the Republican river. I call attention to the fact that the President of the United States never did locate this route from Fort Riley to the one hundredth meridian, but in the mean time the Congress of the United States, under an act approved July 3, 1866, changed the route, not to the east, as the gentleman has several times incorrectly stated, but to the west, up the valley of the Smoky Hill; and it is provided in the law that no greater amount of bonds should be drawn for that route than if it had been constructed up the valley of the Republican river to the one hundredth meridian.

Now, sir, if this route had been located by the President to follow the valley of the Republican river to the one hundredth meridian, in consequence of the meandering of that river it might have reached along the present line on the Smoky Hill river to the point where the present terminus of the road is, or, following any other practicable route where it might have been located by the President, it might have extended to a point far beyond the distance for which bonds have been received by the company. As a matter of actual fact, the President of the United States has recently caused a survey to be made from Fort Riley to the one hundredth meridian, and the company have received bonds on the basis of this official survey.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, sir, the condition of the case is exactly where it was when I left it. I admit that I used the word east instead of west. It was a mere slip of the tongue. But now let me demonstrate from the gentleman's own statement that my proposition is correct. The best way to get an understanding of the law is to read it. The law of July 3, 1866, contains this proviso:

"Provided, That said company shall be entitled to only the same amount of bonds of the United States to aid in the construction of their line of railroad and telegraph as they would have been entitled to if they had constructed their said line on the one hundredth meridian to the Union Pacific."

Now, sir, there is nothing said in this act about running up the Republican fork, but the inference clearly is that it was in a direct line to the one hundredth meridian at the Union Pacific. Why have they not come before a committee of the House and showed that the route by the one hundredth meridian was the same number of miles as their survey is now to Fort Wallace? What is the fact? I have taken their own map, the map which the gentleman from Kansas used in making his speech, and I have measured it with dividers, and according to the scale of the map it is just as I state it, seventy miles over the distance for which they were to be subsidized; and I find they have no survey of the route here to show the distance. But they tell us that it would subject them to a new survey to ascertain the distance; hence they have to be paid to Fort Wallace, inasmuch as that is, in their judgment, about the distance they would have gone on a route on which they have made no survey. But, sir, you can take both routes. The route from Kansas City to the one hundredth meridian at the Union Pacific in a straight line on the map, and the route from Kansas City to Fort Wallace in a straight line, giving no advantage to either route or survey, and there is seventy miles difference; and on the latter route they have been paid to the extent of seventy miles' subsidy at $16,000 per mile more than they would have received by law on the other route. That is by the measurement on the map.

Mr. COVODE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. COVODE. I simply want to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he charges the Secretary of the Interior with issuing bonds to subsidize that route to an extent of seventy miles in violation of law?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, I charge nobody with anything; I state facts. I state the fact here, and I defy contradiction, that by the measurement on the map of the two straight routes you have received seventy miles of subsidy more than the law allowed you to receive. That is my statement. Here is the law and here is the map. Measure it yourselves. Now, let us look a little further into this matter and see what this road proposes. Besides a subsidy of $16,000 per mile there is more history connected with this matter than what I have stated. Let us go a little further and see what the law authorized this road to do. They were authorized to pass from Fort Wallace and to enter Antelope Pass on the Pacific railroad, passing at a distance not over fifty miles west of Denver. I have measured the line; and instead of doing that, they have made the line straight to Denver, and then made an acute angle to Cheyenne City, on the Pacific railroad, which makes a distance of sixty-four miles for which they have advantage of the subsidy of lands over and above the line laid down in the law.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman yield to me for two minutes?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not like to yield so much of my time, but I will yield for a moment to the gentleman.

Mr. PRICE. The statement having been made twice, on two different days by two different gentlemen, that by the terms of the original charter, passed in July, 1862, the eastern division could make their connection and yet have gone up the Smoky Hill route, all I desire to say is that they were required by the original act to make the connection at a point between the south bank of the Republican and the north bank of the Platte, and that it should be in Nebraska, and they cannot make the connection by the Smoky Hill route, because the Smoky Hill is not in Nebraska.

Mr. LOGAN. That is exactly the point I had in my own mind. That is the fact about it. But there is another point to which I wish to call the attention of the House. I do not pretend to be an expert in railroad matters, nor do I pretend to know as much about railroads as some men, but I say to the gentlemen from Pennsylvania that I have examined this map and the law and understand them fully as well as they do, unless they have examined them since they made their speeches the other day and learned much that they did not know then. I want some gentleman to tell me where this road intends to go? You cannot tell from this bill. Can the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] tell me where this road intends to go, where it intends to stop, or what it means? Here it has the route surveyed to Denver, then comes in the Denver and Cheyenne road, and then there is another route on their own map running round from Fort Wallace, swinging around the circle and coming out at San Francisco. Now, I want to put the House upon their guard a little about this bill. I think there is very great doubt about the construction of this law. See how singularly it reads:

"The eastern division are hereby authorized to designate the general route of their road, and file a map thereof as now required by law at any time before the 1st day of December, 1866, and upon filing said map, showing the general route of said road, the lands along the entire line thereof, so far as the same may be designated, shall be reserved from sale by the Secretary of the Interior."

Now, sir, you file your maps and designate your route and have given to you all the lands along that whole route. And now I want you to tell me what is your route? Is it from Fort Wallace to Cheyenne Wells, or to Antelope Pass, or Denver, or Cheyenne City, or the Union Pacific, or is it to stop at Denver? I want to know. Have you filed a map with a route to Anton Chico, Santa Fé, Albuquerque, El Paso, and then to San Francisco? There is such a route on the map. I do not know whether you filed a map of that kind with the Secretary of the Interior, but if you have you are entitled to all the land along the route.

Mr. COVODE. The gentleman asks a question, and I will try to answer it if he will yield to me.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. COVODE. I will try to answer his question to the satisfaction of the House, if not to his satisfaction. I said the other day that Cheyenne Wells was the proper point from which a road should diverge to go to Denver. I also said that west of there was a favorable point for a connection to be made with the road from Memphis. I also said that at or near Albuquerque would be a favorable point to connection with a road from Shreveport; and that at a point near there was a favorable point to connect with a road to New Mexico.

Mr. LOGAN. This is certainly a lost road. None of its friends can tell where it is going. If they can, they can do more than any one has been able to do as yet. But it is going somewhere, and will be a good connection for all your roads from everywhere; it is either going to Denver, or it will diverge at Cheyenne Wells and go to New Mexico, or old Mexico, or to California, or to almost any place to suit all you gentlemen that have roads so you may connect with it. Yes, sir; this road is evidently going somewhere, or somewhere else, God only knows where. The route on the map and the speeches of gentlemen in favor of this bill remind me a great deal of a story I heard once of a man who was traveling and had lost his way.

The traveler met a boy and asked him to direct him to a certain village which he named. The boy said: "You go down back of the hill and turn to the left; then go up the hill and turn off to the right; then you go down a lane and turn to the left, and then go down the branch and turn to the right; and then if you are not lost, may I be hanged." [Laughter.] And if this is not a lost road I do not know what to term it.

Now, I want to tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] something else which he, perhaps, does not know. You talk about Cheyenne Wells. I have put a clause in my substitute allowing you to go there. Yet your road does not go within thirty miles of Cheyenne Wells as surveyed. It is thirty miles south of your road.

The whole proposition is this—I think I can explain it. Here is the Cheyenne, Denver, and Colorado Railroad Company. That company wants the lands of the eastern division railroad company. The eastern division railway company does not want to go any further than to Cheyenne Wells. They want at that point to turn to the left and go down to New Mexico, unless they can induce Congress to give them a little more subsidy. But they do not want to lose the lands given them by Congress along the route from Fort Wallace to Antelope Pass or Cheyenne City. They must unite with the Denver and Colorado railroad, and give the lands to them, under some arrangement that they have, and then turn off to the left to New Mexico. That is the explanation of the whole thing.

These gentlemen say that because I am opposed to granting this subsidy of $16,000 a mile I am opposed to building the road. No such thing. I want the road built, if these gentlemen will build it properly and right without asking the Government to do it. But I want them to let the country know where they are going, and to let us understand what they mean. I want them to come before this House and say, "We want to go to Denver City, (or where ever they are going;) we want you to give us permission to go there; we want you to give us a subsidy." That would be a plain proposition, and we could understand it. But if you take this bill and read it you will find that no man, in this House or out of it, can understand it unless it be the man who wrote it, and I have not been able to find him yet.

Now, to the next proposition. Is it right for us to give this subsidy to aid these gentlemen in building this road? I am not discussing the question whether it is proper for them to build the road. I will say it is proper they should build the road. All persons wanting to build roads ought to be permitted to do so, provided they do so without asking the Government to pay the entire bill. The question is, is it right for us to give this subsidy? I say it is not. Why, sir, we have given to that "stump-tail road" from Atchison $1,600,000. We have already paid a subsidy of $16,000 a mile from Kansas City to Fort Wallace on this road, amounting to $6,000,000. And now you are asked to give subsidy for the same road again, when they have already received subsidy for seventy miles more than they are entitled to by law; and adding these fifty-four miles now asked, you will have given a subsidy of $16,000 per mile for one hundred and twenty-four miles, never contemplated by the original law, and not asked by the company when that law was passed.

"But," say these gentlemen, "what do you want to do? Do you want to destroy railroads?" No, sir; I want to do no such thing. I want to stop this system of building railroads entirely out of the public Treasury. I will state my reason for it. You have already granted valuable franchises to this company. You have granted them first the right of way over the Government lands. What next? You give them $16,000 per mile in bonds. What next? You provide that all the land necessary for depots and everything of that kind shall be given them by the Government. What next? A year or two after the granting of the charter the Government waives its right to a first mortgage upon the road, rolling stock, &c., and takes a second mortgage. The company, going to work to build the road, mortgages it to its own men, and for the full amount of the value of the road and for the subsidy of $16,000 a mile gives the Government a second mortgage. The whole of the road, rolling stock, furniture, and everything of the kind is covered by a first mortgage to their own men. I ask any lawyer of the House to say whether it is not true that when that first mortgage becomes due it takes the road, &c.? What becomes, then, of the second mortgage, which is the only security held by the Government? Does anybody suppose that this second mortgage will be paid? The men concerned in this road may be very honest men indeed; but I do say that I never in my life knew a railroad or any other private corporation (for these corporations are soulless, without blood and without conscience) to pay one dollar that the law did not require them to pay. Then, if the first mortgage by law takes the road, I ask who will pay the second mortgage when the law does not require the company to pay it?

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. LOGAN. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. O'NEILL. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] whether he means to insinuate that any branch of the Pacific railroad which has been built, or which is now in course of construction, and to which the Government has given subsidies, has failed to carry out the letter of the law or has used the money which it has received from the Government for any other purpose than the building of its road?

Mr. LOGAN. I say no such thing. I stated a plain, simple proposition, that no private corporation was ever known to pay a dollar that the law did not require it to pay. Did the gentleman ever know such a case?

Mr. O'NEILL. Yes, sir; corporations and individuals, too.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not talking about individuals. When and where has the gentleman known the case of a corporation that paid anything it was not required by law to pay?

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman has insinuated in broad terms that these subsidies have not been used in good faith for building railroads, but that the corporations to which subsidies have been granted have used them for other purposes than those contemplated by law. Now, I want him to state—

Mr. LOGAN. I cannot yield to the gentleman any further.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I think—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois cannot be interrupted except with his own consent.

Mr. LOGAN. The gentleman will excuse me.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LOGAN. For a question.

Mr. KELLEY. Has not the Government practically a first lien on this road in its right to reserve from the earnings by Government transportation one half of the entire amount, be they more or less?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, I am very much astonished that learned and eloquent men, judges and lawyers, men of historical renown, should get up here and ask questions which the law itself settles. Here is the law. The Government has a right to reserve that which it owes for transportation. Nobody denies that. But my proposition is this—and every lawyer here knows it to be true—that you cannot find an instance where a corporation ever voluntarily paid a debt or obligation that the law did not compel them to pay. I do not mean that they had to be sued for it, but they never paid anything that the law would not require or ask them to pay.

Mr. KELLEY. Did the gentleman ever know of individuals who were in the habit of paying what the law did not require them to pay?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not yield any further. That is a very good dodge. The gentleman possibly could make a better speech to-day than he did the other day. I presume he is now better posted; if not, I feel for him. I repeat my proposition that no corporation ever pays a debt that the law does not obligate it to pay. Then, I say, if a railroad gives a first mortgage to an individual or company, and that mortgage is foreclosed, and takes the road, fixtures, &c., that the company has never been known to pay a second mortgage that in law was no further lien on the property. Hence, I say, if this first mortgage on the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, is foreclosed, including the machinery, rolling-stock, and furniture, and a new company takes it, leaving no balance over the amount of first mortgage, there is no obligation in law on them to pay the second mortgage. I defy any gentleman who claims to be a lawyer to dispute that proposition.

Mr. O'NEILL. Will the gentleman yield one minute?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir. I do not know why it is, but some how or other I never take the floor but there is a hornet's nest stirred. Now, sir, I do not mean to stir it if I can help it, but I mean to talk common-sense, presuming that it will be understood by the gentleman.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman ought to allow a common-sense illustration.

Mr. LOGAN. I always have a very common sense illustration when the gentleman stands before me.

Mr. O'NEILL. I want to tell the gentleman—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will suspend. The gentleman from Illinois will state whether he desires to be protected against interruption.

Mr. LOGAN. I have said that I did not yield.

Mr. O'NEILL. I want to answer a question.

Mr. LOGAN. You can answer them when I put them.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to be protected from interruption?

Mr. LOGAN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will ask me to yield for a question, I have no objection, but I do object to his interrupting a speech against the rules of the House.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to say—

Mr. LOGAN. Never mind. I am extremely sorry that the gentleman becomes so nettled on this question. Everybody can understand it. Are you the Pacific railroad that you become so excited on the subject? [Laughter.]

Mr. O'NEILL. Now certainly the gentleman will let me answer that question. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; I can answer it myself. [Laughter.] If you are any part of it, it is but a small part. Why do gentlemen get excited when I state these facts? I am not arraigning the Pacific railroad for murder nor for a penitentiary offense. I am only giving the law as it is written in the books and stating the facts.

I have been interrupted so much during my remarks that I have not had time to comment upon my substitute. I hope the House will be as patient with me as I have been with other gentlemen who have interrupted me, until I can give my views in reference to the proposition I have introduced as a substitute for this bill.

What do I propose? I propose this policy to be applied to this road: I propose that the Government shall guaranty the interest for $16,000 per mile of the bonds of the road to Cheyenne Wells. I propose that that guaranty, when written by the Secretary of the Treasury on the bonds, shall become ipso facto a first mortgage on the railroad and all its fixtures and furniture. That is my proposition. What else? In order to guaranty the Government against loss, to guaranty the Government against expenditure, to guaranty the Government against increase of the public debt, I propose that all transportation of supplies of every kind, telegraphing or any other indebtedness to this road by the Government of the United States shall be reserved by the Secretary of the Treasury from payment to the road and applied to the payment of the interest on the bonds as far as it will go, and that the company shall, ten days before said interest is due, deposit the money with the Treasurer of the United States for the payment of said interest. I propose, in addition to that, that the lands heretofore granted to this company and the lands granted to the Denver company, joining them together, shall be put into the market as every twenty miles of the road is built at $2 50 per acre, and sold to actual settlers, the money received from such sales to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as a sinking fund, and that the Secretary of the Treasury shall apply that sinking fund to the purchase or redemption of the bonds of this road upon which the interest is guarantied by the Government, and as redeemed, purchased, or canceled, they shall be turned over to the company. I propose that the Government, as well as the holders of said bonds, shall be protected, so that it shall not by indebtedness or in any other way lose one cent.

I go further than that. I propose that if this company shall fail to pay the interest or any part of the interest every six months, then the Government shall have power to take possession of the road and its fixtures and furniture and apply its earnings, &c., to the payment of the interest or the liquidation of the debt. That is my proposition. I propose to protect the Government, and at the same time I propose to put it in such a position that the road itself can be built. These gentlemen say, "Oh, we cannot build the road." I say you can build the road. Why? Because when you get the interest on the bonds guarantied they will go on the market, and the Government will be protected and the tax-payers will be protected and not oppressed, which, I think, is a very important item in all matters of legislation, especially at this time.

Now, let us go a little further and apply this principle. These gentlemen say, "If you undertake to carry out a proposition of this kind it will not develop the country; for nobody will buy the lands." Well, if no one wants to live in that country I would like you to tell me what you want a railroad for? If no one will go there, certainly a railroad cannot exist there. Now, sir, the entire length of the State in which I live is traversed by a railroad that was subsidized with lands, not with bonds or money, when portions of the State was almost a howling wilderness. The Government got $2 50 per acre for the alternate sections when land was at $1 25 an acre, and to-day you cannot enter an inch of public lands in the whole State. It has all been taken. The Government has received its money, and the State has been developed into a great and productive country; and it was developed just in accordance with the very plan that I propose here to-day to Congress, except that I go further than that went. It does develop the country. Why, your railroads through the State of Iowa have been built on this same theory, except that I have changed it so far as applies to the interest on the bonds and the machinery for the protection of the Government. That is the way in which your country has been developed and in which it will be developed in this instance. I tell you railroads will go where trade is or will be; railroads will go where good lands are; railroads will go where people either live now or can live hereafter.

But gentlemen say that capital will not invest. How is it with capital? Why, capital is like the dews that descend from heaven; they seek their own channels and their own outlets. Capital seeks investment where it can be profitable. The dews of heaven fall and assist in the growth of nature, and then seek the channel God has prepared for their march to the ocean. So it is with capital: God has pointed out on nature's map the place for intelligent investment. You tell me it will not seek or find investment in this direction. Perhaps it will not on a sandy plain, where nothing is heard but the howl of the coyote or the war cry of the savage. Capital will not go there, nor will people want to live there. If not, then you do not have any use for a railroad there.

I look upon these great improvements of the age as a great thing. I look upon the work of stretching iron-bands across the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific as one of the great marks of the intelligence of this great age. I look upon fastening together the East and the West, as a barrel is strapped and bound by hoops of iron, as one of the great events of the age. You have almost completed what may be termed a bridge from the Atlantic to the Pacific. This has been done at great cost to the Government, and, in my judgment, has expended enough without any sufficient security against liability. You have now opened the communication and shown what the country is. If it is inviting to capital it will go; if not, it shrinks from the task of struggling against the decrees of nature. The Government has given aid to the extent of millions and millions of dollars. Now let the Government stop giving in this manner, for it is recklessness. We have done more than our duty toward the country in this matter of money subsidy, and now let us stop. Isay let us stop, and stop now.

We hear much said in favor of economy. Many gentlemen make speeches in favor of economy. One member says, "I am in favor of economy—as soon as I get this little bill through." Another man says, "I am for economy—as soon as I get my little bill through." It reminds me of Rip Van Winkle, when he became a temperance man. After he had waked up from his twenty years' sleep he said he was going to quit drinking, yet he did drink—"Here's to the health of your family; may they live long and prosper"—always saying, in reference to his promise to quit drinking, "This time doesn't count." And I suppose that is the way with gentlemen here. They are all in favor of economy, but one says, "I want this little stump-tail railroad bill passed; this time doesn't count." And so another says about another road. As Van said, "Here's to the health of your family; may they live long and prosper. This time doesn't count." [Laughter.]

Sir, I say it is time to stop now. If you are going to apply the principle at all you should apply it now. But gentlemen say this is only fifty-four miles. That is true; this bill is only for fifty-four miles. When the last bill was up, you, by strategy, made it seventy miles. If we put this fifty-four miles on it will be one hundred and twenty-four miles. And then the next Congress will ask you to give them subsidies from Cheyenne Wells to another place.

Perhaps these gentlemen will say to me, "Why, LOGAN, you do not understand that great country we are going into, New Mexico." Perhaps I do not know anything about it. But I tell these railroad men that in 1847 and 1848 I traveled over the very route laid down on this map as their survey. I know all about the country through which their road will run, if ever built. I have been over nearly every mountain path in that country.

The lands in those valleys of Mexico are as beautiful as the eye of man ever beheld, and the climate is one of the finest that God has given to man. Fresh meat will cure there while hanging in the open air without the application of salt. It will cure out in the hot sun, as I know from my own observation. The country abounds with birds, goats, sheep, antelopes, and a great variety of animals, both domestic and wild. It is a country that will develop itself as fast as a railroad goes through it, and become rich and prosperous without any Government subsidy of $16,000 or $32,000 a mile, and these railroad men know it well.

Now, sir, I say that I am in favor of the great march of improvement, of civilization, and a general development of all the wealth and resources of this country. But, sir, that is no reason why, as a Representative of my constituents, I should stand by and see the Treasury every day growing leaner and leaner by the inroads made upon it by these railroad and other corporations. I am not willing to do it. I say to my friends in this House; I say to my Republican friends—although I do not regard this as a political measure by any means—that we pledged ourselves to our constituents in the convention that nominated our President-elect that economy should be our watchword. If we are true to the men that elected us we shall stand by that pledge to-day. What are we now asked by this corporation to do? We are asked to vote $16,000 a mile against reason and against the will of our constituents and against the declaration—not express, but clearly implied—of the convention that nominated your candidate for President. We are asked to support this bill, which is in opposition to the policy regarded as proper, expressed, as I understand, by the President-elect, his declaration having been made—not with reference to this particular bill, but generally with reference to subsidies of the character heretofore given to railroads—as unwise, at least in the present embarrassed condition of the Treasury. But this company comes modestly forward and says: "Subsidize for us these fifty-four miles of road; slap your constituents in the face; violate your party platform; violate your pledges made upon the stump; and on the eve of the new administration coming into power make a direct issue with it on the question of involving us in further liability. Let him understand that you are all-powerful, that you ask no odds from him. Give the people of the country to understand that you defy their will in toto." This, and nothing less, is what we are modestly asked by this company to do.

The Treaty-making Power—The Cherokee Neutral Lands in Kansas.

SPEECH OF HON. W. LAWRENCE,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 26, 1869,

On the treaties concluded between the United States and Indian tribes:

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I have on several occasions called the attention of the House to treaties concluded between the United States and Indian tribes, under which the power has been asserted and exercised to dispose of the public lands to private individuals and to corporations. This House has denied that such power can be constitutionally exercised, and in some form and at some time the question must be settled. The "settlers" on what are called the Cherokee neutral lands in Kansas have claimed relief at the hands of Congress, and I propose briefly to present some considerations to the House, not so much in support of the justice of their demands as in vindication of the power of Congress over the public lands and of the wisdom of our land policy, which cannot be maintained if the assumptions of the treaty-making power are tolerated. The land policy of the United States has been so long settled by the legislation of Congress that the "homestead" and "preemption" laws may be justly regarded as founded in wisdom, and as having the general sanction of the people. The provisions of these laws are so well understood that I need not now state them in detail.

Under certain limitations the "preemption" laws give to every "head of a family, or widow, or single man over the age of twenty-one years," being a citizen or having filed his declaration of intention to become such, who has made or shall make "a settlement in person on the public lands" after the Indian title is extinguished and after survey, the right to enter and procure a patent for one hundred and sixty acres of land on payment of the minimum Government price, generally $1 25 an acre. (Act September 4, 1841, 5 United States Statutes-at-Large, 456.)

The "homestead" law gives the right to enter upon the same classes of lands and procure a patent after five years' occupancy without paying any money consideration for a homestead. (Act 20th May, 1862, 12 United States Statutes, 392.)

The purpose of the Government to maintain the policy of these laws has been so well understood and so implicitly relied on that settlers have frequently entered upon public lands before they were surveyed, and even before the Indian title was extinguished, in anticipation of surveys and the extinction of the Indian title, and their rights thus acquired have been respected, and titles perfected under these laws. Now, unless some reason exists for excepting the Cherokee neutral lands from the general land policy of Congress, it is manifest that settlers on them should have the benefit of the "homestead" and "preemption" laws. This leads us to an inquiry as to the title of these lands, and the position of the settlers in relation to them.

By the treaty with France of April 30, 1803, the region of country west of the Mississippi river was ceded to the United States "forever and in full sovereignty." (8 United States Statutes-at-Large, 202.)

The act of Congress approved May 28, 1830, authorized the President to extinguish certain Indian titles to lands and to give in exchange other lands, and then provides—

"That in the making of any such exchange or exchanges it shall and may be lawful for the President solemnly to assure the tribe or nation with which the exchange is made that the United States will forever secure and guaranty to them and their heirs and successors the country so exchanged with; and if they prefer it that the United States will cause a patent or grant to be made and executed to them for the same, provided always that such lands shall revert to the United States if the Indians become extinct or abandon the same."—4 United States Statutes-at-Large, 412.

On the 29th December, 1835, a treaty was concluded between the United States and the Cherokee tribe of Indians by which they ceded to the United States all their lands east of the Mississippi river, and the United States ceded to the Cherokees seven million acres of land west of that river, bordering on the State of Arkansas. The second article of the treaty then provides as follows:

"And whereas it is apprehended by the Cherokees that in the above cession there is not contained a sufficient quantity of land for the accommodation of the whole nation on their removal west of the Mississippi, the United States, in consideration of the sum of $500,000 therefor, hereby covenant and agree to convey to the said Indians and their descendants by patent in fee-simple the following additional tracts of land, situated between the west line of the State of Missouri and the Osage reservation, beginning at the southeast corner of the same, and run north along the east line of the Osage lands fifty miles to the northeast corner thereof, and thence east to the west line of the State of Missouri; thence with said line south fifty miles; thence west to the place of beginning, estimated to contain eight hundred thousand acres of land."—7 United States Statutes-at-Large, 480.

In pursuance of this treaty and the act of Congress referred to a patent was issued to the Cherokee nation for these lands December 31, 1838. This tract is what is called the Cherokee neutral lands.

The treaty undertakes to enlarge the character of the grant into a fee-simple, but it is limited in its operation and effect by the act of Congress.

By the treaty between the United States and the Cherokee nation of Indians of July 19, proclaimed August 11, 1866, it is provided as follows:

"ART. XVII. The Cherokee nation hereby cedes, in trust to the United States, the tract of land in the State of Kansas which was sold to the Cherokees by the United States, under the provisions of the second article of the treaty of 1835; and also that strip of the land ceded to the nation by the fourth article of said treaty which is included in the State of Kansas, and the Cherokees consent that said lands may be included in the limits and jurisdiction of the said State.

"The lands herein ceded shall be surveyed as the public lands of the United States are surveyed, under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and shall be appraised by two disinterested persons, one to be designated by the Cherokee national council and one by the Secretary of the Interior, and, in case of disagreement, by a third person, to be mutually selected by the aforesaid appraisers; the appraisement to be not less than an average of $1 25 per acre, exclusive of improvements.

"And the Secretary of the Interior shall, from time to time, as such surveys and appraisements are approved by him, after due advertisements for sealed bids, sell such lands to the highest bidders for cash in parcels not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres and at not less than the appraised value: Provided, That whenever there are improvements of the value of fifty dollars made on the lands not being mineral, and owned and personally occupied by any person for agricultural purposes at the date of the signing hereof, such person so owning, and in person residing on such improvements, shall, after due proof, made under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, be entitled to buy, at the appraised value, the smallest quantity of land in legal subdivisions which will include his improvements, not exceeding in the aggregate one hundred and sixty acres, the expenses of survey and appraisement to be paid by the Secretary out of the proceeds of sale of said land: Provided, That nothing in this article shall prevent the Secretary of the Interior from selling the whole of said lands not occupied by actual settlers at the date of the ratification of this treaty, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres to each person entitled to preemption under the preemption laws of the United States in a body, to any responsible party, for cash, for a sum not less than one dollar per acre."—14 United States Statutes-at-Large, 904-907.

Before this treaty was made, the Cherokee Indians had practically abandoned the neutral lands, and about one thousand and three families of American citizens had settled on them and made valuable improvements with a view to secure homesteads or acquire titles under the preemption laws. This was done with the knowledge of the Indians, and without objection, if not with their direct sanction and approval.

The preamble to a resolution adopted in the House of Representatives July 13, 1868, states that—

"Between August 11, 1866, and June 6, 1868, about two thousand additional families have settled on said Cherokee neutral lands, each family occupying one hundred and sixty acres, on which improvements have been made at an average cost of about five hundred and ten dollars, beside expenditures for living of $450 for each family, said settlement and improvements being made without objection from any source and on the faith that the settlers would be protected in the right to acquire title to said lands as other settlers on the public lands. On the 30th day of August, 1866, a contract was made by and between JAMES HARLAN, Secretary of the Interior, and the American Emigrant Company for the sale of certain portions of said lands, which contract has been assigned by said company to James F. Joy, said contract and assignment being on file in the Department of the Interior. A supplemental treaty between the United States and said Cherokee nation was made April 27, 1868, ratified June 6, and proclaimed June 10, 1868, all without any knowledge thereof by any of the persons occupying said lands, and which ratifies said contract with the American Emigrant Company and the assignment thereof to said Joy with certain modifications provided in said supplemental treaty, but which makes no provision for the protection of the persons or families who have settled upon and improved said lands, but purports to ratify a sale of said lands, including the improvements thereon."

The contract with the American Emigrant Company purported to sell these lands at one dollar an acre, payable in installments, running nine years, with interest. By the two treaties "actual settlers" prior to August 11, 1866, are so far protected that they are entitled to buy the lands they settled, "not being mineral," at an appraisement made in the mode prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and which averages about two dollars an acre. This exclusion of settlers from mineral (coal) lands leaves only about four hundred claimants protected in the right to purchase under the treaty. All the residue of the lands purport to be sold to James F. Joy at one dollar an acre, payable in installments, running nine years. If these proceedings and the sale to Joy are valid then the great body of the actual settlers are left unprotected by law, and are defeated in their just expectations.

If the sale to Joy is illegal he has no right to complain if Congress shall give protection to the settlers, nor can he object if they are already entitled to the benefit of the homestead and preemption acts.

If Congress has power to cancel the sale to Joy, even if it was made under color of law, then the moral question may arise whether it is the duty of Congress, and if the power exists, to defeat his expectations of profit, or permit him to defeat the expectations of nearly three thousand families, many of whose members were soldiers who fought to save the Republic whose protection they ask, and still more of whom are women and children who imploringly pray that they may not be driven from the homes they have helped to make and on which they rely for support.

Some persons, conceding that the treaty-making power, unaided by act of Congress, is not competent to authorize a sale of the public lands of the United States to citizens or others in fee-simple, yet maintain that the Cherokee nation of Indians were the absolute owners in fee-simple of these neutral lands, and that the treaty-making power is competent to sell such lands, or that the Indians could authorize the Secretary of the Interior to sell. I cannot agree to either of these positions, but they do not really arise in this inquiry.

I maintain that the Cherokee nation never had any title beyond a right of occupancy.

In Blackstone's Commentaries, volume 1, book 2, page 104, it is said:

"I. Tenant in fee-simple is he that hath lands, tenements, or hereditaments to hold to him and his heirs forever, generally, absolutely, and simply, without mentioning what heirs, but referring that to his own pleasure or to the disposition of the law." * * * "This is property in its highest degree."

"A fee, therefore, in general signifies an estate of inheritance, being the highest and most extensive interest that a man can have in a feud; and when the term is used simply, without any other adjunct, or has the adjunct of simple annexed to it, (as a fee or a fee-simple,) it is used in contradistinction to a fee-conditional at the common law or a fee-tail by the statute, importing an absolute inheritance clear of any condition, limitation, or restrictions to particular heirs, but descendable to the heirs general, whether male or female, lineal or collateral."

In Kent's Commentaries, volume 4, part 4, page 4, it is said:

"Fee-simple is a pure inheritance, clear of any qualification or condition, and it gives a right of succession to all the heirs generally, under the restriction that they must be of the blood of the first purchaser and of the blood of the person last seized."

It is an estate of perpetuity, and confers an unlimited power of alienation, and no person is capable of having a greater estate or interest in land. Every restraint upon alienation is inconsistent with the nature of a fee-simple."

A fee-simple is an absolute title—a title to a person, his heirs or successors forever. The act of May 28, 1830, authorized the President—

"Solemnly to assure the tribe that the United States will forever secure and guaranty to them and their successors the country so exchanged with them; and if they prefer it, that the United States will cause a patent or grant to be made and executed to them for the same."

Not the fee-simple, not the title absolute, but the occupancy of the "country"—this was to be secured and guarantied, and the grant or patent conveyed this security and guarantee, no more. The act does not once name the title to the land. In providing for a reversion it was the land that should revert; Congress did not even by implication concede a title to the Indians in any form. The Cherokee tribe had always occupied lands in common and held no titles in severalty. The act itself contemplated an occupancy in common, and then—

"Provided always, That such lands shall revert to the United States if the Indians become extinct or abandon the same."

This looks to an occupancy in common—denies the power of sale in the Indians essential to a fee-simple, and looks to an ultimate extinction of their right of occupancy.

The act shows that the patent could not enlarge the character of the "assurance" and "guarantee of country" contained in it. It does not authorize a grant to inure to "assurances" or vendees of the Indians.

The law itself was enacted to carry out the known and recognized policy of the United States in relation to the Indian tribes.

The Cherokee nation exchanged their Georgia lands or money claims, for the Kansas neutral lands.

The Supreme Court of the United States had determined the character of the Indian right to lands and their relation to the Government.

In 5 Peters, 48, Justice Baldwin said:

"Indians have rights of occupancy to their lands as sacred as the fee-simple absolute title of the whites; but they are only rights of occupancy, incapable of alienation or being held by any other than common right without permission from the Government. (8 Wheaton, 592.) In Fletcher vs. Peck this court decided that the Indian occupancy was not absolutely repugnant to a seizing in fee in Georgia; that she had good right to grant land so occupied; that it was within the State and could be held by purchasers under a law subject only to extinguishment of the Indian title." (6 Cranch, 88-142; 9 Cranch, 11.)

In the case of Johnson vs. McIntosh, 8 Wheaton, 547, 571, the nature of the Indian title to lands was considered leading to the conclusion that their tenure was the same occupancy; their rights occupancy, and nothing more; that the ultimate, absolute fee jurisdiction, and sovereignty was in the Government, subject only to such rights; that grants vested soil and dominion and the powers of Government, whether the land granted was vacant or occupied."

Chief Justice Marshall said:

"They (the Cherokee Indians) occupy a territory to which we assert a title independent of their will, which must take effect in point of possession when their right of possession ceases. Meanwhile they are in a state of pillage. Their relation to the United States resembles that of a ward to his guardian."

"They and their country are considered by foreign nations as well as by ourselves as being so completely under the sovereignty and dominion of the United States that any attempt to acquire their lands or to form a political connection with them would be considered by all as an invasion of our territory and an act of hostility."

Justice Johnson said:

"They never have been recognized as holding sovereignty over the territory they occupy."

But if they had a fee, a perfect title, the law of Congress under which they held it declared that—

"The lands shall revert to the United States if the Indians" * * * "abandon the same."

No matter how they "abandon" it, whether by voluntary removal, by a surrender of their rights, by treaty, or otherwise, the lands revert.

The lands do not revert "in trust," but absolutely to the United States.

The Indians did in fact abandon these lands.

They relinquished their rights by the treaty proclaimed August 11, 1866. This they could lawfully do and did do. The effect of this surrender and abandonment is not impaired by the fact that this treaty attempted to cede the lands "in trust," and to provide for a sale.

If, then, as I have shown, the Cherokee nation had no absolute fee-simple, no right themselves to sell these lands, they could not cede any to the United States, and could not stipulate that the Secretary of the Interior should sell a title which they did not have, or do what they could not do. Yet no one ever claimed or supposed that the Indians could sell these lands either to a foreign nation or to individual citizens. How, then, could they stipulate for a right to be exercised in their favor which they did not have? The power to authorize a sale under a treaty in the form attempted all rests on the assumption that the Indians had a fee-simple title, and when this assumption fails there can be no treaty power of sale.

The pretense that the Cherokees could clothe the Secretary of the Interior, as agent, with a power of sale, or that he could execute a trust without the authority of an act of Congress, does not deserve to be dignified with a discussion. He is an officer of the Government, with only such powers as the statutes give him, and none of these authorize him to act as agent for or trustee of the Indian tribes in the manner attempted. He could not be clothed with a trust without the sanction of an act of Congress.

But if the Cherokees had a fee-simple title the treaties could not confer upon the Secretary of the Interior the "power to dispose of and make needful rules and regulations respecting the territory" of the Indians so as to effect a sale of them in the manner proposed.

The Cherokees could, and by the treaties did, cede to the United States the Indian right of occupancy—all the right they had, whatever it was.

The treaty-making power, so far as it relates to the Indian tribes, at most can only create municipal, not public law.

In Cherokee Nation vs. Georgia, (5 Peters,) it was held that the Indian tribes are not foreign nations.

They are not independent nations, exempt from congressional legislation. All that relates to the lands over which they hold any rights may be regulated by congressional law.

In Taylor vs. Morton (2 Curtis's Circuit Court Reports, 454) the court held that—

"Though a treaty is a law of the land under the Constitution of the United States, Congress may repeat it so far as it is a municipal law, provided its subject-matter is within the legislative power of Congress."

"A promise in a treaty that the products of one country shall not be subjected to a higher rate of duty than like products imported into the United States from other countries, addresses itself to the political and not to the judicial department of the Government, and the courts cannot try the question whether it has been observed or not."

"Though the treaty with Russia, of December 18, 1832, (Statutes-at-Large, 441,) stipulated that no higher rate of duties should be imposed on goods imported from Russia than on like articles imported from other places, this court cannot try the question whether a certain species of hemp on which a duty of twenty-five dollars per ton is imposed by an act of Congress is 'like' Russian hemp within the meaning of the treaty. This is a question for Congress, not for the courts."

And Mr. Justice Curtis says:

"The truth is that this clause in the treaty is merely a contract, addressing itself to the legislative power. The distinction between such treaties and those which operate as laws in courts of justice is settled in our jurisprudence. It was clearly pointed out in Foster vs. Neilson, 2 Peters, 314. By the treaty between the United States and Spain, of the 22d of February, 1819, (8 Statutes-at-Large, 252,) it was stipulated by the former 'that all grants of land made, &c., by his Catholic majesty, &c., shall be ratified and confirmed to the persons in possession of the lands, &c.' The question arose whether this clause operated on the titles to the lands. Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, delivering the opinion of the court, said: 'Our Constitution declares a treaty to be a law of the land. It is, consequently, to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the Legislature whenever it operates of itself without the aid of any legislative provision. But when the terms of the stipulation import a contract, when either of the parties engage to perform a particular act, the treaty addresses itself to the political not to the judicial department, and the Legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the court.' After commenting on the language of the article, he proceeds: 'This seems to be the language of contracts; and if it is, the ratification and confirmation which are promised must be the act of the Legislature. Until such act shall be passed the court is not at liberty to disregard the existing laws on the subject.'"

This is the established doctrine under this treaty as well as under that by which Louisiana was acquired, (8 Statutes-at-Large, 200.) See Garcia vs. Lee, 12 Peters, 519; Talbot vs. Seaman, 1 Cranch, 1; Ware vs. Hylton, 3 Dallas, 361; Story on the Constitution, section 1838; Paschal's Annotated Constitution, 249.

And again, in Cherokee Nation vs. Georgia, (5 Peters, 46,) it is said:

"However individual judges may construe them (treaties,) it is the province of the court to conform its decisions to the will of the Legislature, if that will has been clearly expressed."—Foster vs. Elam, 2 Peters, 307.

In 2 Story on the Constitution, section 1838, it is said:

"It will not be disputed that they (treaties) are subject to the legislative power, and may be repealed, like other laws, at its pleasure."

In the Convention that framed the Constitution, August 15, 1787, Mr. Mercer said:

"Treaties would not be final, so as to alter the laws of the land, till ratified by legislative authority. This was the case of treaties in Great Britain, particularly the late treaty of commerce with France."

August 23, Mr. Wilson said:

"The king of Great Britain was obliged to resort to Parliament for the execution of the most important treaties."

Congress has not only regulated the exercise of the treaty-making power as to these neutral lands, but has by law specifically provided, by the act of May 28, 1830, that when they are abandoned by the Indians they "shall revert to the United States."

The "homestead" and "preemption" laws give the right to enter public lands after the Indian title is extinguished and after survey. These treaties with the Cherokees attempt to say, in violation of the act of May 28, 1830, that the lands shall not revert, and, in violation of the homestead and preemption laws, that they shall not be subject to homestead and preemption entry and settlement.

As the Cherokees have abandoned the lands, and their title has been extinguished and the lands have been surveyed, it is to my mind clear that all said lands have reverted to and are owned absolutely by the United States, and are now subject to homestead and preemption entry and settlement, and the sale in form to Joy cannot impair or interfere with these rights.

If there could be any doubt about this, Congress has ample power, as already shown, to repeal the municipal provisions of the treaty purporting to authorize a sale of those lands, and thus give relief to the settlers. By the Constitution "no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts," (article 1, section 10.) But there is no such prohibition on Congress, except as vested rights are protected.

In my judgment, Congress has the EXCLUSIVE POWER to provide for the sale of the public lands, whether in Indian occupancy or not. The exercise of the power is only a question of policy and good faith. This grows out of the power conferred on Congress—

"To dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States" and of the power—

"to admit new States"—

into the Union; "and it arises from the sovereignty of Congress as to the lands." (Constitution, article 4, section 3.)

The congressional power to dispose of the public lands is necessarily exclusive. It certainly is not exclusively a treaty-making power. It is not necessarily any part of that power. As to unoccupied lands it could not be a treaty power. It is necessarily a congressional legislative power. To hold that it is concurrent with any other power is to reverse all rules of construction and introduce inextricable confusion. It is unsafe to permit the land policy of Congress to be overturned by the treaty-making power.

Justice Baldwin, in Cherokee Nation vs. Georgia, said:

"The second clause of the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution is equally convincing: 'The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States.' What that territory was the rights of soil, jurisdiction, and sovereignty, claimed and exercised by the States and the old Congress, has been already seen. It extended to the formation of a Government whose laws and process were in force within its whole extent without a saving of Indian jurisdiction. It is the same power which was delegated to the old Congress, and, according to the judicial interpretation given by this court in Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 909, the words 'to regulate,' implied in its nature full power over the thing to be regulated. It excludes necessarily the action of all others that would perform the same operation on the same thing."

Judge Story, in discussing the treaty-making power, limits it thus:

"A power [to make treaties] given by the Constitution cannot be construed to authorize a destruction of other powers [to dispose of lands] given in the same instrument. It must be construed, therefore, in subordination to it, and cannot supersede or interfere with any other of its fundamental provisions. Each is equally obligatory and of paramount authority within its scope, and no one embraces a right to annihilate any other."

In the United States vs. Gratiot, 14 Peters, 525, 538, the court, in commenting on the words of the Constitution "dispose of," say:

"The disposal must be left to the discretion of Congress. The power over the public lands is vested in Congress by the Constitution without limitation."

In Scott vs. Sanford, 19 Howard, 436, it was said:

"This clause of the Constitution authorizing Congress to 'dispose of the territory,' applied only to the property which the States held in common at that time, and has no reference whatever to any territory which the new sovereignty might afterward itself acquire."

But the power to govern territories, and as a consequence to dispose of the public lands, was declared to be:

"The inevitable consequence of the right to acquire territory."—Page 443.

And the court said—

"We do not mean, however, to question the power of Congress in this respect. The power to expand the territory of the United States by the admission of new States is plainly given."—Page 447.

And referring to this same territory acquired from France, including the Cherokee neutral lands, the court say:

"It was acquired by the General Government as the representative and trustee of the people of the United States, and it must therefore be held in that character for their common and equal benefit."

"It is undoubtedly necessary that some Government should be established in order to organize society and to protect the inhabitants in their persons and property; and as the people of the United States could act in this matter only through the Government which represented them, and through which they spoke and acted when the territory was obtained, it was not only within the scope of its powers, but it was its duty to pass such laws and establish such a government as would enable those by whose authority they acted to reap the advantages anticipated from its acquisition, and to gather there a population which would enable it to assume the position to which it was destined among the States of the Union. The power to acquire necessarily carries with it the power to preserve and apply to the purposes for which it was acquired. The form of government to be established necessarily rested in the discretion of Congress."—Page 448.

It will be seen the power to dispose of the public lands and to institute territorial governments are declared to exist, and it is immaterial whether they rest on the clause authorizing Congress to "dispose of the public lands" or the "power to admit new States."

In either view the powers are exclusively in Congress.

In 19 Howard, 447, the court say:

"As the propriety of admitting a new State is committed to the sound discretion of Congress, the power to acquire territory for that purpose, to be held by the United States until it is in a suitable condition to become a State upon an equal footing with the other States, must rest upon the same discretion. It is a question for the political department of the Government, and not the judicial; and whatever the political department of the Government shall recognize as within the limits of the United States, the judicial department is also bound to recognize."

By the political department is here meant Congress especially. (7 Howard, 1.)

The President and Senate, under cover of the treaty-making power, cannot establish a territorial or State government. That, by the universal opinion of all lawyers and courts,

"Is a question for the political department."

The power to dispose of the public lands is exclusively in Congress for various reasons:

First. If the treaty-making power can dispose of the public lands they may make a sale in one gross quantity which would forever prohibit the possibility of establishing or maintaining a territorial or State government.

Second. A power conferred on Congress without limitation is necessarily exclusive, and powers granted to the President and Senate must be so construed as to limit each department to its appropriate functions. (United States vs. Nicholl, 1 Paine R., 646.)

The House of Representatives has repeatedly affirmed that the treaty-making power could not dispose of the public lands.

On the 13th July, 1868, the House passed the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in all cases where any person, prior to June 10, 1868, shall have settled on any tract of land of one hundred and sixty acres or less, in the body of lands known as the Cherokee neutral lands, and shall have made improvements thereon of the value of fifty dollars, and occupied such tract for agricultural purposes, such person, his heirs or assigns, so occupying any such tract of land shall, after due proof made in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, be entitled to enter and receive a patent for the lands so occupied on paying $1 25 an acre within one year, in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe. And the money so to be paid for said lands shall be paid over to said Cherokee Indians."

This remains undisposed of in the Senate.

On the 27th May, 1868, a treaty was concluded with the Osage Indians by which eight million three thousand two hundred and three acres of land were to be sold to the Leavenworth, Lawrence, and Galveston Railroad Company for nineteen cents an acre.

On the 18th of June the House passed a resolution, as follows:

"Resolved, (as the sense of this House.) That the objects, terms, conditions, and stipulations of the aforesaid pretended treaty are not within the treaty-making power, nor are they authorized either by the Constitution or laws of the United States; and therefore this House does hereby solemnly condemn the same, and does also earnestly but respectfully express the hope and expectation that the Senate will not ratify the said pretended treaty."

The Senate has not yet acted on the treaty. Some limit must be affixed to the treaty-making power. It has been well said that—

"If such an innovation of the rights of the House or of the rights of Congress be allowed to go unchallenged there is little else in the way of legislation that may not be done by treaty. Why may not the right of suffrage be regulated by reciprocal treaties? Why not so fix the price of our public lands? Why may not internal improvements, canals, and railroads be secured on the international reciprocity plan? Why not leave reciprocity in fortification treaties? Why not thus regulate the rates of postage? Why not reestablish slavery by a reciprocal treaty with Brazil or the king of Dahomey? Why not have reciprocal naturalization treaties? Why may not New England be thus put out in the cold, or the State of Michigan be alienated by treaty with the Canadian Dominion? Why not borrow money or resume specie payment by virtue of a reciprocity treaty?"

"These interrogatories give some indication of the possible scope of the powers claimed and the easy manner in which power may slide into the hands of the few, and, without changing the form of our Government, wholly subvert its popular character."—Morrill's Speech, Senate, January 14, 1869.

Congress has power to declare war as well as to dispose of the public lands. The treaty-making power can no more dispose of the lands than it can bind the nation to engage in a foreign war.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot predict, but I cannot doubt what will be the final decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on the questions I have discussed. I do not believe that three thousand families will or ought to be driven from homes acquired under the circumstances I have stated.

The Legislature of Kansas can enact an occupying claimant law and a five years' statute of limitations, which will give some protection to these settlers and bring their rights to a speedy decision. I believe they now are entitled to the benefit of the homestead and preemption laws.

I believe it is the duty of Congress to assert its rightful power over the public lands, by enacting a law to rescind the sale to Joy, and thereby to that extent annul the treaty. Good faith and justice to the Cherokee nation require that these lands should be opened to preemption entries, and the money for which the lands shall thus be sold be paid over to that nation.

If the treaty-making power is tolerated or sustained in the assumption of a right to dispose of the public domain, these Kansas settlers will not alone be the sufferers; but the whole people, the Constitution itself, will be involved in the calamity.

Congress, in whose popular branch the people's voice is heard and felt, will no longer determine the land policy of the nation in the interests of the people; but speculators and monopolists will flourish on robberies perpetrated under cover of treaties privately made, secretly ratified, and carried into effect by agencies uncontrolled by the millions whose rights and interests they will sacrifice. I will, when it will be in order to do so, introduce a bill to carry these views into effect, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That so much of the treaties between the United States and the Cherokee nation of Indians, proclaimed August 11, 1866, and June 10, 1868, as profess to authorize sale of the lands described in the seventeenth article of said first-mentioned treaty, and all contracts and grants purporting to be made thereunder, be and are annulled and declared void; and said lands shall be and are subject to settlement, entry, and sale at $1.25 an acre under the laws of the United States regulating preemptions, which laws are extended to and made applicable to said lands; and the proceeds of the sales of said lands shall be from time to time paid over to said nation of Indians until the total sum paid them shall equal one dollar per acre for all said lands; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall refund all moneys paid to the United States under any sale made by virtue of said treaties.

President's Message and Repudiation.

SPEECH OF HON. W. MUNGEN,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 27, 1869,

On the President's message and repudiation.

MR. MUNGEN. Mr. Speaker, it is but seldom I trespass upon the time of this House in the way of speech-making. I do not think that I am so anxious to "appear in public on the stage" as several gentlemen within the sound of my voice. But if I were, mortification and vexation would surely overtake me. If a member of this House who belongs to the same political party I do wishes to be heard, either by way of explaining a measure, against a measure, or in any other manner, the tyranny of the inexorable two-thirds rule, forced and backed by the courtesy and more than Chesterfield politeness of the dominant party upon this floor, will, as a general rule, choke him down, and he must remain silent.

I had occasion to remark on this floor, more than a year since, as follows:

"Ever since the close of the war, and for some time before, the course of policy adopted by my friends on the other side of the House has clearly indicated that party success is their paramount object."

"Cabals and caucus settle questions of the gravest moment and deepest import to the Government. By a secret decree, agreed upon in a party caucus, and made, not as in former times, in the happy days of the Republic, any measure may be brought forward, and, under the lash of the previous question and the spur of passion and fanaticism, is passed and becomes a law; no discussion, no amendment being allowed."

The following preamble and resolution offered by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL,] and the action had thereupon, will fully demonstrate the truth of my assertion:

"Whereas the President of the United States, in his annual message to the Fortieth Congress at its third session, says: 'It may be assumed that the holders of our securities have already received upon their bonds a larger amount than their original investment, measured by a gold standard. Upon this statement of facts it would seem but just and equitable that the six per cent. interest now paid by the Government should be applied to the reduction of the principal in semi-annual installments, which in sixteen years and eight months would liquidate the entire national debt. Six per cent. in gold would at present rates be equal to nine per cent. in currency, and equivalent to the payment of the debt one and a half time in a fraction less than seventeen years. This, in connection with all the other advantages derived from their investment, would afford to the public creditors a fair and liberal compensation for the use of their capital, and with this they should be satisfied. The lessons of the past admonish the lender that it is not well to be over-anxious in exacting from the borrower rigid compliance with the letter of the bond;' and whereas such sentiments, if permitted to go to the world without immediate protest, may be understood to be the sentiments of the people of the United States and their Representatives in Congress: Therefore,

Resolved, That all forms and degrees of repudiation of national indebtedness are odious to the American people. And that under no circumstances will their Representatives consent to offer the public creditor, as full compensation, a less amount of money than that which the Government contracted to pay him."

This supposed to be very important preamble and resolution may be found in the Daily Congressional Globe of the 15th of December, 1868.

Here is a pretty bolus for a political doctor—no personal disrespect to the gentleman—to attempt to force down my throat. Does the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania suppose that he has either the authority, the right, or the power to mix up a set of words in such a form as to be palatable to him, and then, while refusing to allow any modification, any qualification, any amendment, any explanation on the part of gentlemen on this side of the House, to whom those words are obnoxious, force them to vote his resolution through or be stigmatized as repudiators and as not being willing to pay the just debts of the Government? Does the overwhelming majority on the other side of the House and on the side of the bankers and bondholders of the Government, as is shown by their votes and actions on this floor, suppose that by any preamble or resolution, or by any attempt to avoid discussion and debate on the momentous questions touching the financial condition of this country, they can intimidate any one? I beg leave very respectfully to inform those gentlemen, if any there be holding such opinions, that they are mistaken in their estimate of at least a few over here.

The self-congratulating chuckle in which the gentlemen on the bondholding side of the question involved in the resolution indulged when they got the matter through on the 14th day of last December, was evidence, to my mind at least, that they thought the country was safe and had been saved alone by words. Well, no matter; words have often passed for patriotism, gravity for wisdom, moneyed speculations at the expense of the Government for loyalty. Sending all our wives, relations, and every one else than our sons and brothers, &c., to the Army and staying at home ourselves have drawn columns of applause from a subsidized press.

But what is this resolution, this great panacea, this antidote for all the presidential poison? The President told a great many truths and showed up a great many of the sins of omission and commission on the part of this extremely loyal Republican party. Not being able to avoid the force of the argument he used, nor to contradict the statements he made, it is perhaps thought by selecting part of his remarks relative to the amount of interest which has already been paid to the shylocks and bankers and shavers and bondholders to stigmatize him and every one who voted against the preamble and resolution in question as repudiators. With a view to make us all repudiators who would not vote with him we have the words of the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. E. B. WASHBURN,] as follows:

"As I understand, Mr. Speaker, a negative vote on this question will indorse the extract from the President's message and favor repudiation."

This was upon the question of agreeing to the preamble and the first clause of the resolution.

A few minutes before this the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] had demanded a division, so as to have a separate vote on the preamble and resolution. The Speaker decided thus:

"The Chair stated that the previous question would operate on the preamble and resolution unless some gentlemen demanded a separate vote. It was not demanded. The preamble simply recites an extract from the President's message."

Now, there are words and deductions in the preamble which are not to be found in the President's message, and it so shows on its face; but we must vote for words interpolated, or rather claimed to be "a mere recital of the message," where our senses contradict the statement and the language contradicts it; and there is no chance to have a separate vote, because some gentleman had not demanded a separate vote at a moment previous. With the ruling I find no fault; in one point of view it is according to the rules. But it is very unfortunate, when we do not have the means of knowing beforehand what the gentleman from Pennsylvania or Illinois or somewhere else is going to force upon us, and therefore are not prepared to call for a division instantaneously—I say it is hard to be told that we cannot have a separate vote; and because we will not indorse all he says we have to be denounced as repudiators; and the Republican newspapers abuse us for our votes. The clue was very cleverly given by the gentleman from Illinois, and was not contradicted by the Speaker.

With all due respect to the Speaker, I may be allowed to say, that there was a very important part of the President's message which was not recited touching the point at issue, and immediately preceding the extract quoted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL,] and which would make the sentence taken all together bear a very different meaning. The gentleman from Pennsylvania who penned the preamble and resolution in question knows very well, or at least ought to know, that great injustice was done the President by the recital of only a part of the message in the preamble. He knows that the President distinctly, in the same paragraph from which he quoted, disclaims anything like repudiation. Here is the first part of the same paragraph and immediately preceding the extract. It will be found on page 11 of the message as printed and furnished to members of both branches of Congress:

"Various plans have been proposed for the payment of the public debt. However they may have varied as to the time and mode in which it should be redeemed, there seems to be a general concurrence as to the propriety and justness of a reduction in the present rate of interest. The Secretary of the Treasury in his report recommends five per cent.; Congress, in a bill passed prior to adjournment on the 27th of July last, agreed upon four and four and a half per cent.; while by many three per cent. has been held to be an amply sufficient return for the investment. The general impression as to the exorbitancy of the existing rate of interest has led to an inquiry in the public mind respecting the consideration which the Government has actually received for its bonds, and the conclusion is becoming prevalent that the amount which it obtained was in real money three or four hundred per cent. less than the obligations which it issued in return."

"It cannot be denied that we are paying an extravagant percentage for the use of the money borrowed, which was paper currency, greatly depreciated below the value of coin. This fact is made apparent when we consider that bondholders receive from the Treasury, upon each dollar they own in Government securities, six per cent. in gold, which is nearly or quite equal to nine per cent. in currency; that the bonds are then converted into capital for the national banks, upon which those institutions issue their circulation, bearing six per cent. interest; and that they are exempt from taxation by the Government and the States, and thereby enhanced two per cent. in the hands of the holders. We thus have an aggregate of seventeen per cent. which may be received upon each dollar by the owners of Government securities. A system that produces such results is justly regarded as favoring a few at the expense of the many, and has led to the further inquiry whether our bondholders, in view of the large profits which they have enjoyed, would themselves be averse to a settlement of our indebtedness upon a plan which would yield them a fair remuneration, and at the same time be just to the tax-payers of the nation. Our national credit should be sacredly observed; but in making provision for our creditors we should not forget what is due to the masses of the people."

Then immediately follows the words quoted in the preamble, "It may be assumed," &c. Now, Mr. Speaker, no fair-minded man can assert that there is anything whatever favoring repudiation in the paragraph quoted from page 11. The trouble is this with the banking and bondholding gentlemen, or their friends on this floor: they did not wish the people to know that they received seventeen per cent. per annum on their bonds; nor did they like to have mentioned the enormous profits they have derived from this bond and national bank scheme, so artfully devised and shrewdly managed. Nor do they wish the attention of the people called to their own rights—to "what is due the masses of the people."

Allow me further to say, with a view of correcting what was evidently a mistake of the Speaker, that the following words contained in the last few lines of the preamble already referred to are not mere recital of the President's message, nor are they contained in the message:

"And whereas such sentiments, if permitted to go to the world without immediate protest, may be understood to be the sentiments of the people of the United States and their Representatives in Congress."

The modesty of the resolution in question is only equaled by the ability and patriotism of those who supported it. They speak fully and freely for "the American people," which under republican rule, I presume, means whites, blacks, mulattoes, Indians, Chinese, and all. Now let me say that in my opinion, if the resolution had been made so as to read and utter an expression of the sense of this House, it would have been at least as forcible, and certainly more becoming. And then, "that all forms and degrees of repudiation," &c. I presume we are to understand by this that to offer to pay the bondholders in the legal-tender notes of the Government instead of in gold is some "form or degree of repudiation." It is not understood by those gentlemen to be repudiation in any "form or degree" to compel the crippled pensioner to take rags and green paint for his pittance; or to force the farmer, the mechanic, the sewing woman, the business man to receive rags for their work, labor, and productions. But ask a bondholder to give up his bond and take greenbacks, and thus stop the accumulating interest, that is repudiation "in some form or degree." If to do this and thereby lighten the burden of taxation on a down-trodden, oppressed, and overtaxed people is "some form or degree of repudiation," then am I guilty. "Equal taxation and no privileged classes" is my motto.

The hypocritical howl and whine raised by the moneyed interests of the country when you talk about taxing the bonds, or about the injustice in not having them pay their just proportion of tax, is truly amusing. They are all loyal; they loaned their money to the Government when it needed the money; they must have the terms of their bond: and when Congressmen undertake to say, and do say, anything like that contained in the resolution referred to, you hear from Wall street, and from all those interested in fleecing the people in this way, the compliments paid by Shylock to Portia:

"A Daniel come to judgment! yea, a Daniel! O noble judge! O wise and upright judge! How much more elder art thou than thy looks!"

Away with such stuff, such nonsense! The fact is that the capitalists and dominant politicians of this country were the means of prolonging the war at least two years, and were largely instrumental in saddling the Government with a debt which, unless a different policy shall be adopted, never will be paid. In fact, judging by the funding bill now pending, which will tax the people three or four times the whole amount of our debt, enormous as it is, during the proposed forty years, and then not have a single cent of the principal paid, looks more like repudiation than anything I have seen or heard of lately.

I charge the capitalists and the dominant politicians with prolonging this war at least two years; and while they were doing so a subsidized press and subsidized stump orators were charging that it was the Democratic party that was doing this, and giving aid and comfort and sympathy to the enemy. The capitalists, with the keen scent of the vulture when a carcass is at hand, stood aloof, gathering their money together, their safes locked and double-barred, their purse-strings tightly tied, their fingers eagerly clutching their treasure. They were anxiously counting the days and weeks when the Government would be compelled to give them their own terms for their gold. Mr. Chase, then Secretary of the Treasury, a banker and capitalist himself, got up the greenbacks; and gold went up as high as two hundred and eight-five per cent. in June, 1863. This would not do! Capitalists wanted a better thing. The greenbacks were almost worthless, and made so by the capitalists themselves. The nation, bleeding at every pore, must stand the money-leeches still further, and they forced the Government to issuing bonds, which sharpers bought up at forty to fifty cents on the dollar; and to add to all this their course of policy, financially, caused the Government to pay two or three prices for everything required to carry on the war.

Let me suppose a case: suppose the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania were in the Potomac river and struggling for his life to get out, and suppose that with the aid of forty dollars he would be enabled to succeed; Jay Cooke comes along, and, comprehending the situation, with an eye to business, looks at the struggle of my Pennsylvania friend and calculates how long it will be until he can barely sign his name to a piece of paper, from sheer exhaustion. He finds my friend getting weaker, and when he is about to sink Mr. Cooke says, "I will furnish the forty dollars on one or two trifling conditions;" almost dying, Mr. BROOMALL gasps out, "What are the conditions?" He is informed that for the forty dollars he must give Mr. Cooke his note for $100; he must pay interest semi-annually in gold on the $100, and in addition must keep Mr. Cooke clear of the payment of all local and municipal taxes on that amount. He also says that the note can be paid any time between five years and twenty years thereafter. My Pennsylvania friend must have the money or sink and die, and to preserve his existence he accedes to Mr. Cooke's proposition, and gets out of the river. He gives his note for the $100, and as time rolls on he punctually pays his six per cent. interest in gold, which costs him nine per cent. in the currency he is compelled to take for his labor, &c., until he has paid Mr. Cooke the full amount of the forty dollars in gold, or its equivalent, which we will presume he received, and also legal interest thereon. By paying the interest in gold semi-annually on $100, and the exemption from taxation counted in, Mr. Cooke very soon gets his forty dollars with legal interest. After thinking the matter over the gentleman from Pennsylvania concludes he would do well to lift that note and stop the interest. Accordingly, having the legal right so to do, he demands the note of Mr. Cooke and tenders the currency of the country, legal-tenders, for its face. Cooke indignantly refuses. He then offers forty dollars in gold, the amount he received, and demands the note. Whereupon Mr. Cooke flies into a passion, calls such propositions "some form or degree of repudiation;" calls to mind the helpless condition of my Pennsylvania friend when he was struggling in the river, and gets all Wall street and all the presses he can control to denounce him as a repudiator. Mr. BROOMALL remonstrates, and says: "I have fulfilled my contract; if I keep paying this usurious interest it will break me up, so that I can neither pay interest nor principal; and you, Mr. Cooke, will thus force me to repudiate this debt." Who would call the gentleman from Pennsylvania a repudiator? Where is the member that would rise in his place and denounce any one but the one who held the note? Who would say, by resolution or otherwise, that this was any "form or degree of repudiation?" Who would say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, by every rule of right and justice, would not be entitled to his note?

Who will say that such a manner of extorting the note in the first place was not swindling, bare-faced swindling?

Webster defines the word swindling as follows: "To cheat or defraud grossly, or with deliberate artifice; as to swindle a man out of his property." The word swindle, as a noun, he says is "the act or process of defrauding by systematic imposition." Who will say that money so obtained is not obtained by fraud and systematic imposition? He defines the word repudiation to mean "the act of repudiating or disclaiming, as the repudiation of a doctrine, a debt," &c. Repudiation, therefore, would seem to be less obnoxious than swindling. The American people, by a large majority, will indorse such a course as proposed by Mr. BROOMALL to Mr. Cooke in this supposed instance whenever the question of such mis-called repudiation is fairly submitted to them. If this be repudiation, then I am a repudiator; and whenever I shall be forced to choose between swindling and repudiation I will certainly favor the latter, as being, if anything, the lesser evil.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have a parallel case in our national history. The abolitionists of the North and the fire-eaters of the South had been quarreling and wrangling for years—the North complaining about the undue advantage the South had in representation, and the South complaining about the great advantages the North had in tariffs, &c., until finally the North and South each got up a sectional party, headed respectively by Lincoln and Breckinridge, and ran their candidates upon sectional grounds, neither party expecting an electoral vote from the opposing section, nor did they get one. Treason reared its horrid front, Sumter was fired on, and grim-visaged war commenced in earnest. The Government, in place of having a little breakfast job, as President Lincoln said, on hand, an outbreak which could easily be put down with seventy-five thousand men in three months, soon found itself struggling for its very life. The country rushed to arms without regard to party, determined to uphold the old flag and the Constitution. Assurances were given by the President and by Congress that it would not be a war to interfere with the domestic institutions of the South or for any other purpose than to restore peace, and proclamations were issued by the President calling upon the rebels to lay down their arms and accept the terms of peace offered them upon that single condition. But no, the South did not accept the proposition, and the devil was let loose for a season, apparently, and the nation was almost in death's agony.

Now here is the parallel: Government struggling for its life; Wall street brokers looking calmly on as it is getting weaker from loss of blood and the enormous drain upon its energies; Wall street broker says to Uncle Sam, "I will let you have $400,000 on one or two trifling conditions;" Uncle Sam wishes to find out the conditions, when he is coolly informed that Mr. Broker must have Government bonds to the amount of $1,000,000 for his $400,000, the same proportion Jay Cooke demanded; must have six per cent. interest in gold payable semi-annually on $1,000,000, and must be exempt from the payment of all local and municipal taxes thereon, and then the notes may be payable in from five to twenty years. Government must have money or die, and is forced to accept the swindling proposition. Jeff Davis & Co. looking on say, "A Government forced to that condition—forced to accept such terms—cannot stand long. Let us hope. Her capitalists are doing more to break their Government down than the confederate forces can do by fighting." They were thus encouraged, and I feel safe in saying that if the capitalists had come manfully up and advanced their funds to aid the Government to put down the rebellion, as freely as the soldiers in the field and the sailors in the Navy bared their breasts to the red flame of battle, the war would not have lasted half the time it did. The capitalists had the money to give, and as much as was necessary, but would not give it until they got two or three hundred per cent. profit. Out upon the hypocritical cry of loyalty now raised by such men to extort more money from the toiling and laboring masses of the country! The capitalists, with one or two honorable exceptions, are fairly chargeable with half the lives lost in the war.

Gentlemen on this floor can and do talk very flippantly about the faith of the Government, the credit of the Government being maintained inviolate, the obligations under which we rest to pay off the national debt, and they indulge in a great deal of fanfaronade upon the subject. Allow me to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that the Republican party and a Republican Congress were the first to introduce anything like repudiation into the national legislation. Gentlemen may smile and look incredulous, but those smiles and looks do not and cannot controvert the facts of history. There are gentlemen now on the floor of this House who voted in favor of making greenbacks a legal tender for the payment of all debts excepting import duties. By their votes they authorized and countenanced the violation of private contracts between individuals. A contract or a note which by its express terms was payable in gold could by their repudiation scheme be paid in greenbacks worth thirty to fifty cents on the dollar. States in which the Republican party had the ascendancy in their legislation were not slow in following in the footsteps of a repudiating Republican Congress. California, Kentucky, and Massachusetts, however, were honorable exceptions to this infamous swindle and repudiation. Banks paid those who had gold deposits in greenbacks.

Among many instances which came under my own observation I will allude to only one. A soldier who volunteered in one of the Ohio regiments, the eighty-second, had a few hundred dollars—I think $500—of his hard earnings saved for the purpose of buying a home for himself and his young wife and babe. Having volunteered, he was waited on by a very loyal Republican living near Roundhead, in my district, who wished to borrow the money. The soldier loaned him the money and took his note payable in gold, the same kind of currency he loaned. Not long after the soldier went to the field; I think at the battle of Antietam—not certain as to the battle-field, nor is it material—a bullet struck him, and he fell to rise no more, "with his back to the field and his feet to the foe." His widow and child left helpless, she called on the "loyal" gentleman for the money he had borrowed. He tendered her the amount in greenbacks, which cost him forty cents on the dollar. She refused the infamous proposition and brought suit in the common pleas court to recover the gold. But the court pointed to the repudiation act of a Republican Congress, decided against the widow, and she was compelled to take the greenbacks; or, in other words, to take forty cents on the dollar for the claim. But be careful! That was good enough for the poor widow and orphan according to Republican legislation. When Mr. Banker, Bondholder, or shoddy nabob, however, has to receive anything, it must be in gold, or else the man who opposes him and offers him greenbacks is a repudiator. Is not such a case as I have put "some form or degree of repudiation?" I call it repudiation of the vilest and foulest kind; swindling would be a more appropriate name.

But how is it about the claims of loyal men against this Government? Millions of dollars are justly due to honest men from the Government. One case will serve to illustrate the character of these claims, and I feel constrained to view the subject briefly, to ascertain whether the majority of this House may not justly be called repudiators. Mr. Anderson, of Nashville—and this is not a fictitious case—at the time our troops took possession of that place, was the proprietor of two lumber-yards therein. Lieutenant A. A. Monroe and forty men of the twenty-first Ohio were put in charge of the yards, with instructions to let nothing go out except on written orders from military authorities. The orders were, of course, strictly obeyed, and every stick and board and sash and door were taken by our Government authorities there, and used by our troops in the construction of Fort Negley, the barracks, the hospital, the pontoons and railroad bridges. The stock invoiced by the books, at cost price in 1862, was nearly twenty-seven thousand dollars. It was all or nearly all the old gentleman possessed on earth. He let it go freely, relying on the certificates from our officers; and here it is nearly seven years and no payment yet. He has worked and begged, tried the courts, and is now asking this Congress to pay him. There is no question asked about his loyalty—that is granted on all hands. There is no question about the justness of his claim. He has Colonel Morton's orders and vouchers. But members say if we commence paying this class of claims there is no telling where we will stop—that the Government cannot pay these claims. Not only this; the course of legislation and the policy of the last few Congresses, all Republican, in regard to the just claims of all loyal citizens for property taken, used, and appropriated by our Government, tends directly to cut off at least three fourths of these claims.

What is the reason that the statute of limitations runs against their claims but does not run against the Government as between it and our citizens in any case? The different courts and commissions and congressional committees, &c., through which these claims generally have to run the gauntlet, is much more intricate and labyrinthine than Dickens's circumlocution office. Claimants get into the mazes of all these things, and after begging, praying, and entreating for their just dues are likely to be referred to the Court of Claims. Going there, with their hat in hand, they learn to their utter astonishment that they are barred by the statute of limitations, six years having elapsed since the Government appropriated their property, and, in many instances, left them penniless and destitute. Wronged and robbed by the Government they loved, they are sent home to eke out their old days as best they can in poverty and destitution. Do gentlemen here who voted for these acts—this splendid mix of circumlocution and repudiation—see any "form or degree of repudiation" made manifest in these things? Gentlemen do not seem to take any especial notice of gross violations of the nation's faith, unless it be something affecting banker's or bondholder's interests, or touching the "financial rings," now so completely fettering the industry and prosperity of the land and people. Are not the claims of a farmer, a mechanic, a soldier, a widow, and orphan, or a crippled pensioner, as sacred as the claims of the aristocratic bondholder? The American people will answer in the affirmative.

Now, the non-payment of these claims is repudiation. This neglect is inexcusable in the Congress, and especially so when we see the eagerness manifested to assure the bondholder that he will get his pay promptly, and in gold at that. What a contrast between the estimation placed upon the bondholder and the man who gave all he had to the Government, and now seeks some return to enable him to live! One is comforted with high-sounding assurances that Congress is his most devoted, obedient, and humble servant, or words to that effect, and the great name of the American people is called in to give a kind of spread-eagle gloss to the whole affair. How different is the treatment of the Government's honest creditors! I have often thought that I would like to know how many members of this Congress are bondholders and interested in banking, and to what amount. It would be advantageous to future generations to know this as well as to know how many just claims, such as Mr. Anderson's, are virtually if not actually repudiated by us, if this kind of neglect be properly called repudiation. If this knowledge would not be advantageous it would serve to gratify a very laudable curiosity, and might be a key to some of the doings in this our day and generation. Men's farms, loyal men—the name is now threadbare, but loyal is the phrase—have been dug up and scarred and corrugated all over with trenches, rifle-pits, parapet lines, redoubts, and all manner of field-works; their homes destroyed, their lands laid waste, their timber cut down to give range to our artillery, and these men fairly beggared. Their claims are suffered to pass unnoticed; their petitions are passed by

"As the idle wind, which we respect not."

Every obstacle, no matter how trifling, seems to be presented, and all this without the shadow of an excuse in many instances. Why is this? When the bondholder comes forward there is no trouble. His gold is ready, his interest promptly paid, and men high in position are only pleased to salute him with the utmost cordiality. No repudiation for him; but the poor claimant, how different his treatment! In the case of Sue Murphey no questions are raised against the justness of her claim or touching her loyalty. All this is admitted, but she is told that she cannot be paid, for it would open the door to so many other similar claims that the Government could not pay them. Here is fair repudiation. Why not say the Government has too many bonds out, and therefore cannot pay them? Why not repudiate in this line, too? But no; the Government must pay them off in gold, forsooth. They belong to bondholders.

Then look at the case of the firm of Childs, Pratt & Fox, of St. Louis. Under the authority of General Frémont they furnished large amounts of military supplies to the Federal troops, and received therefor vouchers from General Frémont's chief quartermaster, General McKinstry. Mark one feature to which I will allude in a moment, that of blankets furnished by this firm. A large portion of the blankets were purchased by them from one Hugh Campbell, of St. Louis. This firm was, I believe, the only one in the city which responded to the call of the Government for supplies for our suffering troops. The balance of the merchants stood back while this firm threw into the scale all they could, and taxed their credit to its utmost to meet General Frémont's demands. A Mr. Haskell, I believe, also came forward and advanced some army supplies, taking therefor similar vouchers.

But President Lincoln, who was then "the Government," or some one else, removed General Frémont, chiefly, I believe, because he was too fast in exposing the radical scheme of making men and brothers out of negroes. A great flurry pervaded the Republican camp about extravagance, too, and in consequence thereof and to smooth matters over a kind of a committee was appointed, composed of Hon. Judge Davis, of Illinois, now of the Supreme Court; the immortal Joe Holt, of judge-advocate notoriety; and one Hugh Campbell, of St. Louis, the gentleman who, unwilling to sell his blankets to the Government, preferred to and did sell them to Messrs. Childs, Pratt & Fox at eight dollars per pair, and they were furnished, if I mistake not, to the Government at that rate. This celebrated committee proceeded to St. Louis to look after General Frémont's operations, and those of his quartermaster, General McKinstry. Among the first of the official duties they deemed it necessary to perform was to visit the establishment of the said Childs, Pratt & Fox, seize their books, examine their vouchers given by the quartermaster, reduce their claim largely, and among other things were the vouchers for blankets. They cut down the charge for the blankets from eight dollars per pair to $3 50 per pair, although Campbell, one of the members of the committee, had sold the same blankets to the firm at eight dollars per pair. This committee compelled Childs, Pratt & Fox to give up those vouchers—the evidence that they had furnished supplies to our troops—given them by a Government officer. There never has been, never can be, any question raised as to the loyalty—I am disgusted with the word—of this firm. They were compelled to take just what they could get at the hands of this immortal committee—immortal as the name of Jeffries in English jurisprudence. I have been told that these merchants very narrowly escaped imprisonment in some loyal bastille. They were compelled to go into the Court of Claims, where their case is yet, asking for their just demands.

This is some form or degree of repudiation, according to my judgment. Did not Lincoln or a Republican Congress indorse the action of this committee? Did not Mr. Lincoln shortly afterward appoint Mr. Davis to the Supreme bench? A few claims of private citizens have been adjusted, but the time, trouble, anxiety, and expense incurred in getting them through none but the claimants know. The number so paid are as nothing compared to the large amount awaiting adjustment in the different departments of the circumlocation office. If we have not money to pay these claims with at present let us adjust matters and give certificates of indebtedness to our honest creditors, and then pay them as soon as we can. Let the books be posted and balances struck. This delay and neglect on the part of the Government is unpardonable. It is clearly, broadly, distinctly, essentially, and emphatically repudiation, and this House has declared every form or degree of repudiation obnoxious. Perhaps they only had reference to the bondholders and not to any other Government creditor. If so, they should say as much plainly.

More than this: we all know the great love which was manifested in words for the soldiers; yet a Republican Congress repudiated the contract between the soldiers and the Government in the most direct and positive manner. Be it remembered that when the soldier volunteered it was no more nor less than a contract by which he agreed to serve his country faithfully, and the Government agreed to give him a pittance in return for services. Commissioned officers were guaranteed a certain sum of money per month, no rations being issued to them, as was the case with privates and non-commissioned officers. But in violation of this contract their wages were reduced while they were in the field fighting, and the wages of Congressmen were raised by a Republican Congress about two thousand dollars a year. As an instance, the pay of a colonel was reduced about forty dollars per month, and that of other officers in the same proportion, and they were taxed three per cent. on what they got. This injustice—this violation of the terms of the contract of their enlistment—was borne without a murmur. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] did not have a resolution rushed through this House in the name of the American people, or in any other name, protesting against this "form or degree of repudiation." Oh, no! His sympathies are reserved, doubtless, for more noble objects—the bondholders.

Let not gentlemen flatter themselves that the "American people" can be hoodwinked by wordy preambles and high-sounding resolutions. They know what all such things mean. They know, too, who have to bear the burden of taxation, as well as who are exempted from all local and municipal taxes. They know who has to earn the gold and who gets the gold, while they are compelled to take a depreciated currency—rags and ink—and are glad to get it. The men who with picks and shovels and strong arms and brave hearts burst open the banks of the Sierra Nevadas' quarry for black diamonds in our coal mines, hew down the forest, break up the prairies, build our railroads, canals, bridges, and cities; who sweat in our forges and factories, cultivate the soil, and earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow according to the word of the Almighty, are the men who should receive the gold. But under Republican rule they do not get it. Gold is for the rich man, rags for the poor. The rich are getting richer and the poor poorer every day; and this will continue to be the case until we change our financial system, so that we shall have one kind of currency for all, rich and poor, high and low. They know the trick which leading Republicans are about playing upon them in the matter of the so-called funding bill, which came so nearly being a law last summer. They know that in the course of the forty years which must elapse before their bonds will become due under this scheme they and their children will have paid, if they shall be base enough to submit to such consummate villany, three or four times the amount—the enormous amount—of our interest-bearing debt; and that then not one cent of that great debt will have been paid. They know that our debt is increasing every month instead of decreasing. They know that there is being built up an aristocracy of wealth, founded in a great measure upon stealings, in one form and another, from the Government.

The "American people" have read history, and are intelligent enough to apply the lessons it teaches. They have read and fully understand the strongly-drawn character of Shylock, in the Merchant of Venice. To those gentlemen, if any such there be, who wish to exact the pound of flesh ("if so says the bond," which I deny) from the toil-worn and oppressed people of our land, I would say:

"Prepare thee to cut off the flesh; Shed thou no blood; nor cut thou less, nor more; But just a pound of flesh: if thou tak'st more, Or less, than just a pound—be it but so much As makes it light, or heavy, in the substance, Or the division of the twentieth part Of one poor scruple; nay, if the scale do turn But in the estimation of a hair,— Thou diest, and all thy goods are confiscate."

Then comes repudiation, and "the American people" will indorse it, having learned the lesson from the examples set by Republican Congresses.

The American people are well aware that by just such legislation and similar proceedings to those enacted and being enacted by the Republican party it required about two hundred years to place all the real estate, the landed property, of Great Britain, in the hands of about three thousand persons. The people know and feel the wickedness of the attempt to fasten a national debt upon them and their posterity for all time to come, and they will and do repudiate the Hamiltonian heresy, lately revived by the bondholding and banking interests, that "a national debt is a national blessing." The Government of Great Britain never expects to pay the national debt of that country—never. Their consols, or certificates of indebtedness, as well as their real estate, have gotten chiefly into the hands of the wealthy. The landholders, who nearly all belong to what is styled the nobility, wring enormous rents and tithes and taxes and all manner of contributions from their tenants. All the tax to pay the interest on the public indebtedness is extorted from the labor of that country. Capitalists have so managed and shaped matters that many of them derive their living off of their Government certificates; and it has been the constant aim of the aristocracy to have the people believe that a national debt is a national blessing. The shoddies and bondholders in this country are playing the same game; but thank Heaven they find their strong advocates on the side of the Republican party, and on that side only.

But if it be right and just and legal to pay the national debt in gold, that is, to redeem the bonds in gold, why the hurry to fund the debt, and that at a lower rate of interest, say from three to four and a half per cent. instead of six per cent. semi-annually, as it now is? There is certainly something rotten in Denmark. These shrewd money-lenders have no more conscience than the person who would sell his soul for money to perdition. I speak of them as a class. They are Shylocks, sir; Shylocks! Yes, they are, if anything, worse than Shylocks; for he only claimed at most "what was written in the bond." But these men ask more; they ask gold where it is not so written. Fearing that the people will refuse their unjust demand they are in haste to change the terms of the bonds so as to make the bonds as well as the interest all payable in gold, and then as a kind of off-set and to quiet the apprehensions of their victims, the taxpayers, they propose to take a lower rate of interest. They can well afford to do this, and they doubtless expect the people to thank them for the act and to look upon them as public benefactors.

The most clear-sighted and observing of what we may call the moneyed aristocracy of our country discover an uneasiness in the popular mind, a restiveness among the people, a low murmuring, like the sound of distant thunder; in short, the premonitory symptoms of a great uprising among the masses. The battle between labor and capital is about commencing in this country in earnest, as it did in France in the reign of Louis XVI; and the capitalists are busy fortifying themselves against the day of wrath and retribution by legislation. The finely sounding words of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] in a speech, which I suppose was a bid for the next Speakership of the House, delivered not long since, seemed to me very much like the story of the boy while traveling through a graveyard whistling to keep up his courage, who says, "Who's afraid o' ghosts." The real questions of this age and people—those questions of finance and taxation, of the rights and wrongs of the masses—were not settled by the last presidential election. In the canvass they were not even discussed, except by some of the Democratic statesmen of the country. Everything was done by the Republican party to divert the minds of the people from those serious and momentous issues; and the election was determined merely upon the status of the candidate, upon the personal standing and popularity of General Grant.

The real issues are yet unsettled, and now that the political battle is over and the smoke cleared away the people begin to look anxiously around and inquire what they shall do to be saved from general bankruptcy and ruin. The schemes of honorable Senators for funding the debt brought forward by one, and for the resumption of specie payment brought up by another, show plainly that capital is intrenching itself behind cunning legislative enactments. The stringency of the money market also shows the apprehensions of capitalists. Banks in New York have been recently refusing to discount to their customers; but these loan freely to brokers, who let out the money at one half of one per cent. per day, about one hundred and eighty-two and one half per cent. per annum. Every indication points toward that fearful struggle which is approaching with the certainty of death itself when labor must and will defend itself against money. Money is said to be power, but labor is a greater power, and capital is utterly useless without labor. Capital, intrenched behind a breastwork, a masked battery, of legislative enactments, may be said to be immovable; but gentlemen will learn ere long that labor, the base of wealth, armed with truth and justice on its side, and advocated by an outraged and oppressed people, is irresistible. Let us draw a short lesson from history.

It will be enough to say, in passing, that the five officers named Ephori, who were annually elected in Lacedæmon under the code of Lycurgus, and who were invested with authority to bring to trial all who offended against the laws,

Ho. OF REPS.

President's Message and Repudiation—Mr. Mungen.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

whatever might be their rank, and with power to punish by fine or flogging even the kings and senators themselves—if these five officers had been officers of this Government they would have had their hands full of business about the capital of this nation for the past few years. What a nice time they would have had flogging the gentlemen who, as the late Mr. Stevens truthfully and honestly said, have been working outside of the Constitution. There are some gentleman under my eye who, I suspect, would have bellowed lustily. When Lycurgus returned to Sparta from Crete and the Ionian Isles he found his country in a deplorable condition, with all or nearly all of the wealth in the hands of a few, and they as corrupt as possible. He remedied this by striking down those aristocratic gentlemen, and by "some form or degree of repudiation" equalizing matters. He made their money worthless by prohibiting the use of any money except an iron coin, and by some process rendered the iron from which the coin was made worthless for mechanical purposes. On account of the hostility which he found to exist between the rich and poor—a feeling which is daily increasing here—he conceived the plan of reducing the pretensions of the rich by dividing their lands and bringing them to a level with their poorer neighbors. This was done peaceably and without bloodshed, so far as I remember, excepting that one fiery, spirited, and rich young Spartan, named Alcander, knocked an eye out of Lycurgus for meddling with his estates; but Lycurgus afterward made him his friend, as we are informed. I do not think that I would be in favor of such stringent measures in our case, for I wish to let justice take place in all these matters.

I am utterly opposed to confiscation and Radical reconstruction, which I believe are synonymous with destruction, and are convertible terms. In the history of the French Revolution we find that the horrors of that revolution stand out so bold, so terrible, and so appalling, that the mind is misled, as it were, and can see nothing of the causes which led to such awful results. The king, the aristocracy, and the clergy appear to be mute sufferers overpowered by a whirlwind of passion and frenzy. We picture to ourselves the Tuilleries deluged with blood; armed mobs dealing death and destruction wherever they went; human heads carried on pikes and lances, or rolled by hundreds into the gutters. We see the storm which, once aroused, was irresistible, and which in its mad career and by its wild and terrific fury swept into one bloody grave the nobility, the clergy, and the king, and buried deep the throne, the Crown, the titles and privileges of rank and station which had existed for centuries.

There is a fearful lesson to be learned in this; and the legislators and statesmen of our day would do well to study Thiers's history of the French Revolution, if they have not already done so. But all this fierce and bloody work had its origin in a disordered condition of society growing out of bad and unjust legislation. The reasons may be briefly summed up thus: the feudal system had gone on improving on its oppressions until it had reached a point where human endurance ceases. The exchequer was embarrassed, the coffers empty, while the people could not be more heavily taxed. The nobility, instead of submitting to a tax like that laid by Sir Robert Peel upon the aristocracy of England in a similar emergency, steadily refused to relieve the disordered state of the finances. There was a weight on the nation. The people had sunk under it till their faces were ground into the earth and no more could be expected of them. The powerful and graphic pen of Thiers tells the story thus:

"The state of France, political and economical, was in truth intolerable; there was nothing but privileges belonging to individual classes, towns, provinces, and to trades themselves—nothing but shackles upon the industry and genius of man. Civil, ecclesiastical, and military dignities were exclusively reserved for certain classes, and in those classes for certain individuals. A man could not embrace a profession unless upon certain titles and certain pecuniary conditions. All was monopolized by a few hands, and the burdens bore upon a certain class. The nobility and clergy possessed nearly two thirds of the landed property. The other third, belonging to the people, paid taxes to the king, a multitude of feudal dues to the nobility, a tithe to the clergy, and was moreover liable to the devastations of noble sportsmen and their game. The taxes on articles consumed weighed heavily on the great mass, and consequently on the people. The mode in which it was levied was vexatious; the gentry might be in arrears with impunity; the people, on the other hand, ill-treated and imprisoned, were doomed to suffer in body in default of goods. The masses, subject therefore by the sweat of the brow, defended with their blood the upper classes of society without being able to subsist themselves. Justice administered in some of the provinces by the gentry, in the royal jurisdiction by the magistrates, who purchased their offices, was slow, partial, always ruinous, and particularly atrocious in criminal cases. Individual liberty was violated by lettres de cachet, and the liberty of the press by royal censors."

Added to all this there came a hail storm, cutting off the crops, so that the winter of 1788-89 brought with it universal and intolerable suffering. Men and women, half naked and starving, roamed over the country crying for bread. Famine stared the people in the face, while those who had been enriched by their toil and sweat and privations looked on with a disdainful eye and a stony heart upon their sufferings. The voice of despair rung through the kingdom, and still the infatuated nobility rioted in luxury. Slowly and darkly heaved the storm-cloud above the horizon, yet no one regarded its threatening aspect till the sharp flashes of the lightning began to appear and successive thunder peals which followed aroused the poor and imbecile Louis XVI, and waked the clergy and nobility from their happy dreams.

Here is a picture we may study with profit if not with satisfaction, and the same goal will always be reached by tyranny. Headley says:

"England reached it; and but for the spectacle of France, just rising from her sea of blood, would have plunged into the same vortex. She chose reform rather than revolution, and it is still to be her choice till her feudal system disappears entirely. There is no help for this, and there can be none under the economy of nature and the providence of God. If a few will appropriate and spend the substance of the land the mass must suffer till despair huris them upon their oppressors."

In the conflict between the Parliament, the clergy, and the throne each called on the French nation for aid, and thus enlightened the masses on the great principles of human government, and, worse than all, respecting their own debaucheries and villainies. Mistresses of nobles decided great political questions, and bribes bought every man, from the king down to these masses. Trampled on, starving, and dying, a haughty aristocracy added insult to oppression and treated with contempt the men they defrauded. Suffering makes a people think, and a starving man learns his rights very quickly. I will only add, to finish this sketch, that the lower orders had been taxed to their utmost and the money raised all squandered by the court and aristocracy. Money must be raised, and the only chance was to attack the property and incomes of the clergy and the privileges of the nobility; and the representatives of the people, after they had assembled, were not slow in making the onslaught.

What our moneyed men fear is the "form or degree of repudiation," which oppression and wrong always engender in the human heart. The clergy and the nobility, in connection with the king, had been ruling France for a long time, and legislating for their own party and class interests and to keep themselves in power, regardless of the rights of the people. They paid little or no taxes, just as our bondholders are exempt, and if any one spoke of taxing them these privileged gentlemen would fly into a passion and become as much excited as my friend, the honorable gentleman from Maine, whose lance is always in rest to run a muck or tilt with any one who ventures to advocate the taxation of bonds or their payment in greenbacks.

Our Treasury is as much embarrassed now as was the exchequer of France in 1789. Our people are more heavily taxed than any people on the face of the earth. We have a privileged class exempted from taxation who are reveling in luxury and idleness as much as France had. We have the starving, oppressed, downtrodden, freezing, and dying poor, also. Our nabobs look upon those poor with as much indifference as the nobility of France looked upon the poor there. The foreigner, the emigrant, who, reading and hearing of "happy, free America," and crushed under the tyranny of his own land, hoping for leave to breathe the air of heaven without being taxed thereon, leaves the home of his childhood, the graves of his fathers, the loved ones at home, and comes here only to find himself more heavily taxed under republican rule than he was in Europe.

The oppressed and downtrodden of Europe in quest partly of fortune, partly of freedom, or of both at once, and eager to escape from penury or ecclesiastical and political violence, have sought what they considered a happier home on this continent. But how are they disappointed! Fort Warren and Fort La Fayette rival the Bastille of Paris. Political persecution rages with as much fury and more this day than in any European country. Men's hands may be "crimsoned with the blood of our brothers and sons," to use a loyal quotation; all is forgiven; their political disabilities are all removed if they will only acknowledge negro equality and vote the Republican ticket. The ecclesiastical bodies of this country, with but one or two honorable exceptions, are preaching and launching anathemas at those who dare vote against a Republican candidate. Chivalrous confederate generals are given a seat on this floor which they could not obtain did they vote the Democratic ticket. Democrats who fought throughout the war on the Federal side are denounced as traitors because they will not indorse the reconstruction policy of the Republican party. Like causes produce like effects, and if the same or a parallel state of affairs exist here that did in France before the reign of terror, may we not reasonably expect similar results? Where then will be your bonds? Where will your wealth go? What will become of our aristocrats? By being prudent and dealing out evenhanded justice we may avoid the danger. Let us have one kind of currency for all. If the poor man has to take greenbacks let the rich also take the same; no class legislation. We have this additional trouble which France did not have, a depreciated currency; and the capitalists have contributed largely to depreciate it. France had but one kind of money, and the difference was only in the amount held or owned by each person, and not in the quality or value thereof.

Thiers tells us that the manner of collecting the taxes in France at the time referred to was very vexatious. Is it not especially so here under Republican legislation? A swarm of supervisors of the internal revenue, collectors and their deputies, assessors and their assistants, gaugers, storehouse-keepers, special agents and detectives, whose prerogatives seem to be rather to corrupt than to correct, to say nothing of the innumerable host of employes in the customs department; officers swarming like the locusts, frogs, flies, and lice of Egypt; everything complicated and dragged as far as possible from the original simplicity and economy established by our forefathers. And to add to this, the matter of taxation as well as the manner of collection, is most unjust and obnoxious to a large portion of our people, to the laboring and producing interests of the whole community, and especially to the West. What is the reason that a ton of railroad iron now costs us in Ohio about ninety dollars when in 1859 we could purchase the same article for thirty or thirty-two dollars at the outside limit? Why is it that although England can and will furnish railroad iron, and a better article than the Pennsylvania iron men furnish, at forty dollars per ton, that we must pay ninety? At forty dollars the Englishman can afford to pay a duty of two dollars per ton, but he cannot afford to pay fifty or sixty dollars, and hence England sends but little or no railroad iron here; and Pennsylvania iron-mongers, with hearts of steel, (steal?) pocket the great difference.

Our Government scarcely gets a cent of duty or tariff from them, or upon railroad iron. Why that clause in the Pacific railroad act requiring no other but American iron made from American ore to be used in its construction? No matter how cheaply England or any other country would furnish iron, if at one third the amount the Pennsylvania iron-monger charges, still it must be American iron and no other. This is another swindle in favor of Pennsylvania and other iron-mongers. And further than this, American railroad iron—perhaps other iron for all I know—just like the bonds in this respect, pays no taxes. Why all this kind of legislation? It is the old Hamiltonian theory, "Let the Government take care of the rich and the rich will take of the poor," in contradistinction to the Jeffersonian policy, "Let the Government take care of the poor and the rich will take care of themselves." More than this, it is Republican policy and loyal Republican legislation, lacking every ingredient of good and just and wholesome legislation. The employes in the iron works are as poorly paid and fed as when iron was cheap; but the capitalists are rich; they are nearly all bondholders, and their immense gains go free from taxes. It will not do for gentlemen to tell me that labor is higher now than before the war as an excuse for their tremendous advantages in this one article. The apology might answer to account for a difference of eight or ten dollars a ton, a very liberal advance, but never will do to explain away a clear bonus from this Government of fifty or sixty dollars given to them by Republican legislation.

Look again at the exemption last summer of the manufacturers from paying their taxes on their business. New England is a manufacturing region; so are some districts in Pennsylvania—the one represented by the gentleman from that State [Mr. KELLEY] as much as any. By this one measure alone the New England States were relieved of the payment of more than sixty million dollars per annum, and Pennsylvania was largely aided. A penny saved is as good as a penny earned, and the manufacturing gentlemen are always ready and crying for more favors and exemptions. Money must be had; and if the East does not pay taxes the farmers of the West must make up their delinquencies. Why this legislation for one part of the country and one class of people at the expense of the other? New England has about one eleventh part of the population of our country, and with the city of New York holds about three fourths of the bonds which bear interest and are exempt from taxation. This beautiful, barren, and puritanically blessed portion of our land seems neither to be taxed on its capital nor its industry, while the West is taxed on both. As to the tax paid upon their lands in New England it is nothing, can be nothing comparatively, for they are worth nothing in the way of raising crops. Massachusetts and other New England States do not pretend to raise grain enough for their own home consumption. They are dependent upon the West and Southwest for supplies of breadstuffs and other eatables, such as pork, beef, &c., as well as for a market for their manufactured articles. The West could get along if the New England States were not in existence. The people in some of the New England States might eke out a meager existence upon white beans and herring; but without the West they would be strangers to the more substantial matters pertaining to the kitchen. Why, then, again I ask, this class legislation, so advantageous to the East and so injurious to the West? How long will the West submit to such legislation? Was the manufacturers tax stricken off to "bridge over" the last presidential election? At some other time gentlemen who are posted can answer. Since the legislation of last summer it has cost the Government as much or more to collect the internal revenue as it amounted to when collected. Gentlemen need not and will not contradict this when they remember that as soon as the tax on distilled spirits was reduced to fifty cents, capitalists perhaps whiskeys, bought up nearly if not quite all the high wines in bond; and the taxes paid thereon when so taken out of bond make it appear as though the act of July last was working more advantageously and yielding more revenue to the Government than the system in operation previously. This is not the case, as any sensible man will admit when he takes into consideration the revenue raised off of whisky in bond when the tax was reduced from two dollars to fifty cents per gallon.

If our capitalists, our bondholders, would do as the clear-headed and far-seeing Viscount de Noailles and the Duke d'Anguillon did when they ascended the tribune, in the French Assembly, on the evening of the 9th of August, 1789, and declared that it was foolish to attempt to force the people into tranquillity; that the best method was to remove the cause of the disturbances. In order to do this they proposed to abolish at once all those feudal rights which irritated and oppressed the country people, and also to do away with special privileges and class legislation. If the rest of the nobility had followed in these great measures of justice and reform France might have been saved the terrible scenes which followed. Let our privileged classes—our bondholders, our aristocrats—come nobly forward and say to the toiling millions of our countrymen, say to Congress, if you please, something like this: "We do not wish to escape the burden of taxation; we are willing to bear our just proportion of taxes. We admit that we have a great advantage in the way of exemption from local and municipal taxes, but we are ready to relinquish these privileges, and to have all our property, whether stocks, bonds, railroad iron, or whatever else we own and possess, taxed as other property is taxed."

Let them admit the truth and say: "Our fellow-countrymen have to receive greenbacks for everything they earn, for their labor, their manufactures, their productions, their skill, and energy. They never see a gold dollar nor a gold eagle, that most beautiful coin on earth. Let the Government issue greenbacks, legal-tender notes, and give us them for our interest-bearing bonds. This will take the heavy load of gold interest from the shoulders of honest toil. It will stop the payment of the semi-annual gold interest. We capitalists will take these greenbacks which bear no interest and invest them in the development of the material resources of our country; the completion of unfinished railroads; the building of new ones; the improvement of the magnificent water-power of the country for the purposes of milling and manufacturing; clearing up the western forests; the development of our mineral resources, and the other varied and multifarious channels of commerce and industry. We are willing with our capital to aid industry, and thus with capital and labor going together hand in hand the wilderness will soon be made to blossom as the rose; and the country will rise in its might and its glory eclipsing all the nations of the earth."

This would be magnanimity; but at the same time it would be simply justice. More than this, it would forever bar and stop any mention of repudiation, that skeleton in every rich man's house; that specter which haunts the pillow of the bondholder; that Nemesis which will surely overtake the Shylocks if they will persist in draining the life-blood out of the people in the shape of taxes to pay gold interest, and which drain must culminate in repudiation when the tax-payers have no longer anything with which to meet and satisfy the demands of the tax gatherer. The Government is now paying more for money than private individuals following any legitimate business can afford to pay. The investment in Government bonds is better than any other offered to capital. Capitalists framed the law, voted for it, and are getting rich at the expense of the people. Their scheme has diverted capital from its legitimate channels and has hoarded it in the safes and vaults of the United States Treasury, in the vaults and safes of the bankers and bondholders. There it lies a dead letter, not adding one iota to the material interests of the country.

By taking up the bonds as I have already suggested and issuing greenbacks for them it will do away with the national banks which are based upon these Government bonds and which are only another swindle upon the community. It will force these banks to withdraw their notes from circulation and greenbacks will take the place of the graybacks as a circulating medium. The faith of the Government will be as strictly pledged for the redemption of these greenbacks as it is now for the payment of the bonds. The volume of the currency will only be increased ten per cent. by this operation; the interest on the bonds will cease, and money will be invested in proper and legitimate business instead of lying in safes and banks idle as it now does.

In conclusion, I am not in favor of repudiation; but if any class of creditors have to wait for their pay, have to be put off, have to stand aside for any other class, I am in favor of placing Mr. Shoddy behind the honest claimant. I am in favor of justice, of equal taxation, of no privileged classes nor class legislation; and I am in favor of one kind of money for all.

SPEECH OF HON. E. C. INGERSOLL,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 27, 1869.

The House being in session for general debate—

Mr. INGERSOLL said:

Mr. SPEAKER: During many centuries there existed a set of crazy enthusiasts who were called alchemists, who spent their lives in the endeavor to find a universal solvent whereby the baser metals could be transmuted into gold. After centuries of effort they failed, and as a class they have become extinct. In our days there is another set of alchemists equally as crazy in my judgment as the former, who are attempting to discover a universal solvent by means of which they may be able to transmute paper into gold. In my judgment they will fail as their predecessors failed. And, Mr. Speaker, they ought to fail, for it is idle, ay, worse than idle to attempt to put the finances of this country on a specie basis in the present condition of affairs. I say it is impossible to accomplish such a result at the present time or at any future time while the present status of our finances continues unchanged; and if it could be done it would be but temporary, for a specie basis could not be maintained thirty days. I mean by a specie basis the excluding of any other kind of money than gold and silver as a lawful or legal tender in the payment of debts. If the Government was out of debt, if the laboring classes, the masses of the people, were out of debt, then, with the gold coin in the country, what is popularly known as a specie basis might be attained and specie payments resumed. But specie payments, at best, in the past were but a delusion. They never existed in reality; they were at all times and under all circumstances a delusion and a cheat.

HO. OF REPS.

Finance—Mr. Ingersoll.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

In those days characterized as the days of specie payments it is well known that the paper money of the country was supposed to be based on specie in the proportion of three dollars in paper to one in coin; and so long as public confidence was maintained, so long as commerce flowed on in its wonted channels, so long as there was anything like general prosperity, and so long as no one needed coin the specie basis maintained itself. But when a crisis came which shook public confidence, when the business of the country halted and became deranged to any considerable extent, and the holders of bank bills wanted to convert them into gold and silver coin, and the want of coin became anything like general, then your specie basis proved itself a monstrous swindling fraud. If only one dollar in three of the paper money was presented to the banks they might possibly have redeemed them, but if two dollars out of three were presented the banks closed their doors, and universal panic, bankruptcy, and ruin followed.

There has been no proposition, so far as I have been advised, introduced at the present session in either branch of Congress in connection with the financial condition of the country that did not have for its object the resumption of specie payments. The plans have been as various as the propositions have been numerous, but they all have the ultimate object in view of a resumption of specie payments. As I said at the outset, such a resumption is an impossibility; a specie basis could not be maintained for thirty days. A second suspension of coin payments would suddenly follow, and bankruptcy and widespread ruin and universal distress would be the result. Talk about putting this country on a specie basis now, and the only thing you will demonstrate is that you are a modern alchemist, or else one of the favored classes who have fixed and certain incomes and who reap golden harvests from the bonds of the United States, which this Government issued under the dire necessities of the war. Who is it that is asking for a resumption of specie payments? Is there a Representative on this floor from any one of the western or southern States that has had a petition sent to him asking him to vote for a return to specie payments? Not one. Have we heard of a mechanic throughout the length and breadth of this land, or of an artisan or farmer, or any one of the laboring masses of the country upon whose shoulders rest the great burden of the $2,500,000,000 of national debt, who has asked for the passage of a bill looking to the resumption of specie payments? We have not. Who is it, then, that is clamoring for the resumption of specie payments? Is it the debtor class? No, sir; it would be absolute ruin and beggary to the laboring and debtor class of the country if we should force a return to specie payments.

Is it the producing classes, the artisan that sweats over the anvil, the men who manage the forge, the rolling-mill, or the cotton factory? It is not the producing classes in this country or those who eat their bread in the sweat of their brow. It is the man who rolls in splendor with his coat-of-arms emblazoned on the panels of his carriage and drives his four and six in hand; it is the rich bondholder, the man who is out of debt and holds the mortgages and obligations of the people and the Government bonds who is clamoring for specie payments. The universal voice which comes from the masses of the people that support and sustain this Government is against it; all the laboring classes all over this land enter their solemn and united protest against being mortgaged body and soul to the capital of this country, as they would be upon the resumption of specie payments. Specie payments mean less wages for the laboring man, less bread for the hungry man, less comfort, less happiness, less peace, and less of everything which is good. It means oppression by the rich of the destitute and suffering; it means splendor for the rich and degradation for the poor. Why, the Government itself is in debt $2,500,000,000, and you talk about the Government resuming specie payments! Are the national banks, with a circulation of almost three hundred million dollars, prepared for a resumption of specie payments? They could not redeem one dollar in ten if you should put the country on a specie basis this year or next. I have not yet spoken of the State indebtedness, which amounts to hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars more. I have not adverted to the individual indebtedness of the people, which is estimated by some at $4,000,000,000, and by others as high as $8,000,000,000, which is due this day. And the day that you resume specie payments you say to all these creditors that they can have their gold in payment of these debts, and they will demand the gold, and the property of the laboring classes will be sacrificed to the Shylocks so that they may have their shining coin. They would soon exhaust the supply of coin, and then universal bankruptcy and ruin would envelop as a cloud the whole of this broad land. If we here, as the Representatives of the people, instead of turning our attention to devising some scheme for the resumption of specie payments, will devote our attention to promoting industry, developing the exhaustless resources of the Republic, and keep the labor of the country profitably employed—keep money abundant and at a low rate of interest—we will infuse new life into and energize all the industrial and producing powers of the whole country, and thereby develop its resources, promote its material prosperity, and increase its power to maintain and ultimately to pay its debts, we will be doing that which unborn generations will in future years bless us for. But if we return to what is known as specie payment now we will bring such ruin upon the country that generations will come and go before good and prosperous times return again.

I have heard gentlemen upon this floor say that with an accumulation of $200,000,000 of gold in the Treasury, and with a declaration on the part of Congress that the Government is ready to resume specie payments, it would restore public confidence in the ability to maintain a specie basis, and that with the $200,000,000 in coin specie payments could be resumed. Sir, this is impossible, for the reason that whenever the Government says it is ready to resume specie payments ten days would not roll over this country until the vaults of the Treasury would be as empty as the head of a modern alchemist. Gentlemen who advocate this specie basis tell us that the creditors of the Government would not realize on the bonds or the obligations of the Government. This is a fallacy and a delusion. Do not tell me that the holders of our Government bonds in Europe, who hold them to an amount equal to six or eight hundred million dollars, will fail to collect the golden harvest the moment the Government says it is ready to pay. So also would the holders of Government obligations in our own country make haste to exchange them for the gold.

But, say these resumption theorists, the Government has an option upon these bonds, some of them for fifteen years and upon others for a longer time. Suppose it has. The Government has $356,000,000 of legal-tender notes payable in coin the very minute it resumes specie payments. Suppose the bonds are not yet due; who that holds any bonds will not exchange or sell them for legal-tender notes that are due and payable in coin, and demand the gold for them? You will find that the bonds of the Government held abroad to the extent of about eight hundred million dollars will soon come back here for conversion into legal-tender notes, which are then payable in coin. Do you think they would not do that? I tell you that we have money gamblers and gold gamblers enough in this country to take out of your Treasury every dollar in gold inside of ten days after you shall have resumed specie payments, though you may have $300,000,000 of gold in your vaults. The more coin you may have in your vaults the greater the rush will be to get it out.

These theorists say that when the people find that they can get gold for their notes or bonds they will not want it. Sir, that is an error; they will want it, and I will give you my reason for it, a reason which to my mind is potential. The men who hold the legal-tender notes or any other obligations of the Government which would be payable in coin upon the resumption of specie payments well know that you could not maintain a specie basis. If you open your vaults to the creditors of the Government they will take your gold, knowing that in thirty days Congress would be compelled to legalize a suspension of specie payments. And then what would follow? Another premium on gold of twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty per cent. according to the necessities of the Government and the demands of the Shylocks. And then these creditors will not only have realized upon the bonds which they bought at about fifty cents on the dollar a magnificent fortune, but they will then be ready to sell you coin again at a premium of fifty or one hundred per cent. with which to pay the gold interest on the outstanding bonds of the Government. They will take every possible advantage of your necessities, for they would be absolute masters of the situation under the second suspension of specie payments which would follow, and then with our Treasury exhausted we would be at the mercy of the gold gamblers. May heaven protect us from such a fate!

And, Mr. Speaker, we are not without instruction to be gathered from the history of other nations in conditions similar to our own. The history of Great Britain, commencing with the year 1797, furnishes us an impressive lesson from which we ought to gather that wisdom which will enable us to avoid the disasters consequent upon the fatal policy which was adopted and pursued in England, such as the resumption theorists of our day desire to see adopted and pursued in this country. The continental wars of Europe which followed the French revolution, which commenced in 1789, and in which Great Britain was involved for twenty years, and which only terminated with the overthrow of Napoleon at the battle of Waterloo in 1815, left England with a debt of £848,000,000, which is equivalent to about forty-two hundred and fifty million dollars in our money. The British debt at this time is about eight hundred million pounds, showing a reduction of only £48,000,000 in the past fifty years. It will be seen that the British debt is almost double our own debt, but it is no greater burden upon the English people than our debt is upon us, for the reason that most of the English debt is at three per cent. interest, while the most of our debt is at six per cent. interest. In both cases it was the prosecution of great wars that created the debt.

In 1797 the British Government found its treasury exhausted of gold, and by the law of necessity it was compelled to issue paper money, a suspension of specie payments was authorized, and specie payments were suspended, and the paper currency passed current as money in the realm. This was the British legal tender, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, and by means of which the British Government was enabled to prosecute the war against Napoleon, and by means of which the British people were enabled not only to maintain but to advance the national wealth and prosperity during that twenty years' conflict.

In 1815 peace was declared; and in 1816 the British bondholders, the wealthy classes, and the great capitalists of the English people clamored for a resumption of specie payments

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

Finance—Mr. Ingersoll.

HO. OF REPS.

just as our bondholders and wealthy classes are clamoring for the resumption of specie payments at this time. They insisted that specie payments could be resumed within six months after the termination of the war; and so great was this pressure that the Government yielded, and fixed the month of July, 1816, as the time when specie payments should be resumed. The premium on gold very soon rose to forty per cent., and it became apparent that specie resumption could not take place at the time named. At the same time the Bank of England began to contract its circulation.

As to what was the effect upon the English people and English industry let the eminent historian Alison answer. I read from his history of Europe:

"These evils arose from the confirmed ascendency in the Parliament of a class which had gained and was gaining immensely by the general suffering with which it was surrounded. It was hard to say whether the manufacturing aristocracy engaged in the export trade gained most by the general reduction in the price of commodities, and, as a necessary consequence, in the wages of labor, or the moneyed from the commercial catastrophes which brought interest up to an usurious rate and enabled them to accumulate colossal fortunes in a few years. Everything turned to the profit of capital and the depression of industry; and so strongly were the interests magnified by these changes intrenched in the Legislature that the cause of humanity seemed hopeless. Every effort of industry, every triumph of art, every increase of population tended only to augment the general distress, because it enhanced the disproportion between the decreasing circulation and increasing numbers and transactions of mankind; and prophetic wisdom, resting on the past and musing on the future, could anticipate nothing but a decline and fall precisely similar to that of ancient Rome for modern Europe."

Let the people of the United States remember this and see to it when the next election shall come that they do not send to the Congress of the United States, as the British people did to their Parliament, a class of men who are interested in the maintenance of monopolies or in the resumption of specie payments, for if they do they may expect the same disasters as a consequence resulting from the legislation of such men as followed from the legislation of the same class who were in the British Parliament in 1816.

In 1805 wheat in the British markets was eighty-five shillings sterling per quarter. In 1820, in consequence of the fatal endeavor to restore specie payments, it fell to fifty-five shillings sterling per quarter.

Such was the universal distress in England resulting from a contraction of the currency and the effort to resume specie payments. Petitions were sent to Parliament, setting forth these distresses, from all parts of the realm, but they were simply referred to committees, and were followed by no alleviating measures. What else could the people of England have expected while the aristocratic bullionists and bondholders were their legislators? At last, however, the Government brought in a bill to postpone the resumption of specie payment for two years, until July, 1818. This was to some extent a relief. The consequence was that industry revived, and the people felt that their burdens were becoming lighter. The bankruptcies in 1816 were more than two thousand. In 1817 trade and commerce, feeling the beneficial influence of the postponement of specie payments, quickened, and the bankruptcies fell off fifty per cent. This was because contraction had ceased and specie payments had been postponed. It again became apparent that specie payment could not be resumed in 1818, and a bill subsequently passed Parliament extending the time to July, 1819. There was, however, a constant struggle going forward between capital on the one hand and labor on the other; capital for resumption of specie payment, and labor against it. Capital at last triumphed, and in 1819 Mr. Peel brought forward a bill providing for a partial resumption in 1820 and for a total resumption in 1821. I will now let Mr. Alison state what the effect of such legislation was. He says:

"The industry of the nation was speedily consoled, as a flowing stream is by the severity of an Arctic winter. But notwithstanding the law for the complete resumption of specie payment in 1821, specie payments were not fully resumed until 1824."

Did prosperous times follow resumption of specie payment in England? No, sir; universal distress followed; the industrial energies of the people were struck as with paralysis, and there followed a reduction in the price of every kind of produce, whether of agriculture or manufactures.

Such, sir, is but a faint picture of the distresses and sufferings imposed upon the British people in consequence of a forced resumption of specie payments, and in my judgment a like result would follow in this country from similar legislation. It is said that "like causes produce like effects." Then, how can it be reasonable to expect that the policy and legislation adopted and pursued in Great Britain, which resulted in such universal distress, could prove otherwise than disastrous in our own country? We can be no more exempt than other people from the evil effects of unwise legislation.

Now, sir, if the Representatives in Congress are willing to study and promote the interests of the people they will vote down any attempt to force specie payments in this country at the present time and in the present condition of affairs. We have prospered, individually and collectively, during the past five years, and we have made more progress and greater development than in any preceding ten years. Some say that the war has produced this prosperity, this wonderful activity in every branch of trade. Sir, I deny that the war was the cause of that prosperity. War is a devastator, a destroyer, a spoiler. The war took from the industrial pursuits a million of men who would have been producers instead of consumers and destroyers of wealth.

What did give us this universal prosperity, which I acknowledge and maintain has been the condition of the people for the last five years? Not so great for the last two years as it was from 1863 to 1867, I admit. This prosperity was in spite of the war, notwithstanding the war. It was because Congress was compelled to authorize the issue altogether of $450,000,000 of legal-tender notes, which were put into circulation and which infused new life into all the industrial powers of this country such as it never before felt. The $450,000,000 of legal-tender notes gave us plenty of money; hence our great prosperity and our wonderful progress. Money is power; money is the most potential instrument for the creation of wealth ever invented by the genius of man. That greatest of American philosophers, Benjamin Franklin, not only well understood the uses of money, but its power in the production of wealth and in its efficiency in the promotion of the prosperity and happiness of the people. In 1729 he issued a pamphlet on the nature and necessity of a paper currency. It was intended to induce the Legislature of the colony of Pennsylvania to authorize the issuing of paper currency for the relief of the people of that colony. His plan was opposed by those who had money to loan because they did not want the rate of money interest to be cheapened. I never knew a money lender who thought or would acknowledge that the rate of interest on money was too high. The pamphlet had the desired effect; for soon after its publication the Legislature of that colony authorized the issuing upon the credit of the colony of $400,000 in paper money, which was to be loaned to the people of that colony on real estate security for a term of sixteen years, and the amount to be loaned to any one person was limited to $500. The $400,000 authorized to be issued was issued and loaned to the poor and new settlers of that colony, which enabled them to carry on their settlements, to improve their farms, and to enhance the production of their lands. This measure resulted in stimulating the energies of the people, and laid the foundation of the present prosperity of that great and growing State.

And, sir, our condition would have been much better to-day if we had had during the last two years the same abundance of money that we had from 1863 to 1866. During the period of the war, while a million of our men were in the Army, those at home, stimulated by the abundance of money, built railroads, extended commerce, opened trade between our country and Japan and China. Congress also subsidized a line of mail steamers to stimulate trade and commerce with the oriental world. We surveyed and commenced the construction of the Pacific railroads, which within the course of the next eight months will be completed—an incontestable evidence of what genius, energy, and plenty of money can accomplish; truly, a wonderful triumph of a sound paper currency. But this is not all. Since the commencement of the war we have built eight thousand miles of railroad, costing the enormous sum of $250,000,000. But if the country had been on a specie basis do you suppose we should have the Pacific railroad to-day almost completed? Should we have built this eight thousand miles of railroad? Should we have subsidized this line of steamers that now plies between San Francisco, Shanghai, and Yokohama? No, sir; we should have been traveling the narrow and hard-pan road of specie payments, doing business with a gimlet instead of an auger, and with constant danger of panic, financial ruin, and general distress, as was the case in the earlier days of the Republic.

My colleagues whom I see here remember well the trials that we have gone through on the specie basis in Illinois. They remember how we have suffered from low prices, which always go hand in hand with a scarcity of money and when money is at a high rate of interest. Why, sir, before the war, in the year 1857, when we had the State free-banking system, as it was called, based upon a deposit of State bonds, the notes of those banks passed current among us because we had nothing better; but when we traveled east of the Alleghany mountains we could not pass those notes at all except in a shaving broker's shop at fifty, sixty, or seventy cents on the dollar. In 1857-58 if you went into a bank in the city of Peoria for the purpose of buying a bill of exchange with which to settle an account in New York, you were obliged to pay about ten per cent. premium for the draft.

Those were specie-paying times, as they were called, and that continued till those State banks, following the suspension of the Ohio Trust Company, closed their doors, inflicting a loss of $6,000,000 upon the people of our State alone. Those were the specie-paying times to which certain gentlemen would again invite us. I am not going with them. The people will not go with them. "A burnt child dreads the fire." Give us the legal-tender notes bearing the impress of the Government of the United States and which are indorsed by the whole people of the whole country. They are the best money we have ever had, and they pass current in all parts of the entire country.

I repeat, sir, that notwithstanding the immense drain of the war, we did, during that period, make material progress, such as never was witnessed before. Labor during that period was well remunerated. I insist that the contraction policy inaugurated by the Secretary of the Treasury has had a damaging effect upon the prosperity and business interests of the country; and had it been pursued till this hour I doubt not but that general distrust and universal bankruptcy would have been the consequences. But Congress wisely put a stop to that policy. On the first day of the first session, after that policy had been inaugurated, I had the honor to introduce in this House a bill to repeal that provision of law which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to contract the currency which he was burning at the rate of $4,000,000 a month. Is there here any gentleman who regrets the action taken by Congress at that time? We put a stop to the contraction of the currency. In other words, we said, "Dr. Sangrado, you have bled us enough, and too much, already. Put up your lancet. We need to have the warm blood coursing through our veins, energizing all our powers." We said "Let the greenbacks and the national bank currency circulate throughout the country, so that the people may not be compelled to pay ten, fifteen, or twenty per cent. interest per annum for the use of money to carry on legitimate business."

What we need is an abundance of currency well secured. There is no parallel, Mr. Speaker, between the money of the present day and the money of the past. Gentlemen talk about "redundant currency." It is redundant nonsense to talk about a redundancy of the currency when interest for the use of money is from ten to twenty per cent. per annum anywhere outside of New York city. I admit that it is possible to have a redundancy of such currency as we used to have in the days of the old banking system, a currency based upon individual capital, individual or corporate good faith, a currency only theoretically secured to the extent of thirty-three cents on the dollar by coin, said to be in the vaults of the banks. Such a currency was always redundant, because it was not based on any reliable security. How many of the old banks were ever in condition to pay even thirty-three cents in coin on the whole of their circulation? But few. I do not believe one bank in ten in the olden time, under the specie-paying régime, had thirty-three cents in actual gold and silver coin in its vaults for the paper that it had issued.

Mr. Speaker, the money we had in former times was a paper currency, as I have already said, issued upon individual credit, individual faith, and corporate securities. It was not a good currency, and a very slight panic would so disturb public confidence in regard to the whole system that a universal panic was the usual result, followed by an immediate suspension of specie payments and a whole train of deplorable evils as the consequence. We have no such currency now. We have legal-tender notes, as I have said, indorsed by all the people of the country, and for the ultimate payment of which all the wealth and all the resources of the country and of the people are pledged. The other currency is known as a national bank currency, and is as well secured to the bill-holders as the legal-tender notes themselves. In the olden time when a bank broke the holders of its bills generally considered them worthless. If the bills were not entirely worthless those interested as owners in the bank suspending payment would buy up its bills through a secret agent at five, ten, or twenty cents on the dollar, and thereby fleece the people in accordance with the original design. But how is it now? Let a national bank go into liquidation and the notes of that bank will command a premium, and the holders of its notes can get five per cent. premium for them. That is a good kind of currency. Let the bank break by speculation, let its stockholders become bankrupt, if you please, yet the bill holder is in no danger of loss, for the bill is secured by a pledge of the bonds of the United States. The notes of a national bank are really better money after it has broken than before. For before a bank breaks its notes are at par, but after it breaks its notes command a premium. How is this? It is because more circulation is needed. You can get authority from the Comptroller of the Currency to organize a bank, but you cannot get him to give you any circulation for it, because of the unwise legislation prohibiting circulation to be issued in excess of $300,000,000. Those who wish to organize a national bank can, however, buy up the notes of a bank which is in liquidation, but in order to do that they have to pay a premium on them of, I believe, about five per cent., and sometimes more. Whoever bids the most for the circulation of that bank will get it, and then the Comptroller of the Currency will transfer its circulation to the new organization. But in all this the bill-holders are secure. When we have a national bank note we do not stop to inquire whether the bank is still in existence or not; it does not matter. In the olden times every man who handled ten dollars a day of the old bank money had to carry a detector in his pocket in order to ascertain at what rate of discount the money went in New York or anywhere else outside of the immediate locality of the bank. These were good times for the detector publishers, but hard times for the people.

The gentleman from Maine undertook to draw a parallel between the monetary system of the country to-day and ten years ago, when no sort of parallel can be established. The two systems antagonize each other, as I shall show. Suppose the "Swampoodle Mutual Aid Society" should issue paper promises to pay to the amount of $1,000,000, they would not be worth par and would not pass current as money. They would not probably pass as money for five cents on the dollar, and then your specie-paying theorists and modern alchemists would say "there is a redundancy of currency." I admit there might be a redundancy of such currency, not, however, because there would be too much of it, but because it was not issued on any good security. But that would be no fact or argument tending to prove that there was a redundancy of well-secured currency. It would only establish the fact that there was too much of that kind. We have seen no redundancy of the currency in the last few years. We have seen at no time in the past six years when money was a drug in the market outside of the single city of New York. In the grain producing States of the West it has commanded a high rate of interest during all that period.

Mr. BOYDEN. Thirty per cent. in North Carolina.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Thirty per cent. in North Carolina! What a protest against forcing specie payments! A State which has almost infinite resources, and if money could be borrowed there at six per cent. it would be developed and placed alongside of the great States of the Union—

Mr. BOYDEN. The regular rate of interest is from fifteen to thirty per cent.

Mr. COBURN. In Boston in the past year $16,000,000 have been spent in erecting buildings.

Mr. INGERSOLL. And as an evidence of the wonderful stimulus that money gives to production, in the city of Boston, where money is plenty and cheap, $16,000,000, as my friend says, have been spent in erecting buildings in the last year. There is evidence of prosperity for you; while in North Carolina, where money is scarce and dear, all the energies of the people are paralyzed. But what would be the condition of things if you were to put the country on a specie basis? Why, sir, a paralytic shock would be felt extending from one end of it to the other. But its severest effect would be in the West. And why? Because you in the East by the accumulation of money and wealth for two centuries have monopolized the money of the country. You have ten dollars where the West has one. You are our creditors; the West is your debtor. According to the best calculations the debtor class are to the creditor class as nine to one, and for the sake of restoring a specie basis you would oppress the nine to enrich the one, who is already rich, acting upon the old principle of making the rich richer and the poor poorer. Legislation ought to oppose that tendency, because wealth unrestrained produces that result.

Mr. Speaker, I will ask the indulgence of the House at this point to read another quotation from Alison. He says:

"Whoever has studied with attention the structure or tendencies of society, either as they are portrayed in the annals of ancient story or exist in the complicated relations of men around us, must have become aware that the greatest evils which in the later stages of national progress come to afflict mankind arose from the undue influence and paramount importance of realized riches. That the rich in the later stages of national progress are constantly getting richer, and the poor poorer, is a common observation, which has been repeated in every age."

"and many of the greatest changes which have occurred in the world—in particular the fall of the Roman empire—may be distinctly traced to the long-continued operation of this pernicious tendency. The greatest benefactors of their species have always been regarded as those who devised and carried into execution some remedy for this great and growing evil; but none of them have proved lasting in their operation, and the frequent renewal of fresh enactments sufficiently proves that those which had preceded them had proved nugatory. It is no wonder that it was so, for the evils complained of arose from the unavoidable result of a stationary currency, coexisting with a rapid increase in the numbers and transitions of mankind; and these were only aggravated by every addition made to the energies and productive powers of society."

Such, I fear, is the deplorable tendency in this country at this time. The evils so vividly portrayed by this great author are, I fear, becoming apparent in our own country; the rich are growing richer and the poor poorer. We have now a stationary currency, while our population and the powers of production are constantly expanding. We should have a flexible currency that can expand in the same ratio as our population, and as our powers of production expand.

Go with me, Mr. Speaker, into the great city of New York; let us place ourselves at the upper end of Fifth Avenue, at the point where it enters into Central Park, on some beautiful afternoon of Wednesday, and we will observe the magnificent equipages of the rich pass into the park. How they dazzle and glitter! Notice the harnesses covered with gold; notice the liveried lackeys before and behind, with footman and out-riders; we count them by hundreds and by thousands. Hour after hour these ostentatious pageants of wealth and gorgeous display will pass us; then you will agree with me that the rich are growing richer. Then go with me into another quarter of the city where the uncared-for poor stay, and wear out their wretched lives without ambition and without hope, and you will agree with me again that the poor are getting poorer. It should be our first duty and our highest pleasure to so legislate that the condition of the poor will be improved. We need not legislate for the rich; the rich are able to take good care of themselves, legislate as we may.

As a people we are in a passably good condition now, but not so good that it cannot be improved; and if the alchemists of modern times with their wild and impracticable theories can be kept in the background we shall continue to make progress. Let us have no more contraction, no attempts at resumption of specie payments. Let us rather have more money, and we shall go forward in that career of prosperity which has marked our course in the past few years.

Gentlemen insist upon holding up the "scarecrow" of a redundant currency, and these gentlemen appear to me to be ignorant of the facts in our own financial history. Let us see what the facts are.

During the late war, in the years 1863–64 and a portion of the year 1865, while eleven of the States, containing at least ten millions of population, were in rebellion, our currency in circulation reached the enormous sum of at least one thousand million dollars, and some place it as high as $1,200,000,000; and but a very trifling amount of this currency found its way into the confederacy; nearly every dollar of it was in circulation in the northern States, which contained a population probably not exceeding twenty-five millions. Yet this twenty-five million people during that period actively and profitably employed this vast sum of currency, and were not only able to carry the Government through the great conflict, but were able, in addition to that, to make the most wonderful and unexampled progress in material and physical prosperity that the country ever witnessed.

Gentlemen will look in vain for any evidence of a redundant currency during those years. The rise or decline of the premium on gold was not a correct indication of the monetary condition of the country. Before contraction was inaugurated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and after the close of the war, gold suddenly fell from 185 to 125. The Secretary of the Treasury thought the time had now come for a speedy resumption of specie payments, so he commenced to rapidly contract the currency, and immediately the premium on gold went up, and continued to advance until Congress put a stop to further contraction. If there was no redundancy during the war there is certainly an insufficient supply at the present time. We have at this time probably not exceeding $500,000,000 in circulation; hence the universal stringency and the high rate of interest on money outside the city of New York. At this time we have probably thirty-nine millions of population in the United States, and several hundred million dollars less in currency than we had when there were but twenty-five millions of people to employ it. The ten millions of people in the late rebel States have got to be supplied with currency; they have no currency except the legal-tender notes of the United States and the currency of the few national banks which they have organized since the war, and we have got to share our own insufficient supply with them. And notwithstanding all these facts gentlemen still persist in talking about a redundancy of currency. I challenge them to show at what time there has been a redundancy of currency in the country since 1861.

Who are the men that assert that there is a redundancy of currency? They are the Shylocks, the money-loaners, whose interest it is to make the supply of money scarce so that their rate of interest may be high. They are the holders of our gold interest-bearing bonds; it is to their interest to reduce the volume of currency and inaugurate hard times, so that the purchasing power of their gold may be augmented; so that they can buy two barrels of flour with the money which they now pay for one; so that they shall be enabled to pay two laborers for a day's work where they now can employ but one. All the advantages of a stringent money market are on their side, and all the disadvantages on the side of the laboring and producing masses of the people. The men who prate about the redundancy of the currency are not the friends of the laboring people; they are really advocating their own interests under the pretense of a desire to advance the public welfare. But let it never be forgotten by the people that a scarcity of money depresses trade and commerce, and in fact every industry of the nation. It makes men idle and dishonest and makes us as a people more dependent on foreign nations.

Mr. Speaker, I remember when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] made his speech in support of a measure for the resumption of specie payments he attempted to draw a parallel between this country as we behold it to-day and as it was in the days of the Revolution, with the view of showing that we have an irredeemable and inconvertible paper currency which we ought speedily to get rid of. Now, let me inquire if any fair-minded man with a clear head can draw any correct parallel or inference from the credit of the United States as it was in 1789 and in 1869? It is well known that after the revolutionary struggle we were without resources. We exported no cotton; we exported no wheat or corn; we had no commerce worthy of the name; we had opened no mines of gold or of silver, and but few of coal or iron. The resources of this Government were unknown, and the experiment of free government or the establishment of a republic here was regarded as an untried problem. Is it, then, to be wondered at that continental money under the then existing circumstances became worthless? But what is the condition of our country to-day? The gentleman should have drawn a contrast, not a parallel.

We have now a population of thirty-nine millions, we had then less than three millions; now we have thirty-seven States, then we had but thirteen. Our gold mines have yielded about twelve hundred million dollars in treasure; then they were unknown. We now have forty thousand miles of railroad in operation; then we had none. Now we have an external commerce employing over sixteen thousand sailing vessels and nearly two thousand steam vessels, and amounting in the aggregate to nearly three million tons capacity; then it was next to nothing. Now we have an internal commerce employing about two thousand sailing vessels and eighteen hundred steam vessels, and amounting in the aggregate to nearly two million tons capacity; then it was so trifling as to be unworthy of mention. Now the aggregate wealth of the nation probably amounts to thirty thousand million dollars; then it did not probably amount to one thirtieth of that sum. Now we may calculate with certainty on the durability and stability of our Government and its continued growth and increase of wealth and power; then scarcely any calculation could be made concerning the future, whatever, as there was no data to base a calculation upon. It may be safely estimated that in the beginning of the next century the population of the United States will be one hundred millions, and the aggregate wealth of the nation not less than $80,000,000,000; and it is estimated that at this time the gross earnings of our people amount to $7,500,000,000 annually.

But we are not so strong that we can sustain the paralytic shock which would be the result of a forced resumption of specie payments without suffering the most appalling disasters. I do not object to gold and silver entering into the circulation of the country. I should be glad if it would; but I do not want it to become the only lawful tender in payment of debts. Let legal-tender notes remain in circulation, too, and then gold cannot become our master. I am inclined to agree with the man in Maine who said, "I want no gold; a gold dollar does not measure the value of what I have to sell; it is the greenback dollar; the gold dollar is rising and falling in the market every day, and nobody can keep track of it, while the greenback dollar is a dollar all the time."

And so it is a dollar all the time. So far as concerns the interchange of commodities and as a medium to facilitate exchanges between ourselves it is a dollar all the time. And we measure values by it. Nobody sells a bushel of corn or wheat, or works by the day or month, except on the standard of the greenback dollar and not on the gold dollar. The only standard of value which gold has is its own value, put upon it by speculators in gold in Wall street. Had we no speculators or operators in gold the premium upon it would be but trifling.

Sir, I warn gentlemen not to rush this country back to specie payments. Wait until our great national debt has been paid. And I admonish the people of this country not to allow this debt to remain unpaid and make no effort to pay it off, and after awhile permit it to assume the form of the English consols, which probably never will be paid. If you do, you may expect a lordly aristocracy to govern you. I have already said that in 1815, at the close of the great European war, England found herself in debt to the amount of £848,000,000 sterling, or $4,240,000,000. Since that time more than fifty years have elapsed, and England has paid off but $240,000,000 of her debt. She is still in debt to the extent of $4,000,000,000. And notwithstanding her debt bears a low rate of interest, three per cent., it is sufficient to maintain an aristocracy which is inimical to the interests of the laboring masses of that country. And so it will be in this country unless we go to work and apply our surplus revenue to the payment of our debt. All the slaves in the country before the war were not valued above $2,000,000,000, yet that amount of capital in the hands of a favored class created a powerful aristocracy which the war fortunately destroyed. Let us then pay off our Government debt as rapidly as we well can, so that the rich who hold it may not become a powerful aristocracy. In order to be able to pay our debt we must keep money plentiful, so that the entire energies of the people may be kept in full play for the development of our resources and the production of wealth, and thus we will be enabled to raise a surplus amount of revenue each year, with which we should pay off our debt. Our people do not object to paying taxes provided that you will keep them profitably employed, so that they may be able to make money with which to pay taxes. But if you withdraw the legal-tender money and put the people in the power of the skinflints they will not have any surplus with which to pay their taxes or any portion of the national debt. Then will come hard times, discontent, mutterings, and complaints, which will grow and gather force until they become a storm which will shake this Government to its foundations. And you, as Representatives of the people, have it in your power to maintain a condition of peaceful prosperity or raise that storm.

I now desire to call the attention of members to two bills which I introduced at the opening of the present session, and which have for their object the improvement of the national banking system and the appreciation of the purchasing power of the greenback currency.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine states that in this country we have but about thirteen dollars of circulation per capita, while in France the circulation is between eighteen and nineteen dollars per capita, and in England it is between fifteen and sixteen dollars per capita. In my judgment, according to the best data which I have been able to collect, the gentleman is below the mark in his estimate of the amount of circulation per capita in either of those countries. I believe that France has a circulating medium of thirty dollars per capita, while Great Britain has twenty-five dollars per capita. And I insist that if twenty-five dollars per capita can be profitably employed in France and England at least twenty-five dollars per capita can be profitably employed in this country. Those countries are old; all their resources have been developed, while this is still a new country, with our resources yet undeveloped to a great extent. We need money to open and improve farms, to build towns and cities, to improve our inland navigable waters, to open and work mines, to settle new territories, and to build railroads. In my judgment we need in this country more money per capita than either France or England does, and we can actually and profitably employ more than they.

Now, Mr. Speaker, without further digression I desire to call the attention of the House to one of the bills before mentioned. I will first take up the bill entitled "A bill to prohibit the sale of coin on behalf of the United States, and to provide for the redemption of the United States legal-tender notes in coin at par." The object of this bill is not the resumption of specie payments or to withdraw the legal-tender currency of the country from circulation. Its purpose is to appreciate the purchasing power of the greenback currency to a par with gold. The first step, as I conceive, to be taken in order to accomplish this result is to prohibit the sale of any more gold or silver coin on behalf of the United States. The first section of the bill prohibits the selling of any gold or silver coin. The next step to be taken, in my judgment, is the redemption at par of the legal-tender notes in coin with the surplus gold in the Treasury which is not needed to pay the interest on the public debt. I believe that the Secretary of the Treasury would be able thus to redeem $10,000,000 every sixty days. The effect of selling gold by the United States is to depreciate its own paper; and the effect of the redemption of its own paper at par in coin would be to appreciate the value of its own paper. Gold is now at a premium of about thirty-five cents on the dollar; and I predict that, if the policy of this bill can be adopted and carried into effect, upon the first redemption of $10,000,000 of legal-tender notes in coin at par by the Secretary of the Treasury gold will not be worth more than twenty-five cents premium on the dollar. If such should be the result the purchasing power of the $356,000,000 of greenback currency now outstanding would be appreciated to the extent of about thirty-five million dollars. In my judgment, after a few successive redemptions of this character gold would not command a premium of ten cents on the dollar, and thus the purchasing power of the greenback currency of the people would be increased to an extent equal to about eighty million dollars. And I cannot see why under this process our legal-tender money cannot be brought to a par with gold. I propose by this bill, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue $356,021,073 of new legal-tender notes, to be substituted for the legal-tender notes now outstanding, the new notes provided by this bill to be issued in series, commencing with number one and progressing to number thirty-six, containing in each series $10,000,000, with the exception of the last, which shall contain but $6,021,073; so that by this bill I neither contract nor expand the currency, but simply substitute the new issue for the old. And this is made necessary in order that it may be issued in such series that it can be redeemed in gold at par without favor to any particular class of our citizens. The bill further provides for the reissue of all the notes so redeemed, thus preventing any contraction of the currency. The rest of the bill cannot be better explained than by reading sections five, six, and seven. They are as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the legal-tender notes hereby authorized to be issued in series, commencing with series No. 1 and ending with series No. 36. Each of the first thirty-five series shall contain $10,000,000, and the thirty-sixth shall contain $6,021,073; and each of said series shall be numbered consecutively, commencing with No. 1 and ending with No. 36, and upon the face of each note shall appear in plain characters the number of the series to which it belongs.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That whenever there shall have accumulated in the Treasury of the United States a sum in coin exceeding by $10,000,000 the amount which will be required for the payment of the interest on the public debt for the next ensuing six months, it shall be the duty of the Secretary, and he is hereby directed, to redeem at par in coin at the Treasury of the United States or any sub-treasury thereof as may be designated by the said Secretary, the whole of any one of said series; and the said Secretary shall cause each note so redeemed to be stamped with the word "redeemed," and shall add thereto the day of the month and year of such redemption; and the said Secretary shall reissue such redeemed notes in such manner as he is now authorized by law to reissue legal-tender notes now outstanding: Provided, That every note reissued shall have stamped upon its face the word "reissued," and in addition shall show the day of the month and year of its reissue.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall give at least ten days' notice by publication in one or more of the newspapers in each of the cities wherein a sub-treasury of the United States is or may be established, which notice shall state the series which it is the intention of the Secretary to redeem, and at what time and place the redemption shall take place.

Thus it will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that I have provided against the hoarding of any particular series; for no one will know what series is to be redeemed, as they are not to be redeemed seriatim, commencing with No. 1 and going on through the series; but the Secretary may call for any series he sees proper, and if he is an honest Secretary there can be no special advantages bestowed upon any particular or favored class. This bill was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and I hope to be able to get the favorable action of the House upon it before the close of this session. But that will depend in a great measure upon the fact as to who has the most friends on that committee, the laboring masses of the people or the rich, non-producing class. For, as I understand it, the provisions of this bill are in the interests of labor.

I will now call the attention of the House to the other bill, which is entitled "A bill supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to provide a national currency secured by pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof,' approved June 8, 1864, and for other purposes." I referred this bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I have no right to expect a favorable report from that committee; for I fear that the members of that committee are too largely interested in banking to voluntarily report a bill which interferes with the banking system as it is now established. I intend, therefore, as soon as I can get the floor for that purpose, to refer a like bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with the hope that it may be reported to the House at an early day and that we may have action upon it.

Our national banking system is a close corporation. The $300,000,000 of circulation which was authorized to be issued has all been taken long since. How has that circulation been distributed? The table which I hold in my hand will best answer that question:

States.	Population.	Bank circulation.
Maine.....	628,279	$7,511,286
New Hampshire.....	326,073	4,214,155
Vermont.....	315,008	5,710,480
Massachusetts.....	1,231,066	55,961,665
Rhode Island.....	174,620	12,470,230
Connecticut.....	460,147	17,432,823
Total of New England.....	3,135,233	103,300,639
New York.....	3,850,735	69,209,277
New Jersey.....	672,035	9,131,965
Pennsylvania.....	2,906,216	38,339,030
Total of eastern States.....	10,593,268	$220,483,911
Ohio.....	2,339,511	$18,405,920
Indiana.....	1,350,428	11,015,040
Illinois.....	1,711,951	9,521,810
Michigan.....	749,115	3,822,425
Wisconsin.....	775,881	2,559,050
Iowa.....	674,915	3,230,090
Missouri.....	1,182,012	3,437,620
Kentucky.....	1,155,682	2,342,020
Tennessee.....	1,109,801	1,232,040
Total of western States.....	11,049,296	$54,566,015

Thus it will be seen that but $24,000,000 of circulation is awarded to all the other States not set out in the table, having in the aggregate a population of ten millions. The State of Massachusetts has fifty dollars per capita of this circulation, Rhode Island sixty dollars, while New York has but twenty-three dollars, and Pennsylvania nineteen dollars. Illinois has less than five dollars per capita. Massachusetts, with a population of less than one million three hundred thousand, has about fifty-six million-dollars of circulation, while Illinois, with a population exceeding two million five hundred thousand, has less than ten million dollars of this circulation. The inequities of this unjust distribution I propose to remedy by this bill, which repeals that clause of the old law which limits the circulation of the national banks to $300,000,000; thus making it free banking system, as it should have been from the beginning. The western States require more circulation than the eastern; for the eastern States are comparatively well developed, while the western States require development. We are opening and cultivating new farms, building factories, towns, cities, and railroads. We of the West demand that this outrageous inequality shall not be longer continued, and that the distribution of this circulation shall be equalized and that the West and the South shall have their proper proportions; and that if this national banking system is to be continued the distribution of this circulation shall be equalized.

Now, let us look at this matter a little further. Does it come with a good grace from gentlemen from Massachusetts to talk to the Representatives from the West about a "redundancy" of the currency, when their State has monopolized fifty dollars per head of the entire bank circulation, including every man, woman, and child in the State, while in the State of Illinois we have less than five dollars per head? I answer it does not. Why, Mr. Speaker, we may before long be called upon to inquire "whether Massachusetts has a republican form of government." Is it republican, I inquire, that one State of this Union with less than thirteen hundred thousand population shall monopolize one fifth of the entire bank circulation of the country? The Representatives from Massachusetts will do well to consider this matter.

How shall we remedy this? I answer by the adoption of this bill. This bill, as I have said, proposes to make the banking system a free one, whereby the West and the South will be enabled to secure such an amount of circulation as may be required for legitimate business purposes. And they will ask for nothing more, and I trust they will be satisfied with nothing less.

How further would I reform this national banking system? I am not making war upon it, but I propose to improve it; and if those gentlemen who are interested in this banking system wish to continue it they had better accept this bill, or they may perhaps wake up some morning to find that their national banking system is numbered with the things that were. The national banking system is now based upon the Government bonds drawing five and six per cent. interest, much the larger portion of these bonds bearing six per cent. interest payable in coin. The banks receive in circulating notes in amount equal to ninety per cent. of the bonds they deposit. This circulation these banks loan out at a high rate of interest, and now that any further issue of circulation to the national banks is prohibited under the present law they, in their supposed security, oppress the people and enrich themselves at the expense of the masses and to the injury of the great industrial interests of the country.

Let me call the attention of the House to some figures bearing upon this branch of the subject. Do gentlemen of this House know that none of these national banks make a return of their profits to the Comptroller of the Currency? You cannot find in the report of any national bank any statement as to the profit which the bank realizes on the amount of its capital invested. But I have taken such data as I have been able to obtain, and have made some calculations upon them which I think are reliable. I will refer to these calculations, and after gentlemen have heard them let us see whether they will tell me that there is a "redundancy of the currency," and that the present banking system is all right.

The amount of the paid in capital of these banks is $426,000,000 in currency. The amount of the bonds on deposit for the security of their circulation is $342,000,000. The amount of bonds deposited as security for Government deposits is between thirty and forty million dollars more—making altogether a deposit of bonds to the amount of $380,000,000. The number of these banks is sixteen hundred and forty-two, and their circulation about three hundred million dollars. Now, let us see whether their capital was actively employed. The aggregate amount of their loans and discounts for the year 1867 was $3,351,000,000 upon a paid in capital of but $426,000,000! and the average time of each loan and discount was seventy-one days. Now calculate the interest at six per cent. on $3,351,000,000 for seventy-one days. I will make the calculation in round figures. The interest on that sum at six per cent. for one year amounts to over two hundred and one million dollars; for seventy-one days it amounts to over forty million dollars; put this $40,000,000 down as one item of the earnings of these national banks for one year; then add to that the gold interest on their Government bonds: it amounts to $22,000,000 in gold, which reduced to currency amounts to about thirty million dollars; add this $30,000,000 to the $40,000,000 realized on loans and discounts, and you have $70,000,000. And this is not all; there is still another immense sum to be added. The last report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows that the national banks had on hand of "undivided profits," in the month of October last, the enormous sum of $36,000,000. These $36,000,000 of undivided profits have accumulated within the past five years, making an average accumulation of over seven million dollars per annum; add then the $7,000,000 to the $70,000,000, and you have for the gross earning of the banks from these three sources alone $77,000,000 for the year 1867. From this sum you may deduct $18,000,000 amount paid in taxes to the United States and State governments during the same year. This leaves as the profits of the banks for that year the sum of $59,000,000, a sum equal to about twenty per cent. on the amount of their circulation.

Is it any wonder, then, Mr. Speaker, that we find such strong opposition against any movement which proposes to destroy this monopoly? I expect to be assailed for the position which I have taken, but I shall not be deterred in consequence of it from the discharge of my duty in this regard. I further propose by this bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue new bonds to the amount of $600,000,000, drawing interest at the rate of four per cent. per annum; but I am now disposed to believe that the interest on the new bonds proposed by this bill should not exceed three per cent. And when the House takes action on the bill, I propose to move an amendment reducing the interest from four to three per cent. The bill proposes further that the national banks shall substitute the bonds authorized by this act for the bonds now on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States as security for their banking circulation and as security for the Government deposits. And if the banks now organized do not see proper to organize anew under this bill, with the new three or four per cent. bonds, then it provides that they shall be wound up by the Comptroller of the Currency. But few of them, in my judgment, would choose to go into liquidation if this bill shall become a law; and if any of them should, I guarantee that there are plenty of men who stand ready to organize new banks on a three or four per cent. bond.

If this bill, Mr. Speaker, shall become a law we shall have, first a free banking system based upon the credit of the United States, thus making it easy to increase or diminish the circulation of the currency in accordance with the requirements of the business of the country; for at any time a bank may go into voluntary liquidation. Further, it will save by the substitution of the new bonds for the old to the tax-payers of the country between seven and eight million dollars per annum. This bill further provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall, with the legal-tender notes received in exchange for the bonds authorized to be issued under this act, buy at the lowest market price the United States gold interest-bearing bonds now outstanding and destroy them, thus lightening the burden of the public debt, lessening public taxes, and affording increased facilities to the industrial pursuits of the country.

Mr. Speaker, if the provisions of these two bills, which I have in a summary manner discussed, shall become the law of the land, then, sir, I have confidence in the future of the Republic. Then we shall be enabled, in my judgment, to pay off the public debt at an early day without overburdening the people with taxation. We must, moreover, reduce the expenses to the lowest possible point and apply the surplus revenue to the payment of the debt. We have already reduced the Navy appropriation from about forty-seven millions to about seventeen million dollars, and the Army appropriation from $80,000,000 to $33,000,000, and the civil service in like proportion. Next year the Navy appropriations ought not to exceed $10,000,000, and the Army appropriations ought not to exceed $25,000,000. By pursuing this course we will maintain the honor and glory of the nation, render the people prosperous, contented, and happy. The future of this great Republic I shall not attempt to portray. The imagination itself hesitates before even venturing to contemplate its future greatness and grandeur.

SPEECH OF HON. G. F. MILLER, OF PENNSYLVANIA, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 28, 1869.

The House having under consideration House bill No. 1667, to secure equal privileges and immunities to citizens of the United States, and to enforce the provisions of article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution, and the resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment of the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. MILLER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The subject-matter now under consideration is of vast importance, and requires the serious consideration of Congress. I shall first speak in regard to House bill No. 1667, the first section of which reads thus:

That no State shall abridge or deny the right of any citizen of the United States to vote for electors of President and Vice President of the United States, or for Representatives in Congress, or for members of the Legislature of the State in which he may reside, by reason of race, color, or previous condition of slavery; and any provision in the laws or constitution of any State inconsistent with this section are hereby declared to be null and void.

The other four sections of the bill being intended to enforce compliance with the provisions of the first section, render it unnecessary for me to notice them in this discussion. I will, therefore, confine my remarks first to that section. The object of this bill is clear, and that is that Congress shall force upon the respective States negro suffrage, regardless of the existing constitutions and laws therein, and the question is, has Congress this power under the Constitution of the United States of 1787, which was adopted in 1789, section two of article one of which provides that—

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in such States shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

Thus it will be seen that the people of each State are to choose the Representatives; and does not this provision give them full power to determine who shall vote for such Representatives? That power has never been denied to the States by the General Government except as to the late rebel States, of which I will speak hereafter. This right of regulating suffrage no one will deny existed in the States at the formation of the Constitution; and did they, by the Confederation, surrender that right or any part of it? The preamble to that instrument reads thus:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

It shows that the object of the Union was in the main to provide for the common defense and secure the blessings of liberty, but not to take from the States the rights possessed by them in the regulation of suffrage. The States had certain rights which they did not surrender to the General Government, and among them was the right of determining who should exercise the elective franchise. It was determined, in the case of Mellvaine vs. Coxe, 4 Cranch, 209, that—

"The several States of the Union became entitled on the 4th of July, 1776, to all the rights and powers of sovereign States as respects their internal regulations."

I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to be understood as favoring State rights doctrine as advocated by those of the Calhoun school, for I hold that no State after the Confederation could secede or withdraw without the consent of the entire States; that the United States possess power to use all the force necessary to prevent such attempt. And this is the only legitimate construction that could be fairly placed upon that instrument. In 6 Wheaton, 414, Cohens vs. Virginia, (Marshall, Chief Justice,) it is laid down:

"The States are constituent parts of the United States; they are members of one great empire; for some purposes sovereign, for some purposes subordinate."

It is said by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] who has charge of this bill:

"If the doctrine of those who maintain that the whole question of suffrage is vested in the States be true, then the States may refuse to choose electors. They may refuse to send members to this House; they may refuse to choose Senators by their Legislatures; and thus the Government would come to an end."

I would ask the honorable gentleman, even if Congress had the power to regulate suffrage in the States, how would that remedy the difficulty he suggests? If the citizens of any State neglect electing Representatives to Congress, or if the Legislatures decline electing Senators or could not find any person willing to accept the position, could Congress or any other power compel electors to vote or accept the office of Senator or Representative in Congress? So that if the power of regulating the elective franchise was vested in the General Government it would not remedy the imaginary difficulty suggested by the gentleman. If the people refuse or neglect to take part in the Government organizations I know of no power to compel them; but it is hardly possible, Mr. Speaker, for such a contingency ever to arise, as persons can always be found willing to serve their country by accepting office. The fourth section of article one of the Constitution provides that—

"The time, place, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof, but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators."

This clause does not take from the States the power vested in them by the first part of the section. It is evident that all that was intended to be reserved to Congress was to regulate the time of election of members of Congress in case any State should neglect to do so, but not to withhold from the States the right to regulate suffrage. In article two, section one, of the Constitution it is provided that—

"Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress."

The right to regulate the elective franchise has been conceded to the States for eighty years under the Constitution framed by our illustrious ancestors, and now at this late day an attempt is made to take from the States by a mere act of Congress a right which they always exercised; and it is too late now, after such a long acquiescence, to overturn a settled construction. The gentleman, however, does not rely for his theory solely upon the Constitution of 1789, but calls to his aid the amendment to the Constitution known as article fourteen, and relies specially on the first section, which is in these words:

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

This section, it is true, makes all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof citizens, and prohibits any State from making or enforcing any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, &c.; and this is contended by the gentleman [Mr. BOUTWELL] to carry with it the undoubted right to exercise the elective franchise. In this the gentleman is mistaken; for the right of citizenship carries with it no such privilege, for if that construction was tenable then, it would confer the right not only upon all male citizens twenty-one years of age, but upon women and children who are also citizens; and as to the inhibition clause, it was intended to protect life, liberty, and property, and especially that class of colored people who had been in slavery; but when that amendment was proposed by Congress and ratified by three fourths of the States it was not contemplated to extend power now contended for, which is fully explained by the second section which reads thus:

"Representatives shall all be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or a member of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged except for participation in rebellion or other crimes, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State."

Now, I would ask if the States had no power to regulate as to who should exercise the elective franchise, what was the necessity of this section? For if the States could not deny the right of voting to any of its male citizens twenty-one years of age, except for participation in the rebellion or other crime, there would have been no occasion for this section. It was, however, understood at the adoption of this amendment that the several States had power to regulate that which this bill proposes to deprive them. Again, all the reconstruction bills we passed were so framed as to concede that right to the States.

The gentleman says we "cannot escape this issue as a Congress and as a party." As a Congress, I for one would say we do not desire to escape the issue if we had the power under the Constitution; but from a careful examination I cannot see that we have, and after an acquiescence for eighty years it will not do to abrogate the rule of "stare decisis," even if such a forced construction as contended for by those in favor of the bill could be made. I hold that neither by the Constitution of 1789 or the fourteenth amendment can the rights exercised by the States as regard suffrage be taken away and exercised by Congress. Then, as to the policy of such a procedure as a party. The Republicans having a large majority in both branches of Congress must, of course, take the responsibility of legislation, and as a party measure this bill if passed would, in my opinion, be disastrous to the Republican party, as we have always conceded to the loyal States the right of regulating the suffrage therein. At the great Republican convention held at Chicago in May, 1868, for the nomination of President and Vice President, a platform was laid down containing declaration of principles, the second paragraph of which is in these words:

"The guarantee by Congress of equal suffrage to all loyal men at the South was demanded by every consideration of public safety, of gratitude, and of justice, and must be maintained; while the question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of those States."

And on this platform General U. S. Grant was placed in nomination for President and SCHUYLER COLFAX for Vice President. The campaign opened, and we went before the people, telling them that as regards suffrage it was for the loyal States themselves to decide, and not for Congress. Under this platform the Republican party were successful in electing their candidates for President and Vice President; and I would say to the Republican members of this House, can we now afford to repudiate what we have said, and go back upon the people? If we do, though we are at present strong, it may be our downfall; and besides, it behooves us to act in good faith, and by so doing we must reject this bill. The gentleman says we must not be "timid." Sir, we are not "timid," but disposed to act in good faith and adhere to the settled principles of the Constitution. It may be said if the right to regulate suffrage belongs to the loyal State, why not extend it to those lately in rebellion? My answer is, Mr. Speaker, that by the rebellion they have overturned their State governments and failed to give proper protection to its citizens, and especially to those who remained loyal; and it will be seen under the fourth section of article four of the Constitution, that—

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

That can only be done by proper reconstruction of those States, and it was found that could be only accomplished by allowing negro suffrage in their organization on account of the disloyal element among the white population; and thus, Congress deemed it to be indispensable, before admitting these States to representation, that their constitutions and laws should be so changed so as to allow suffrage regardless of race or color or previous condition of slavery, the preservation of the Union demanded this course.

I cannot see, Mr. Speaker, any objection to negro suffrage, and would prefer it being allowed in all the States; but, under the present Constitution, that belongs to the people of the States, and they are to regulate it, and not Congress, unless, as I have already said, so far as relates to the reconstructed States.

Having, Mr. Speaker, said so much in regard to the power of Congress to legislate in relation to suffrage in loyal States, I will say a few words in regard to the proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States. The joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) reported from the Judiciary Committee by one of its members, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] is in words following:

SEC. 1. The right of any citizen of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of race, color, or previous condition of slavery of any citizen or class of citizens of the United States.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.

If this proposed amendment should pass each branch of Congress by a two-thirds vote, and then be ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the States of the Union, it will become a part of the Constitution of the United States and settle forever this vexed question of suffrage, for it is not likely that it would ever be changed. I would be glad if the several States would take this matter in hand and ratify an amendment which would place all the States on the same footing, so that it cannot be said by the southern States that greater restrictions were placed upon them than upon those of the North, East, and West. I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, if suffrage was extended to the colored men in all the States it would be found to work well, and the prejudice that now exists to such a measure in certain sections of our country would soon wear away, and all would join in aiding the elevation of that heretofore downtrodden race. But it is said that if the right of suffrage is extended to the colored man it would be one step toward mixing of races. This is a mistaken idea. It does not follow that by giving colored men the right of voting they are to hold office and commingle in our social circles, nor do I believe they desire it. The great test hereafter will be loyalty to the Government. In some of the loyal States suffrage has already been extended to the colored man, and no inconvenience seems to be experienced and no effort to take it from them.

I am, therefore, Mr. Speaker, in favor of the passage of this joint resolution and submitting it to the respective States for ratification, and I will therefore vote for it, but will cast my vote against the bill, which undertakes to force suffrage on the loyal States without giving them a voice in it, as I do not think, without an amendment to the Constitution, we have any right so to do. As I have already said, if the measure proposed by the joint resolution should be approved bitter party strife will soon be ended, and that race which stood firm and battled for the Union in the nation's struggle will have a voice in the selection of our rulers and have greater attachment for the Republic; and if ever a rebellion should again be attempted we will find the black man among the first to rally in defense of our country.

Our ancestors came over to this country of choice, while, on the other hand, those of the colored race were by force torn from their native land and placed here to aid by their labor in building up this country. This being the birthplace of the present generation of the colored people among us, they can well claim it as their home and demand adequate protection, which by the adoption of wholesome laws we have afforded them, if properly enforced. Let us, Mr. Speaker, reject the bill which proposes to force on loyal States suffrage without giving them any voice therein, and pass the proposed constitutional amendment and submit it to the States for their ratification. This we can do consistently both as a Congress and members of the great Republican party. It is said by the historian that the attachment of Romans to their standards was imposed by the united influence of religion and honor—that the golden eagle which glittered in the front of the legions was the object of their fondest devotion. So let us forget all former strife, and as one people and true patriots, with our eyes upon the Constitution, rally around the stars and stripes, the emblem of our beloved country, and this nation will be one of the strongest and grandest of the world.

SPEECH OF HON. B. F. WHITTEMORE,
OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 28, 1869,

On the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

MR. WHITTEMORE. Mr. Speaker, the heresy of State rights should no longer warp our conclusions or be dragged into our future legislation. We have no longer the slaveholder to appease or slavery to conserve. An Almighty arm has settled that question and severed the chains that bound us. Sectional as it was in its inception, local in its organization, it has been met and overcome. But its devotees still remind us of its power and prejudice which so long exercised its cruel sway and oppressive influences. We cannot shirk our responsibility; the present is the auspicious moment to declare the legal and political equality of all persons, and to proclaim national protection wherever the flag of our country is unfurled, over all who demand at our hands security to their persons and their God-given immunities. We cannot stop our ears to this appeal; it must not be disregarded. The sacrifices upon the altars of our country, the blood of the heroic slain, the untold treasures expended, the sighs, groans, and sufferings of the bereaved who mourn for their beloved, martyred fathers, sons, husbands, friends, call upon us to do our duty.

"There is a spirit stirring in the land
That on the nation's palpitating heart
Takes firmest hold; from thence will not depart
'Till from Atlantic to Pacific's strand
It permeates the soil, the air, the breast
Of every freeman and of all oppressed.
It is a spirit that through centuries gone
The world's long past, its earliest morning dawn,
Has moved to noblest deeds the noblest men,
And broken galling chains of slavery.
Whose voice on mountain, valley, hill, and glen,
Proclaimed, 'Let all mankind be free.'
This spirit, that bids oppression flee,
Is the unconquered soul of liberty."

Mr. Speaker, the work is before us; the past instructs us; the present admonishes, and the future awaits the result of our action—the performance of duty; to know whether we have learned wisdom by experience, and can deal justly; whether we have determined "to treat our neighbors as ourselves;" to acknowledge certain great truths self-evident, and give to others the immunities we claim—franchise and protection. The war abolished slavery with its sum of villainies; let Congress abolish political heresies and piratical invasions upon human rights; then will equal justice be established, and a peace that can alone be prosperous and permanent throughout the Republic; then will security be guaranteed the humblest citizen, and a unity of States that can never be severed by dissensions from within or invasions from without. Centuries are to look at our work effectually done or shamefully neglected. Let us be found equal to our task, prompt in our action, united in the cause of universal emancipation from wrong, and the acceptance of the right. The nation must award equal political privileges to all men everywhere, all over the wide extent of our common country.

Such a course will, as the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] so truly declared, become the means of a speedy settlement of all the vexatious questions that have divided us in the past. Whatever may be said in opposition to the measure now before us, or its unconstitutionality; however much lawyers may differ in their interpretation of statutory provisions, though we may exhaust research, compile the assertions of men that agree or disagree on the rights of a citizen or what constitutes a citizen, enter into the most elaborate analysis of the law and strive to create a holy reverence for ourselves and a grave indifference for others; though we may quote Patrick Henry, Jefferson, Madison, Chief Justice Marshall, Story, Parsons, Taney, the oldest or the youngest of the learned in the jurisprudence of our country to prop up the old systems and errors which have created greater regard for the State than for the nation, still we are forced by the circumstances around us to acknowledge that the bone of contention will never be removed while we prate the law and withhold justice.

Do you wish to end the controversy—settle the difficulty in the minds of those who have steadily opposed congressional reconstruction in the South? Do you propose to encourage and protect loyalty there? Then, as this bill provides, give the benefits of the franchise to every citizen in every State, without regard to race, color, or previous condition. Such a course will close the mouths of the sternest opponents of "the forced franchise," where the largest number of the colored men in our country are found. You cannot blame men of the South when they come with their accusations of inconsistency, laying them at your doors, if you still adhere to partial legislation and do not accept for yourselves what you have imposed upon them.

Shall a new sectional difficulty be created now that we have been delivered from one great curse which so nearly ruined our national existence; while the North by its prowess and championship for the right in one great issue dared to do or die that the wrong should be overcome, slavery abolished, the Union saved? Shall it falter in its action now? Shall we fail to recognize our duty to those who rallied to our standards that they might prove by their valor, devotion, suffering, death, their right to all the immunities of an American citizen? Shall we trust the pardoned rebel and not the patriot black man, whose severed limb lies moldering at Fort Pillow, Port Hudson, Olustee, Battery Wagner, or Petersburg mine? Shall we refuse, because the remnants of degenerate philosophies or theories hang upon the verge of our Government, to declare the infamous codes of the past, false to the grand and glorious enunciations of universal justice, or to act the part of statesmen worthy of the hour—the nation's glorious opportunity?

Give to the colored man his vote. He has a national equality with you; he is an American citizen, a veteran of the field on which through bloody contests triumph alone has come, that enables us this day to legislate for an undivided country. On staff and crutch he stands demanding his rights; with scars and empty sleeves he pleads an equal franchise; with uplifted hands, which have borne the musket in the defense of your altars and your homes, of that flag, emblem of freedom, of the future greatness of our Republic, he asks, not social, but political equality. Give the colored man his vote; then and not till then will disloyalty be crushed; then and not till then will tranquillity become the boon of our people; then and not till then will the material which feeds the flame of partisan and sectional strife be removed forever. This is no longer a white man's Government; it is a Government for all the people; black men have rights that white men are now enjoined to respect. They have the largest number of them given their ballots in the last election for the hero and chieftain, General Grant. With true loyalty in their hearts and Grant ballots in their hands they have exercised a freeman's will and united with yourselves in securing the era of peace.

It is said there are only one hundred and sixty thousand colored men yet to be enfranchised; about the number that were enrolled of their race in the Union armies. Surely if we could intrust them with the bullet why should we longer withhold from them the ballot? Why need we falter? Is there not in the constitution of our nature something that speaks louder and more earnest than the voice of prejudice or caste or false legislation, which tells us that now is the most favorable time for the settlement of a question so momentous?

"Then let us act wisely, we've nothing to fear.
The voice of the people is heard far and near
That manhood, not color, must be the sole test
Of a right to the franchise, North, South, East, and West."

I concur in all that my learned and honored friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] has said. I believe, with him, we cannot afford to do wrong. The Constitution, which we regard as the fundamental basis of national law and equity, makes it our imperative duty to guaranty to every man who claims himself an American citizen the benefits of a republican form of government. Is that Government republican which creates and maintains distinctions in franchise; that gives the vote to one and withholds it from another? The Government was founded on the principle that man was endowed by his Creator with certain inalienable rights; that all men were created equal; not a portion to rule by a divine right and others to be ruled by the usurpations of might volens volens; that the Government derived its just powers from the consent of the governed. Our fathers, out of their own experience in framing the Magna Charta, intended to denounce the dogmas of kings and tyrants and to establish as the cardinal, central idea of their declarations that the people were the sovereigns, deriving from God himself the right to say who should rule over them and what form of government they would have. They start out with the bold language, "We, the people"—not the white nor the black—"do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America"—not for Massachusetts, not for Pennsylvania, not for Maryland or Virginia, but "for the United States;" and among the reasons given why they have thus ordained are these: "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and posterity."

Now, then, can our liberty be secure in the hands of those who question our rights? Who is secure in his freedom when debarred from saying what kind of men shall represent him? Can we believe that the one hundred and sixty thousand colored men would give, if they are invested with the franchise, their ballots for those who cast their voice, influence, argument, and vote against this measure? They are, whether acknowledged or not, the constituencies of such as will seal their destinies by their action on the grand proposition before us. As for myself, I am ready to make our fathers' words no empty boast. By all that is just, by the remembrance of past antagonisms, by the rights we enjoy, hold sacred and inviolate; by the measurements of a golden rule, that principle which should govern us in our actions and control us in our legislation, having found that there is that in our statutes destructive of the essential features of a republican form of government, let us accept "the right to alter or to abolish" all unrepresentative features of such statutes and adhere to such principles as shall seem most likely to effect the safety and happiness of all the people.

As corroborative of my own views, I close, Mr. Speaker, with the reading of a passage of the inaugural address of the Governor of Massachusetts. He says:

"A final measure to secure the tranquillity of our nation is now demanded by every consideration of gratitude to the brave heroes who have fallen and of justice to those so long enslaved and as yet only partially enfranchised who aided to achieve the triumph. The American idea of liberty is based on the principle that is expressed in those immortal words of the Declaration of Independence, 'all men are created equal.' The events of the war have made free all over whom the flag of the nation waves; but as yet all are not equal at the polls, either as voters or as candidates for office. A citizen of the Union should have the same privileges whether his home is in Maryland or Massachusetts. Deny one man in Maryland his rights as to the suffrage or any other national matter, and the citizen of Massachusetts suffers as well as the disfranchised in Maryland. Let it, then, be made a part of the Constitution that suffrage on national questions shall be the same in every part of the Union; establish it in the organic law, and no change of parties can abridge the right; embrace the present opportunity and the nation will reap the full fruit of the victory. Failure now will bring doubt and uncertainty as to the future, and the friends of the ballot in other lands while they are struggling for the right will feel the loss and lament our want of courage, persistence, and fidelity to the great idea which inspired our contest."

Mr. Speaker, I trust that we shall pass this or a similar amendment, and that my State, South Carolina, may have the earliest if not the first opportunity to give her sanction to a legislation so wise and just. South Carolina having by experience learned the penalty of the advocacy of the wrong or the errors of the past, now stands ready, through her Representatives assembled, to change front and grant as well as advocate rights to others she enjoys herself.

HO. OF REPS.

REMARKS OF HON. S. CORLEY,
OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 28, 1869,

Pending the discussion of the suffrage bill and constitutional amendment.

Mr. CORLEY. Mr. Speaker, the discussion of this question of suffrage to every citizen of the United States, by congressional enactment and a constitutional amendment, is not only interesting to the student of nature, but to every lover of his country and the rights of man. It is natural that one whose humble avocation had placed him beneath the social plane of the aristocratic oligarchy of the South, and whose aspirations and natural bent raised him above the narrow circle to which that aristocracy had assigned him, whose stand-point was reached by the furious lashings of the storm which rocked the ship of state on the surging sea of rebellion, whose waves have borne him thus far out on the turbulent ocean of politics, should feel like trying his depth before he is drifted to the shore again. Here we find strange whirling eddies of thought and action, bearing tiny bubbles of froth and foam soon to be dissolved in air as the lashings of the wave subside. Here we find men of noble mien, similar in natural characteristics and impulses, arrayed in active hostility as partisans who under different circumstances and educational habits might go hand in hand in the great work of freedom and progress. Let us concede, at least, that each may be honest while all may be wrong. Perfection is unattainable in this life, and "to err is human, to forgive divine."

Sir, we are to-day but closing the last great scene in the bloody drama of our national life. Slavery has at last been wiped out, along with the gigantic rebellion it engendered to sustain and perpetuate. But though the spirit of both hovers around us now we are nevertheless here to confirm that righteous decision of the sword. If the friends of the Union and the cause of human rights did not exhaust their manhood when they slew the rebellion they are still here to secure, by legal enactment, that freedom which was so nobly won on the ensanguined fields of the Republic. Under the folds of that starry banner which still floats as an ensign of hope to the down-trodden of every clime they dare not falter nor prove recreant to duty.

The proposition is clear to my mind that all legitimate and just Governments derive their authority from the consent of the governed, and equally clear that such consent cannot be obtained without an impartial appeal to the ballot. Suffrage is therefore a natural and inherent right which cannot be safely denied to any citizen of sound mind having attained his or her majority, except for rebellion or crime. It is a matter of regret that the proposed bill and amendment do not go far enough to fully secure the great ends of freedom, justice, and humanity.

The Constitution guarantees a republican form of government to the States, but while there remains a single friend of the Government and freedom, male or female, disfranchised in a single one of those States, we are unfaithful to the Constitution and best interests of our common country. There must be spirit in the Constitution as well as form. If we preserve only the form the spirit has departed, and soon will flee with it forever the liberties of the people. I would that one or the other had included women without the shadow of a doubt, for surely the mothers and educators of our race are as competent to vote as the proud sons they have reared. I know it is said that we have her influence indirectly bearing on our legislation, and therefore we need no more. Her influence is great, and we should by no means underrate it, but it is powerless to reach the evils under which we groan without the ballot. We ungenerously withhold the one, while we are compelled to beg for the other. We want her influence by all means, and in addition must have her vote. There is now no legal responsibility resting upon her political influence and power. We wish to increase the one and secure for the nation the full benefit of the other. We wish to make her legally responsible for treason, as she is for other crimes. Then we shall have fewer transfers of property from traitor hands to lovely daughters for the purpose of smiling their "loyal" claims through Congress. The much-feared antagonism between the sexes will not be likely to drive the vanquished lords to the wall, and if the predicted war of races has been postponed by the recent national election, which the colored men of the South voted to avert, we may safely conclude that woman can in like manner indefinitely postpone any serious dissension or war of the sexes. We need more of the moral element in politics, which may be had by the enfranchisement of woman. Without her support we are in danger of being wrecked.

The whisky and tobacco from which we draw the great bulk of our internal revenue are but systematic frauds upon the people in production, sale, use, and revenue, and to-day cost the people of this country enough annually to pay off our immense national debt. This is an outrage upon humanity, a crime against God, and a disgrace to the nation. No country can long survive such a system of wholesale poisoning and the waste and extravagance attending it. These and concomitant evils can be corrected by the moral power of woman with the ballot in her hand. Of course the whisky rings, demagogues, and keepers of gambling bells are against it. They know that woman will dry up the fountains of their iniquity and send them to honest labor for a support.

It is important, too, that the national Government should permit no State to disfranchise any of its citizens on account of ignorance or poverty. I do not hesitate to say that no favored class in any State should be permitted to disfranchise any one on account of the enforced or neglected ignorance of its masses. This would be only a premium on past oppression and degradation, which I am not willing to allow; and those who made chattels of men in order to raise themselves to a higher plane should be compelled to contribute their quota toward educating those whom they had so deeply wronged. If State legislation, after the incorporation of this ignorant element into the body-politic, should prove to be worse than that of the intelligent traitors of those States during the rebellion, it will be quite time enough to disfranchise it. No State should be allowed to disfranchise any citizen on account of its own enforced or neglected ignorance. A question was asked the author of this bill [Mr. BOWWELL] on yesterday whether or not it denied to the State governments the right to impose an educational or property qualification. Being answered in the negative, the questioner seemed to be perfectly satisfied that the poor, ignorant colored man could be easily excluded in Kentucky and other States by such legislation as would give general satisfaction to all who look upon equal political laws as crimes against God and man.

Majorities in the States have heretofore applied educational and property qualifications to suffrage; but if the right to regulate ever implied the right to deny suffrage the constitution no longer permits it. The poor and ignorant are compelled to sacrifice their lifeblood to defend the nation equally with the wealthy and educated—the first to draw the sword as well as the last to sheathe it, and should ever be equally entitled to the ballot. It is urged by aristocrats and oppressors generally that the poor have too little at stake to say how and by whom the government under which they live shall be administered. If the bloated wreck of humanity who urges this plea can demonstrate that his piles of brick and mortar which line the avenues of our great cities, his gold and legal tenders, his bonds and stocks, are of more value than his own life, then we may be ready to submit that the poor man with himself may be disfranchised at pleasure; that money and not the man should be enfranchised, and that wealth is of more value than patriotic devotion to the nation.

This aristocracy of wealth, as well as the aristocracy of letters, tells us that the ignorant are incompetent to exercise the franchise properly. But it must be admitted that ignorance is in one sense comparative, and those who are themselves ignorant in that sense have no right to exclude those who are a degree below them in intelligence in one direction, and perhaps a degree above them in the other. These political pharisees will do well not to make the path too straight, lest they exclude themselves. The ballot is itself the best educator. By its use all citizens may readily learn how to guard against its abuse. The enfranchisement of the spelling-book and the "almighty dollar" will soon prove to be but poor substitutes for that of manhood and womanhood. If we are to have any qualification beyond that of simple manhood and womanhood, let it be that of virtue. This nation is in no serious danger from the ignorance of its loyal masses. If its voters were as honest as they are intelligent, the Republic would last as long as time itself. We have been and still are in more danger from the machinations of intelligent traitors than we ever can be from the accumulated ignorance of our own and other shores.

It needs no elaborate argument to demonstrate what the Constitution, in the light of its later amendments, so plainly teaches—that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." A citizen of the United States is the political equal of every other citizen, and cannot be constitutionally denied the right to the ballot in any State except for rebellion or crime. I thank God that the United States is at last understood to be a Government, and is no longer considered the tail, instead of the head of the Union. It must maintain its integrity and power. Having subdued its enemies it must protect its loyal defenders. Those who were honest opponents or unwilling assailants, who have since proved their devotion to the grand old banner of the free, must feel as safe in Carolina as in Maine. If, as admitted by a representative of the Democratic party on this floor, the election of General Grant has decided the question that the rebellion shall not be renewed, then it has also decided that southern Republicans shall be protected in the freedom of opinion and speech, and woe to that party or people who decide otherwise. But while his party inscribes upon its banner the glaring falsehood that the reconstruction laws are "unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void," it but fires the rebel heart with hate to the Government, and murder to all who support and defend it.

With the teachings of the great Calhoun and the surroundings which environ the southern mind it is easily impressed in the wrong direction. Some allowance is due to education and habit; but what allowance can we make for those who, without this excuse, swear that they have never aided and abetted the rebellion and yet band themselves together and bear unpatriotic and treasonable mottoes to stir the hearts of better men to deeds of violence and death? Every citizen must have the ballot, and yet the ballot in the hands of a homeless, starving man is not a sure weapon of defense. If the wealth and intelligence of the South shall be permitted to continue in antagonism to the Government and its policy, and their tools are still to threaten, overawe, and assassinate loyal men for no crime but their loyalty; then the war for the Union is a failure, Grant has surrendered to Lee, and the South will not hesitate in the future to declare its success and its power.

The grand reason why the loyal people of the South were powerless before the rebellion was because they were not protected by the Government. When protection is not afforded loyalty cannot be expected or demanded. Those who were snugly ensconced behind the bayonets of a million of brave soldiers may look upon us poor southern men as little better than traitors at heart, because we could not prevent or avoid conscription, and were powerless before the leaden hail of our nation's defenders. Notwithstanding their contempt for our love, their want of sympathy for our misfortunes and perils, we nevertheless hope to prove our devotion by our works. To do this we must be protected by the Government which claims our allegiance, and with that protection we shall do and dare all that truth and right demand for all classes and conditions composing the people of our country. We must show the enemies of republicanism in the North, as well as in the South, that the right to regulate suffrage in the States is subject to the decision of the people's representatives in the Congress of the nation, and cannot longer be denied to any citizen under the plea of regulating it. He who perils his life to defend his country must be allowed to say in Ohio, as well as in South Carolina, why that sacrifice shall be offered.

The people of the South have been compelled to accept the results of the late terrible contest, but have yielded most reluctantly to the decision of that potent and overwhelming argument, the sword; and having done so feel justly aggrieved that the people of the North should demand for themselves an exclusion from the minor evils of that condition they have so justly imposed on their fellow-citizens of that section. I frankly and freely admit that the people of the South lost every constitutional right by their rebellion, and that it is their duty to accept cheerfully and in good faith the magnanimous terms of the Government as determined by Congress for their restoration to citizenship; but while it must be admitted that the people of the North have not been incapable of determining as to the vital and essential condition of suffrage to the colored man in the reconstruction of the South, they have nevertheless shown a want of either mental or moral perception in their discrimination against color among themselves. But whether the people of the loyal States have been able to comprehend the changes that have been wrought in the organic law of the land through their policy of reconstruction or not, which policy I fully indorse, they have now to learn that they must quietly submit to those changes for themselves and the nation as the only hope for peace and security in the future. Neither the preponderance nor the ignorance of the colored race among them can be urged as an excuse for withholding the ballot. The people of the South could and did wield this argument with some effect, but the people of the North have no excuse for their delinquency, and their cheeks should mantle with shame in view of their dastardly inconsistency. Those who demand these rights are citizens of the United States, and the Government must enforce its authority for the protection of their rights and its own security by their immediate and unconditional enfranchisement. It cannot longer refuse. If the colored men of this nation who periled their lives and poured out their blood freely that the land which gave them birth might remain united and free, a refuge for the oppressed of all nations, are to be longer refused the rights which their heroic efforts have aided in securing to alien outcasts, and even to the sturdy misguided hosts of treason, who fought as desperately against the Government as these dusky sons fought for it, then I assert that this Congress is recreant to justice and humanity, to God and the country, and deserves the just execrations of free-men throughout the world.

SPEECH OF HON. C. C. BOWEN,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 29, 1869,

On the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

MR. BOWEN. Mr. Speaker, it is with no little embarrassment that I feel myself called upon to enter into a discussion of this great question, not that it lacks anything of importance, for I believe it to be one of the most important questions concerning the inalienable rights of the people that has ever been brought before Congress. Sir, the embarrassment which I feel arises from the provoking fullness of illustration with which my colleagues have dealt with this great cause. So masterly have they presented this question that there is scarcely left a single spot for their unlucky colleague to set his foot upon without trespassing on some one of those arguments which, with an admirable profusion, I had almost said prodigality, of learning, they have spread all over the whole subject. But I shall be content to travel after my learned friends over a part of the track which they have at once smoothed and illuminated—more happy still if I shall be able, as I pass along, to relieve the fatigue of the benevolent companions of my journey.

In our great national declaration of rights, a State paper embodying the sentiments and judgments of the fathers, with regard to the theory, the political philosophy underlying American republicanism, the equality of man, the inalienability of his right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" is declared; and the method of securing and maintaining these announced in the affirmative, that—"Governments are instituted to secure these ends, and derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

This declaration of equality, this announcement of the inalienability of the rights indicated, and this assertion that "Governments derive their just power from the consent of the governed," teach, in my estimation, the doctrine that self-government is natural and inherent; that no man confers it upon his fellow; that no constitutional convention speaks it into life; that its title is sustained by the authority of no parchment, and that no human power can de jure deprive man of its possession and exercise. It is absurd to speak of self-government as belonging to one who is denied the ballot, for without the ballot no man governs himself; he is governed by that class who, holding the ballot, wield political powers; and he holds the modicum of rights, privileges, and immunities accorded to him according to the will and the caprices of those who may fitly be termed his political masters.

It is true that the use of the ballot may be regulated by national enactment—indeed it may be by State enactment; but the use of the ballot can only be regulated in the sense in which the traffic in merchandise may be regulated; the regulation is in no sense to amount to deprivation of the right. In the light of what has been said, I regard the proposition made by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] as one looking simply to the removal of an obstruction to the exercise of a right, God-given and inherent.

And here I pause to ask the question, whence comes the law, the constitutional authority, according to which either the national or the State governments can deprive any portion of the people, men native to the soil, of requisite age and legal settlement, of political powers inherent and inalienable? Forgetting the color of the men in whose behalf this legislation is proposed, their former condition of slaves, their present condition of quasi free inhabitants, laying aside every prejudice and hatred springing out of our early education with regard to them, let us, intent upon so discharging our duties as law-makers in the work of reconstructing both the national and State governments of this country as to establish the rights of all the people, of whatever name and color, according to the immutable principles of justice and right, discover, if possible, the law in accordance with which our actions should be governed in this case, and in accordance with which that action is to be justified before our constituents.

And at this point, let us inquire who, according to the letter and spirit of our national organic law, were in the early days of the Republic recognized and treated as citizens thereof? And before speaking of the language of any special article in either of the great State papers which, taken as a whole, form our national organic law, I beg to invite your attention to a single fact illustrative in some sense of the doctrine which I here maintain. The fact to which I refer is this: that in the early days of the Republic in all sections of the country North and South the colored American was recognized and treated as a citizen, not only in this sense, that he possessed and wielded civil rights simply, but he possessed and wielded political powers. That I may not weary your patience at too great length I offer you in confirmation of this view the opinion of Hon. Judge Gaston, of the supreme court of North Carolina, in the case of the State vs. William Manuel, found in Devereux and Battle's North Carolina Reports, volume four, page 20. The learned judge in delivering this opinion, said:

"According to the laws of this State, all human beings within it who are not slaves fall within one of two classes. Whatever distinctions may have existed in the Roman law between citizens and free inhabitants, they are unknown to our institutions. Before our Revolution all free persons born within the dominions of the King of Great Britain, whatever their color or complexion, were native born British subjects; those born out of his allegiance were aliens. Slavery did not exist in England, but it did exist in the British colonies. Slaves were not in legal parlance persons, but property. The moment the incapacity or disqualification of slavery was removed they became persons, and were then either British subjects, or not British subjects, accordingly as they were or were not born within the allegiance of the British king. Upon the Revolution no other change took place in the law of North Carolina than was consequent upon the transition from a colonial dependent on a European king to a free and sovereign State; slaves remained slaves, British subjects in North Carolina became North Carolina freemen, foreigners until made members of the State continued aliens, slaves unmanumitted here became freemen, and therefore if born within North Carolina are citizens of North Carolina, and all free persons born within the State are born citizens of this State.

"It has been said that before our Revolution free persons of color did not exercise the right of voting for members of the Colonial Legislature. How this may have been it would be difficult at this time to ascertain. It is certain, however, that very few, if any, could have claimed the right of suffrage, for a reason of a very different character than the one supposed. The principle of freehold suffrage seems to have been brought over from England with the first colonists, and to have been preserved almost invariably in the colony ever afterwards. In the act of 1743, chapter 1, Swan's revision, 171, it will be seen that a freehold of fifty acres was necessary to entitle the inhabitant of a county to vote."

But, sir, it is a fact that will not be denied on this floor by any intelligent man, that for long years after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States free colored Americans in both the States and Territories claimed and exercised, without hindrance, the ballot. Now, Mr. Speaker, we come directly upon the question of citizenship. What is citizenship? What implied therein, and what the duty of civil society as to defense and protection of rights therein implied? This subject has often been one of serious inquiry, and previous to the adoption and ratification of the fourteenth amendment those who examined it must have been pained by the fruitless search in the law books and the records of our courts for a clear and satisfactory definition of the phrase "citizen of the United States." No such definition, no authoritative establishment of the meaning of the phrase, either by course of judicial decisions in our courts or by the continued and contemporaneous action of the different branches of our political Government, could be found, and for aught I know to the contrary the subject was as little understood in its details and elements, and the question was as much open to argument and speculative criticism, as it was at the beginning of the Government. But as a general answer to those who make such inquiries, I have this to say: every citizen of the United States is a component member of the nation, with rights and duties under the Constitution and laws of the United States which cannot be destroyed or abridged by the laws of any particular State. The laws of the State, if they conflict with the laws of the nation, are of no force. The Constitution is plain, beyond cavil, upon this point. Article six says:

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties, &c., shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

And from this I assume that every person who is a citizen of the United States, whether by birth or naturalization, holds his great franchise by the laws of the United States and above the control of any particular State. Citizenship of the United States is an integral thing, incapable of legal existence in fractional parts. Whoever, then, has that franchise is a whole citizen and a citizen of the whole nation, and cannot be such citizen in one State and not in another. Some ingenious persons have tried to draw a distinction between Federal and what they are pleased to call State citizenship. It was the opinion of Mr. Marcy, when Secretary of State, that all persons born in the United States were citizens of the United States, not referring, of course, to slaves—slavery at that time existing in this country.

We all know that no State has the authority to make a citizen of the United States. The Constitution vests in Congress the sole power of naturalization, and it may make a citizen of a foreigner; but it is true that when a person becomes a citizen of the United States he is not also a citizen of every State wherein he may happen to reside? Sir, I am aware that there are men who question the soundness of this proposition, and for their benefit I would refer them to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States delivered by Chief Justice Marshall, the most eminent jurist who ever sat upon an American bench. In this case, Gasus vs. Ballou, reported in 6 Peters, page 762, the Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, says:

"The defendant in error is alleged in the proceedings to be a citizen of the United States naturalized in Louisiana and residing there. This is equivalent to an averment that he is a citizen of that State."

"A citizen of the United States residing in any State of the Union is a citizen of that State."

In a speech delivered by Hon. Reverdy Johnson, published in the Daily Globe of January 31, 1866, the honorable gentleman said:

"It is very desirable that we should cease to consider for a moment that in relation to citizenship and rights there is, as far as the Constitution of the United States is concerned, any difference on account of color." * * * "There are all sorts of notions, having no foundation in fact or in law, broached from time to time by individuals or classes of individuals, but I suppose that if the Constitution declared that all persons born in the United States should be citizens, nobody would be able to raise a reasonable doubt that it included the black man." * * * "I conclude, therefore, with what I said in the beginning, that it seems to me very desirable that we should, upon the very first occasion that arises, and upon every occasion, if any future occasion should arise, say at once virtually, by ceasing to use the term 'distinction of color,' that in the judgment of the American Senate and of the people of the United States there is no such distinction."

And to this already overwhelming testimony let us add the first section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

As to the objection, not in law but in sentiment only, that if a colored man can be a citizen of the United States he might possibly become the President, the legal inference is true; there would be such a legal possibility. But those who make that objection are not arguing upon the Constitution as it is, but upon what in their own minds and feelings they think it ought to be.

The second article of the Constitution, section one, speaks of "natural-born citizens," and if asked for our evidence of citizenship what would be the answer? Sir, in my opinion we have no better title to the citizenship which we enjoy than the accident of birth, the mere fact that we happen to be born in the United States. The Constitution in speaking of natural-born citizens, uses no affirmative language to make them such, but only recognizes and reaffirms the universal principle, common to all nations and as old as political societies themselves, that the people born in the country constitute the nation, and as individuals are natural members of the body-politic. If this be a true principle, and I hardly think it will be denied, it follows that every person born in the country is at the time of birth prima facie a citizen; and he who would deny it must take upon himself the burden of proving some great disfranchisement strong enough to override the "natural-born" right as recognized by the Constitution in terms the most simple and comprehensive, and without any reference to race or color or any other accidental circumstance. That nativity furnishes the rule both of duty and of right as between the individual and the Government is a historical and political truth so old and so universally accepted that it is useless to prove it by authority.

In every civilized country the individual is born to duties and rights—the duty of allegiance and the right to protection. These are correlative obligations, the one the price of the other, and they constitute the all-sufficient bond of union between the individual and his country. I have said that, prima facie, every person in this country is born a citizen, and that he who denies it in individual cases assumes the burden of stating the exception to the general rule and proving the fact which works the disfranchisement. This is the law of birth, the common law of England, clear and unqualified, and now, both in England and America, modified only by statutes made from time to time to meet emergencies as they arise.

It has been strenuously insisted by some of the honorable members upon this floor that persons of color though born in this country are not capable of being citizens of the United States. As far as the Constitution is concerned this is a naked assumption, for that instrument contains not one word upon the subject. The exclusion, if it exists, must then rest upon some fundamental fact which in the reason and nature of things is so inconsistent with citizenship that the two cannot coexist in the same person. Is mere color such a fact? Let those who assert it prove that to be so. It has never been so understood nor put in practice in the nation from which we derive our language, laws, and institutions, and our very morals and modes of thought; and, as far as I know, there is not a single nation in Christendom which does not regard the new-found idea with incredulity if not disgust. What can there be in the mere color of a man to disqualify him from bearing true and faithful allegiance to his native country and for demanding the protection of that country? And these two, allegiance and protection, constitute the sum of the duties and rights of a natural-born citizen of the United States. The term "citizen," as understood in our law, is precisely analogous to the term "subject" in common law, and the change of phrase has entirely resulted from the change of government. The sovereignty has been transferred from one man to the collective body of the people, and he who before was a "subject of the king" is now a citizen of the State.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the fact of citizenship having been established, the next question is, what are the requirements of civil society as regards the guarantee therein implied? Do we not find society divided off into different grades and ranks, and the one not associating with the other—still are they not all entitled to the same political rights and privileges? You do not take a man's vote from him because he labors in the streets, or is a drunkard, or is a man of immoral character, and why then seek to deprive these people of the right to vote when many of them may be persons of great intelligence and many virtues. By this assumption of power you claim a moral superiority over these people? You claim the right to rule them, and you impose upon them the duty of obedience, and it is thus that you create differences which never can be reconciled. Sir, it is a false idea, and one which ought not to be cherished by the intelligent citizens of this great Republic. Give the black man his rights and you make him a contented and useful citizen; but take away from him those rights which belong to him and his bosom will rankle with hate and discontent will prevail among his class. Do him but that justice which he has a right to claim and he will be satisfied. The black man does not and will not claim to associate with you, but he does think that he is entitled to certain political rights, such as the right of voting at an election, and especially when he has paid a heavy tax to the support of your Government, and if you refuse him this he will look upon you with jealousy and hatred, and upon this Government as a Government of injustice and oppression.

Sir, in my opinion, in this age of progress, the time has now come that the Constitution of these United States should be so amended as to give to every citizen, whether in poverty or affluence, whether white or black, that right sacred and dear to every American citizen—the right of suffrage. Sir, is poverty or color a crime, that it should deprive an American citizen of this boon? Should he who by our laws may be called upon to take up arms in defense of your families, your firesides, your property, and your liberty be deprived by law from exercising this inestimable privilege? Should those patriotic colored men and their posterity, who when their country called flocked to the Army and the Navy in defense of that country, and bravely shed their blood in the struggle to perpetuate this Union, have fewer rights than the demagogue or base worshiper of the golden god?

How is it that every person born in these United States owes allegiance to the Government? Everything he has, his property and his life, may be taken by the Government of the United States in its defense or to maintain the honor of the nation; and can it be that our forefathers struggled through the revolutionary war and set up this Government, and that the people of our day have struggled through another war with all its sacrifices to maintain it—sacrifices including half a million new-made graves, filled without regard to race, color, or previous condition, which to-day rear their grassy mounds toward heaven marking the last resting-place of the gallant dead—and at last that we have got a Government which is all-powerful to command the obedience of the citizen but has no power to protect him in his natural, inalienable, and inherent rights? Is this all your boasted American citizenship amounts to? If so, go tell it to the father whose son was starved to death at Andersonville, or the widow whose husband was slain at

40TH CONG.... 3D SESS.

Suffrage—Mr. Shellabarger.

HO. OF REPS.

Fort Pillow, or the little boy who leads his sightless father through the streets, made blind by the winds and sands of a southern coast, or the thousand other mangled heroes to be seen on every side, that this Government, in defense of which the son and the husband fell, the father lost his eyes, and the others were crippled, had the right to call these persons to its defense, but has no constitutional right or power to bestow the right of suffrage to the survivors or their friends who are now citizens of the United States. Sir, it cannot be. Such is not the meaning of our Constitution, neither is such the meaning of American citizenship.

But, Mr. Speaker, much has been said by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Eldridge] about the intention of the framers of the Constitution. Sir, I think their intention cannot be misunderstood when it is remembered who enjoyed the right of suffrage at the adoption of the Constitution, and that nowhere in that instrument or the Declaration of Independence can the word "white" be found; and when the Articles of Confederation were discussed in the Continental Congress the word "white," which was then sought to be thrust in as an amendment to article four, between the words "free inhabitants," was defeated by a vote of 84 yeas to 24 nays. The amendment referred to was offered by the delegation from South Carolina, and upon which eleven States voted. Again, the gentleman says that nowhere in the Constitution is the grant of power given to Congress for regulation of suffrage. Sir, such may be the correct interpretation of that document, but I contend that the right of suffrage, as I have already said, is "natural, inalienable, and inherent;" and if the gentleman will refer to the Journals of Congress of 1778, volume four, page 379, he will there learn that it was so regarded when the question arose to insert the word "white" in the Articles of Confederation.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Eldridge] has caught up the word "party" and rung the changes upon that. He says that "party" has kept the dissevered fragments of the Union asunder since the war ended. Sir, let me ask the gentleman what "party" it was that dissevered or tried to break the Union into "fragments." And here, Mr. Speaker, in support of the doctrine that the right of suffrage was enjoyed by every free inhabitant, and that suffrage was considered as "natural and inherent," let me call your attention to what was then called the Northwestern Territory, now the State of Ohio. Previous to the first constitutional convention, held in 1802, free colored persons voted in that Territory under the ordinance of 1787, which made no distinction on account of color or previous condition, and when the proposition was submitted to the convention to insert the word "white" in their constitution it was only carried by the ballot of the president, who happened to have the casting vote.

Since this is the law as touching citizenship and the obligation of the Government to protect each citizen in the enjoyment of the rights implied therein, it must be conceded that it is either the duty of the State government or the national Government in the exercise of a power and authority expressed or implied in the law to guaranty, by appropriate legislation, the possession and exercise of these rights to every citizen. It is declared in the Constitution of the United States that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. This rule of the Constitution cannot be properly enforced, and the privileges implied enjoyed in the full and free sense indicated without a rule with regard to the qualification of electors in the several States which shall be universal and uniform.

This rule, Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, should be established by constitutional amendment; and as proposed by the honorable Representative from Massachusetts; otherwise it will be subject to change, and thus of uncertain duration and use.

And this rule, universal and uniform, should be distinguished for its reasonableness and justice, its impartiality and accordance with the American idea of democratic republicanism. This rule adopted, and the vexed question, what is the status of the negro in American politics? will be forever settled, and that, too, without injustice to him or outrage to the sentiment either of Christianity, democracy or law. With slavery abolished, and the last relics of the barbarism which it has entailed upon us removed, our Government, State and national, will have entered upon that career of usefulness and glory in which we shall realize the fond anticipations of the fathers, when, declaring the independence of our country, and establishing for themselves and their posterity what they regarded as a genuine democracy, they pledged to its support and maintenance "their lives, their property, and their sacred honor."

SPEECH OF HON. S. SHELLABARGER, OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 29, 1869.

The House, having under consideration the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1667) to secure equal privileges and immunities to citizens of the United States, and to enforce the provisions of article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution, and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, were recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary—

Mr. SHELLABARGER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In the brief time allotted to me I cannot undertake to discuss a question of such magnitude as that before the House. I will occupy my time in the first place by briefly referring to the points of difference between the proposition now pending, submitted on behalf of the Judiciary Committee by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Boutwell], and the one which I had the honor to propose the other day as an amendment.

The proposition of the Committee on the Judiciary is, that we shall so amend the Constitution as to provide that—

The right of any citizen of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of the race, color, or previous condition of slavery of any citizen or class of citizens of the United States.

My proposition is to provide that—

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall deny or abridge to any male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years or over, and who is of sound mind, an equal vote at all elections in the State in which he shall have such actual residence as shall be prescribed by law, except to such as have engaged or may hereafter engage in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, and to such as shall be duly convicted of treason, felony, or other infamous crime.

These two propositions agree in assuming a negative form, as it is commonly denominated, the form of a prohibition as against the exercise of certain powers by the States. They differ, however, in this essential respect. The committee propose simply to prohibit the States from making discriminations among the various classes of citizens, based upon any of these three grounds, namely, race, color, or previous condition of slavery. The objection that I have to that is one that is almost insuperable to my own mind, though I say here that if no other proposition shall be presented and brought to a final vote, I shall vote for his in the form in which it is submitted.

But I wish now to express the hope in the hearing of the gentleman from Massachusetts and of the House that he may find it best, for the reason I will now state, to modify his own proposition, if the one I have submitted, or something embodying its principles, shall not be adopted as an amendment. The consideration which I say seems to me almost fatal to his plan is, that it leaves still, substantially, the great mischief unremedied which the exigencies upon us demand that we shall correct; and that is, that it leaves to the States the power to make discriminations as to who shall vote. These discriminations may be on the score of either intelligence or want of property, or any other thing than the three things enumerated in his proposition.

Mr. Speaker, the event which has impelled, by a common instinct, the loyal mind of the country to demand of us any amendment at this time relating to suffrage is mainly that one by which four million of our people have been suddenly admitted to the rank of free citizens, and the overwhelming necessity that their loyal votes should be made available as the basis of loyal State governments, and as indispensable to the organization of any reliable State governments in the late rebel States. It is this wonderful event, one of those which come along once in a while in the providence of God, that has brought upon our country the great controlling reason for the amendment we consider. The time told of by the murdered Lincoln had come when that blood which we during two centuries drew by the lash from the veins of the slave had been compensated by an equal sea of blood drawn from our veins by the sword. And when that time had come, these four million men who were made ignorant and destitute by those centuries of wrong were made free. It is this stupendous fact especially which calls upon us for this amendment. But, sir, the body of this race, made ignorant and destitute by our wrong, may substantially all be now excluded from the elective franchise under a qualification of intelligence or property, or any other than the three named in the pending amendment, which qualification may be prescribed in the State laws, and is not prohibited by the gentleman's amendment. I submit to my distinguished friend that we fail to come up to the imperative demands which these momentous events impose upon us if we fail to meet that exigency to which I have alluded, and which, in the main, creates the necessity for this amendment.

Sir, I plead for these people who have been suddenly thrown by this strange providence upon the justice of their Government and the charities of God and their country when I implore that we shall make no mistakes here. Sir, a mistake here is absolutely fatal. Let it remain possible, under our amendment, to still disfranchise the body of the colored race in the late rebel States and I tell you it will be done. It is both impossible and useless to argue here. The overwhelming and ocean-like volume of facts which comes to us every single day of our lives in undissenting voice proves that the master white race will submit to negro enfranchisement not an hour longer than compelled to by Federal coercion, or as a necessity to reacquire admission to national power. And even now the very delegates here from Virginia and other States, on the mission of making their States seem lovely, loyal, and submissive, have the manliness to say—all of them—that their people are unanimously and violently opposed to negro suffrage, and only yield to it as Lee did to Grant at Appomattox, as "accepting the situation."

I wish here to-day to put upon record my solemn warning to my fellow-members against an act which shall legalize the disfranchisement of the vast body of the loyal race of the South. I wish to make here the prediction and the warning that, should we make our amendment so that this can be done, then it will be done; and being done, a loyal State government in the late confederate States is instantly made to be impossible. Sir, we may sing and coo as dulcet as the dove, peace, peace; but the ugly fact will remain as stern, relentless, and terrible as ever that the rebel and master race at the South are not the lovers of this Union, but are lovers of the "lost cause." While they may now even mean submission because they see no hope in aught else, yet, sir, he is unutterably mad who will so frame and amend the Constitution now as that we shall put these States and their only truly loyal people under the mastery of these mourners for "the lost cause." What a cause! The most infamous and godless which ever arose or perished in human annals, because it was a cause which aimed at building the fabric of human government upon the enslavement and chattelization of the soul of God's poor, and to do this by the perpetual overthrow of the only free Republic in the world. Make it possible, sir, for men whose moral sense is such to-day that all over that beautiful and treason-blighted South they boast that they are still mourners for such a lost cause to disfranchise the race as to which they to-day avow their poignant and undying grief that they could not chattelize forever, and will they not disfranchise them? Sir, once more here in my place and in the audience of the people's Representatives and of the people I say, be warned! Sir, they will—it being left only possible—they will. Here, truly, it is true that blunder is worse than crime.

And, sir, can I be mistaken when I say that under the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts these "mourners for the lost cause" can disfranchise the vast, overwhelming mass of the colored people of the entire South? Sir, it is impossible that I should be mistaken. The gentleman urges upon me as a reason why he prefers his amendment to the one I offer and prefer that mine would render the constitution of his own State unconstitutional, because Massachusetts requires that a voter shall be able to read; while his plan would leave it in the power of the States to continue and enforce an exclusion from the ballot because the man could not read. This position confesses the almost fatal defect of his plan. This colored race cannot now read because we have for these centuries shut them from the light; they are poor, because we have during these centuries stolen their property. And now we are about to make an amendment to our organic law—and which is to be as eternal as the Government itself—by which we say to the oppressing race, "You may forever in the future, as you have in the past, keep away from these people both knowledge and property, by keeping away from them the ballot," that highest defense of the rights of a freeman, and the surest (and to the late slaves indispensable) means of elevating his condition as to intelligence and property. If the gentleman's amendment is to become a part of the Constitution, Mr. Speaker, I profoundly hope I may be mistaken in these views.

I shall, as I have said, vote for it if we can get no better; but only because he removes three grounds which now exist for disfranchising whole classes and races of virtuous and loyal citizens of the Republic. Sir, the pity is, "and pity 'tis, 'tis true," that it removes only three, and leaves whole races and classes and masses of the citizens of the Republic to be robbed of the very highest right of every free citizen for every other reason which the master race may conceive or contrive except only these three. Should it so pass this House I trust it may take a better form in the Senate, where they have opportunities for debate and comprehending it which the previous question and press of business prohibit here.

One single other suggestion in regard to the proposition which I have submitted in connection with the one submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I respectfully call his attention to the fact that his amendment is one which, if his position, taken the other day in his able and elaborate argument, be right, and if there be in Congress now the power to secure the elective franchise to all the people without this proposed amendment, then this amendment will add to the mischiefs it aims at remedying instead of relieving them. That happens in this way: he simply prohibits the States from exercising the power of disfranchising for either one of the three grounds, namely, race, color, or former condition of slavery; thus by plain inference authorizing the States to disfranchise upon any other grounds than these three. This is upon the well known and universally recognized principle of law, expressio unius exclusio alterius. That which we have not prohibited to the States will be, by his form of amendment, added to the powers of the States, if, as he argues, they have it not now, and we will enable them to disfranchise for every conceivable cause except only his three. To say in the Constitution that the States shall not disfranchise for certain three specified causes is to say that the States may disfranchise for any or every other cause. We thus, as seems to me, make the Constitution worse, and hand over to the States powers of disfranchisement over which the United States will thus have parted with all control, and we will surrender to them complete and paramount sovereignty in a matter essential to the very being of the Government of the United States, resting as it does on the suffrages of the people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will not proceed further to discuss this proposed substitute submitted by myself, but will beg such attention to it as members may be inclined to give it before we come to the vote. I did want to call attention to the reasons why we should now submit some amendment securing to all the citizens of the Republic a just participation in the election of its rulers. I regret that my time will not at all permit me to do this in any adequate way. One of these reasons is to be found in the fact that the proposition in itself is so eminently right that it cannot fail to commend itself to the approval, it seems to me, of all right-minded men. Right, I mean—in regard to its relations to the Constitution. The framers of the Constitution thought that they had so made that instrument that they deemed the provisions in regard to who should elect the Federal rulers were substantially unalterable by the States. They also deemed this regulation of the franchise, by which the rulers and the laws of the Republic were to be made, one absolutely fundamental and going into the very essence of the Government, and one which could not be left to the States. This is not only one of those self-evident things about which there can be no debate, but it is so expressed, over and over, by those who made the Constitution. Mr. Hamilton says, (see Federalist, 403:)

"The definition of the right of suffrage is very justly regarded as a fundamental article of republican government. To have submitted this to the legislative discretion of the States would have been improper, because it is fundamental, and for the additional reason that it would have rendered too dependent on the State governments that branch of the Federal Government which ought to be dependent on the people alone."

He also says, speaking of the clause making electors the same as for the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures, that—

"It will be safe for the United States, because being fixed by the State constitutions it is not alterable by the State governments."

But in speaking of the declaration by Mr. Hamilton that the Constitution's definition of the qualifications of Federal electors was "not alterable by the State governments," Mr. Story says (1 Story on Constitution, section 586) "the provision has not in fact, and may not have, all the security against alteration so confidently affirmed." Thus it is seen, first, that the makers of the Constitution did regard this power of defining the qualifications of Federal electors fundamental, and one which the Convention could not properly leave to the States; second, that they thought that as they had arranged it in the Constitution it was substantially "unalterable by the States;" and third, that their expectations as to this last have not been historically realized. This vital power of Government has turned out, in practice, to be one not only "alterable by the States," but one which the States have so used as that in many of them the masses of the people who are loyal to their country and who have not gone into a stupendous rebellion for the overthrow of the Government, could and would to-day be wholly deprived of all powers of government by the assumption of the elective franchise, by those alone who did engage in such rebellion. So startling a fact must impel us, by its irresistible forces, to go at once to the remedying of so grave a defect in the Constitution as that one is which leaves to the States, only and supremely, the matter of making both the rulers, and through these, the laws of the Republic.

Now, I appeal to the gentlemen upon the other side of the House, and on all sides, if I am not arguing the merest truism when I say that that Government is not a Government at all that has not in itself power to control the question as to who shall make the rulers of that Government, and which, for that very reason, has not in itself the power of either making or executing its own laws. It is fundamental, essential, as Mr. Hamilton said it was. Therefore I appeal to the other side of the House when I say that the thing is, in the philosophy of government and in logic, right. And it is therefore an amendment, in so far as it makes a Federal definition of Federal electorship, required by the plainest and most elementary principles of every free Government.

But, sir, it is feared that this time for the submission of this amendment is inopportune, as there are Legislatures now in existence unfriendly to it, and which will defeat it. To that point I want to direct some remarks.

Sir, this proposition once submitted to the States by a two-thirds vote of the Congress is irrevocable except by a like two-thirds vote withdrawing it. If we now do our duty and submit it, it will remain submitted and pending as the proposal of the United States before the States until the States shall have acted upon and accepted it, or until it shall have been withdrawn by such two thirds vote of the Congress which could alone submit it. So that it will be competent for a State, after it has been once rejected by the State, to elect a new Legislature that shall adopt it. It tends continuously as proposed until it is so withdrawn or ratified. It seems plain that it must be so that a bare majority of the Congress cannot repeal what could be submitted by two thirds only. These submissions of amendments by resolution of two thirds of Congress are not in the nature of laws. They do not require or properly admit of being approved or disapproved by the President. So it is decided by the Supreme Court. (See Hollingsworth vs. Virginia, 3 Dal.) So it was held by Mr. Lincoln in a special message, and so is the now established doctrine of this Government. The fact is that this is an anomalous and peculiar exercise of their sovereignty by the people through their Representatives by which is submitted to themselves the question whether they desire to amend their Constitution in a prescribed respect and manner. When the people have thus once acquired jurisdiction of this great question regarding their own Government, that jurisdiction cannot be wrested from them by any mere law or joint resolution of Congress.

A law or joint resolution and the President's approval could not give the jurisdiction to them, and surely it cannot take it away. If the President could not be consulted as to the propriety of its being submitted, as we have seen he could not be, then is it possible that he can or must be consulted as to the propriety of taking it away? If he may not judge of the question of its being fit to be submitted, shall he be permitted to decide whether it was fit to be continued before them or ought to be repealed? But if it can be repealed in the ordinary way by law or joint resolution, then every such measure must be submitted to the President and approved by him, or else passed over his veto, and you have the absurdity of the President being so endowed with power touching the question of the amendment being fit to be continued with the States for their ratification as to be equal to one sixth of the entire Congress of the United States, and yet as to the question whether it should be submitted to them the day before, he has no power at all! This is plainly impossible. The truth is this provision of our Constitution is wholly unknown in other Governments—is to enable the sovereignty (the people) to get before it by a prescribed and peaceful method the question of altering the fundamental law of the Government, and to retain it and decide it, and thus to do under the peaceful forms of law what in other Governments are usually attained only through convulsions, revolutions, and wars. In its nature, therefore, it is the exercise by the supreme sovereignty of its great reserved powers; and from this supreme power no less a part of that national sovereignty can take away their right to consider, to deliberate, and to change their government than that one which alone could submit it.

And, again, Mr. Speaker, this view is enforced by the history of the Constitution's and its amendments' adoption, as is also the further proposition, that a rejection by a State is not conclusive, but such State may afterwards ratify. The Constitution itself provided in its last clause that it should be established between the States ratifying it when ratified by nine States.

It was submitted for ratification 17th September, 1787, and not ratified by Rhode Island until 29th May, 1790. Several of the State Legislatures who had either omitted or refused to ratify did ratify in subsequent years.

The first ten amendments were submitted 21st September, 1789, and not ratified until 15th December, 1791. The eleventh amendment was proposed on 5th March, 1794, and not ratified until 8th January, 1798, nearly four years after its submission. I have alluded to these facts both to prove and to impress the fact upon Congress, first, that now is the only time which can happen for years when Congress will have the two thirds (favorable to equal suffrage) which is required to submit this amendment; and second, that if we now do our duty and submit it to the people, then the people cannot be deprived of their right to consider and adopt the amendment until two thirds of the Congress shall wrest it from them, which cannot be at all.

There is another reason for submitting this amendment now which, though perhaps not precisely vital, is of exceeding force. It is that by our reconstruction laws—now accepted by the country as permanent—we have required the reconstructed States to submit to equal suffrage. We have done this mainly, I admit, because it was absolutely impossible to organize or guaranty republican governments down there at all unless we enabled the only loyal race there was there to vote. This fact, distinguishing the northern from the southern States, might, perhaps, justify us in requiring temporarily of them what we did not accept for ourselves. But if this be so, it can only be temporarily so; if, indeed, as we all devoutly hope, general loyalty is ultimately to come back to the South. We must, therefore, speedily either let the South disfranchise its colored races if they will, or else enfranchise our own, or else compel a submission by sister States to a rule of elective franchise pronounced by ourselves, dangerous and ruinous to us. To so compel them permanently to submit to what we refuse ourselves to accept is dishonor—a dishonor which will soon become revolting to the sense of fair play for which the American people are not undistinguished, and will shock the moral sense of mankind. This consideration has exceeding force in impelling us to at once make the law of enfranchisement national, universal.

But, Mr. Speaker, these reasons for the adoption of the amendment making the citizens equal in the enjoyment of the best right of citizenship, though each important in itself, become so trivial in contrast with the great reason for it that we hesitate at even naming them. The decisive argument for the amendment is that it is right. In determining whether it is right, what we have to consider and to debate and to adjudge are problems like these, and only problems like these; is the right to vote in a Government where votes make the Government's Constitution, laws, and rulers and unmake them, a right worth having for one's protection or elevation or self-defense? Or is it, on the other hand, better for all these that a privileged and proud and prejudiced class should do all the voting, and make and change and abolish all the constitutions and laws and rulers for me—me unconsulted but subject! The ballot being both the highest franchise and highest defense of a freeman, ought a free citizen who endures all the burdens of his Government be by it denied its highest means of defense merely because he is dark or light, poor or rich, high or lowly? Sir, I tell you that it is precisely true that only questions as plain, or rather absurd as these, are involved in determining the righteousness of this great measure. Others may if they will, but I cannot debate here. It may yet, in this nineteenth century of our Lord's grace, be a question in doubt and darkness whether Governments ought to be contrived and made on purpose so as to impose upon the poor and lowly its burdens equally with the high, and then deny to the former the chiefest means for the rescue of themselves and children from being the poor, lowly, and suffering.

It may be yet, in political science, one of its unsolved problems whether these poor do not need their Government's protection as much as do the opulent, the defenseless as much as do the powerful, those ready to perish as much as do the prosperous and mighty. It may be that the moral sciences which go into the structures of our Christian civilization have not yet found out whether it is magnanimous or pusillanimous, honor or dishonor, courage or cowardice, virtue or crime, for the powerful to so contrive their Government's structure as to put upon the weak and lowly the common burdens of their Government, and then to take from them and their children forever that supreme right of their citizenship which best secures their elevation, defense, and happiness. But, Mr. Speaker, if these be, indeed, yet questions in our moral or social or political or religious or legal science, or in any other science, which are unsolved, then its non-solution turns that science, where such questions are unknown things, into the monstrous, and we turn away from arguing them, not as we do when invited to prove that things equal to the same thing are equal to each other, with the sense that our reason has been insulted by the invitation, but we turn away from their argument with the feeling that our very instincts of honor and manhood have been outraged by the invitation to such debate.

Mr. Speaker, the argument which is to make it and to keep it forever part of the foundation law of the Republic, that all its virtuous children shall be to it equals, is the argument that this is right. In the light of such an argument all others of expediency or convenience pale and disappear. He knows little of the resistless currents of our national mind and heart who sees not that that which is a wrong to those vast masses of our countrymen who are most of all in need of their rights is to be swept away speedily and forever by the conscience of our people and age.

Mr. Speaker, I have alluded to the righteousness of this great measure rather for the purpose of saying that its ultimate adoption by the States is certain, than to show that it is right or that we ought to pass it through Congress. Sir, I not only do not doubt its ultimate adoption, but I also believe it will be speedily adopted. I know that good men hesitate and fear that this measure is premature and out of time; and that it will turn this Government's control over into the hands of its recent "public enemies." Mr. Speaker, I do not expect such results; but if they come from our advocacy of a measure so plainly just to all the people, then it will not be our wrong, but our opponent's, which shall bring the disaster. Besides, sir, the great party of liberty which has saved the Republic during its last decade, and which has also ruled it, cannot pause, if it would, here. If, indeed, ruin be ahead if we advance in the discharge of this high duty now, yet both ruin and dishonor lie in retreat. If it be so that part of that great army of liberty which has just rescued and redeemed the Government has turned craven and timid and will desert and retreat as its old comrades go forward in obedience to imperious duty, so, on the other hand, will other parts of it desert should we now hesitate or turn back in retreat. Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely plain that for the Republican party of America to-day the path of safety is the path of duty. All the instincts of our common loves of liberty, equality, and fair play; all the memories, histories, and glories of our great party of freedom; all the senses of magnanimity, of chivalry, justice, and merest decency, which make us revolt at robbing the lowly and their children of those rights and franchises of freemen to which they are entitled as much as we, and which they need far more than we, tell us where that path of duty is. Nay, nay, Mr. Speaker—God, who made of one blood all the nations—God who maketh it so that righteousness exalteth a nation—God who careth for his poor as he doth for his sparrow; God hath shown us which way goes the path of this nation's duty. To go in it is virtue, honor, and success. To go from it is crime, dishonor, and overwhelming disaster and defeat.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have no fears of disorganization and defeat. The Republican party was never more compact in its purposes, its organization, and all its moral forces than to-day. It means success. It will consummate speedily its sublime mission in making equal in the political rights of freemen all the citizens of the Republic whom it has just made equal in their civil privileges. Such are its purposes. Its ability to consummate them is seen in that near half a million of majority by which it has just selected the Chief Magistrate of the Republic. And, sir, I see in that magistrate's incoming administration many and high promises of prosperity and of good for the Republic; and as not the least of these I see assurance of the success of the constitutional amendment if such assurance were needed. That administration will not (as it ought not to) obtrude itself into the control of policies or questions which belong to the people. But, sir, he knows little of the forces which influence and guide and at times control the currents of the popular mind and heart who makes no account of the silent but potent moral power which even the known opinions and wishes of a great and revered and virtuous ruler have upon popular decisions in public affairs. Who can compute the force of the advice or even opinions of our early Presidents or of Mr. Lincoln, in popular decisions? And who affirms that these men improperly obtruded executive dictations into the affairs of the people? Or who will say that General Grant has not to-day upon the confidence, the gratitude, and the love of the people a hold beginning to be only second to Washington?

Sir, men tell us that this strange apparition which has stalked so suddenly—a colossus—into

HO. OF REPS.

Suffrage—Mr. Hamilton.

40TH CONG....3D SESS.

the arena of human affairs, and who challenges the wonder and admiration of mankind, is incomprehensible, delphic, unknown, silent. Sir, the patriot whose life has been on his country's side is ever comprehended by the people. The incoming President is not, perhaps, an orator "as Brutus is;" but he is to his countrymen not "The silent." He hath spoken to them in speech which they comprehend right well; speech where the sentences are wars, the words campaigns, the syllables battles, and the very letters victories; deeds which as they have fallen one by one from that strange hand of iron and of destiny have dropped into the story of his country, epochs, and of the world—history. It is these utterances of General Grant's life, all unambiguous, patriotic, illustrious, that make him not only not uncomprehended by his countrymen, but the most comprehended of his country, of his age, and, indeed, of his century. And it is these which have given to him that place in the confidence, the gratitude, and love of his people which will give to his administration moral forces with the people like those possessed by his first and most illustrious predecessor. These forces will be exercised, as I have said, in no other way than that expressly provided for by the Constitution, as recommendations for the consideration of Congress and the people who make the Congress, or else by those silent but sublime persuasions which the wishes and example and opinions of a good and wise ruler ever exert upon a people who regard him with admiration, confidence, and gratitude.

General Grant's earnest, cordial, and anxious support of an amendment which shall secure to all the virtuous citizens of the Republic equality in all the benefits of their Government, including the elective franchise, is open, avowed, and unambiguous; and the constitutional amendment will have the moral sanction and support of his administration in so far as such support would be proper.

Mr. Speaker, the success of the amendment is not therefore in doubt. Once submitted this word of a great people, uttered in accord with the attributes of God, will be like His word—one that cannot return unto us void, but "will accomplish that whereunto it was sent." Because the measure is in itself intrinsically and evidently just, all the attributes and energies of good men throughout the world will fight on its side; because it is just the very elements and forces of our common Christianity and civilization will fight on its side; because it is just all that is true and good in the science and the literature of our age will fight for it. And, sir, if I be not mistaken in deeming the measure just, then I am not irreverent in saying that the attributes of God will fight on its side.

Here, sir, I leave the debate, confident that by the sublime fiat of the people it shall soon be enacted into unchangeable and organic law of the Republic that all her children who are equal in their virtue and fealty shall be equals also in their country's protection and care, and equals in their powers for its government and preservation.

SPEECH OF HON. C. M. HAMILTON, OF FLORIDA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 29, 1869,

On the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, in the performance of a pleasing duty it was my fortune to present to this House, in July last, a memorial from the constitutional convention of Florida, praying Congress to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States establishing equal and uniform suffrage in all the States of the Union. That memorial was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I shall be more than gratified if it was at all instrumental in urging, less encouraging, that distinguished committee to report the amendment, having for its aim the accomplishment of that high object which was so powerfully sustained by its distinguished chairman, the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] in a speech as remarkable for its convincing argument, comprehension, and ability, as for its eloquent breathings of devotion to the rights of man.

I have listened with peculiar gratification and attention to the many able, earnest speeches in support of and against this great measure, and although enough has been said already to convince the most opposite mind of its justice, wisdom, and necessity, and impel the most obdurate heart to its cordial support, I beg leave to add my feeble voice in furtherance of this noble movement in the cause, not only of humanity, but also of human administration and republican government. The law, the authority under the Constitution, the duty and expediency upon which this suffrage amendment finds its solid support, has been so thoroughly and ably presented—and I gladly leave that phase of the question to wiser heads—that it will be my endeavor, briefly and imperfectly as I shall, to present the justice, right, necessity, and obligation upon which it finds no less substantial foundation.

Mr. Speaker, it is the fortune of the American people to live under a government exclusively, entirely, resting upon and administered by their own free will. To execute that will, to secure its free expression by the citizen, to insure the personal security of the individual and the safety of his possessions and to protect his rights and immunities is the great object of this Government; and because of these, its grand purposes, it is happily denominated a "republican form of government." And to perpetuate this form of government, "we, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity," do make it solemnly obligatory upon the United States, the General Government, the Congress, "to guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government," and to "the citizens of each State all privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States."

It is unnecessary to ask if all the requirements of the Government have been observed, all the obligations of the nation adhered to, all the demands of the people answered, all their rights respected, and all their liberties, privileges, and immunities guaranteed to them. Has the nation been just to itself; has the Government been true to the principles of its creation; have the States conformed their legislation to the expressed will of "we, the people of the United States," in securing the personal rights and liberties of all "citizens of the United States" and of every integral portion of our population? We are astounded by the answer that there are upward of two hundred thousand of our fellow-American citizens whose right of suffrage has been not only ignored, but denied them. No, not denied—for that would suppose an option of a gift on the part of the Legislature, State or national—but deprived them; an indication of something unjustly, illegally withheld, which I mean to convey by the assertion that the right of suffrage is inherent, inalienable, as far as human government is concerned, and by easy inference is so declared to be by the Declaration of Independence.

The fathers of our Republic, speaking through that sacred oracle of our liberty, assert, and none are so bold to deny it, that "we hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness are here made the three grand divisions of inalienable human rights or the purposes of man's temporal existence. The object of civil government being to secure and maintain these inalienable endowments of the Creator to man, is it not apparent that the right of suffrage, the right to a voice in the government by which almost every human act is regulated, closely underlies these great objects of our creation? Without the elective franchise; without a voice in the making of laws by which he is controlled and to which he is amenable; without an option as to who shall administer them or how they shall be administered, what insurance has a man of his life, what security for his liberties, what protection in his pursuit of happiness? If this seems strongly drawn it is only because we live in an enlightened Christian age and country, and are a moral, generous people.

But that does not alter the facts or the argument. And here, may I ask, what is the best policy in political affairs as well as in all others? Honesty all would answer. Yet when it comes to the rub and evil looks threatening we are often ready to doubt the universal application of the maxim that "honesty is the best policy;" and many who admit its correctness in theory do not always have the courage to practice it in trying circumstances. Such was the case with the men who nominated General Grant and our distinguished Speaker. The men of that convention, unless they would not see, could not fail to see an attempted mixture of truth and error in the second resolution of their platform. They could not say that "the guarantee by Congress of equal suffrage to all men is demanded by every consideration of" right and duty as well as of "public safety, of gratitude, and of justice." They could not admit Congress had the same right to regulate suffrage in one State as it had in another. It is true that in reconstructing the rebel States Congress was bound to see to it that it was done according to the principles of republican government, and done at the time they were being organized and not afterward. And further, Congress could do no more or less than to act according to its own convictions of what was essential to republican government. When the question is raised as to the anti-republican character of any State government Congress is bound to take up the question and decide it according to its own judgment.

According to a rigid interpretation of our present Constitution—the clause which enjoins the guarantee of a republican form of government—members could not be admitted to seats here from some of the States, States in which a large class of citizens are deprived of the elective franchise, because I hold it to be an essential principle of republican government that representative officers "shall be freely chosen by the people from among themselves." And where numerous citizens are disfranchised, as in Maryland, Kentucky, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, it is not the people but a class who chooses, an aristocracy, or anything you may choose to call it. The rebellion has stirred up reflection; it has led to an examination of the old landmarks and opened a road to reformation. The Convention of 1787, alarmed by threatened evil, abandoned the old maxim that "honesty is the best policy" and continued the African slave trade for twenty years, when they could have made it piracy then as well as at the end of that time. So now, while we are advancing in reformation and undergoing reconstruction, while the public mind is in a condition to receive new thoughts, may be, and wholesome impressions and changes, in this age of gigantic advancement, which it may not be in when the public pulse becomes settled after the "peaceful" incoming administration, let us examine with caution and candor the ground we build on; let us violate no feature of republicanism, no principle of equal justice to all men. This is the only safe foundation for human governments.

Equality of the States, their "equal footing" in their relations to the General Government, must also be maintained. The republican character of each State ought now to pass under the scrutiny of the people of the United States. By their Constitution they have bound themselves to guaranty to the people of each State a republican form of government; and I doubt not, Mr. Speaker, that when this amendment is presented to them for their ratification they will, in passing upon it, accept it as coming from the hands of those who went forth from them, (but to return no more,) to vindicate the cause of freedom; accept it as something in return for their unutterable, patriotic sacrifices. And they will tell the honorable gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] that "the argument that the Federal Government, the people, and all the States have acquiesced so long in the exercise of this power by the several States" (of depriving a portion of their fellow-citizens of their immunities) "is not conclusive." They will tell him that because past generations have done wrong it is no excuse for them to do so; or that because their fathers powdered their hair, wore queues, and ruffled bosoms it is not a "conclusive argument," that the fourth generation should do so. The great national question which presents itself for settlement is, What is a republican form of government? This has been so ably answered by eminent gentlemen who have preceded me that it will be tedious to hear the few observations I may make. The antecedents of the Democratic party, extending back for years, are such as to unfit it as a party to come to a proper judgment. The accumulated voice of the whole people must decide. Their sentiments in the present condition of things must be developed through the Republican party.

The gentleman from Massachusetts says that the Republican party has a vast deal yet to accomplish, and is responsible for what this Congress and the next administration do. I was glad to hear so influential a member of the party touch upon this point, for it seems to me it has not yet settled itself upon a solid, determined basis, notwithstanding the rapid advances it has made in brushing away the old cobwebs of aristocracy, and in securing to a great extent the civil and political rights of the humblest of our people. If I may be allowed to say it, and I do not utter it in a spirit of criticism either specially or generally, had that great party, I mean as a mass, stood firmly up to that exalted position in which it found itself at the close of the war, without wavering, halting, or undue leniency to the enemies of the country which its valor and patriotism alone saved, and turned half as deaf an ear or hard a heart to those who croaked about tyranny and oppression were dumb to reason and flint to magnanimity, reconstruction would have been an easy task compared with the herculean labor it has been, though so nobly performed, and the Republican party would have increased by thousands.

But to my question. Is the theory of human rights well understood even at the present day? Not many years since the editor of the New York Herald traveled over bog and quagmire, sea and flood, and into the dark caverns and caves of our ocean of literature, and into the myths and depths of ancient history, to discover what our fathers meant when they declared that all men were equal, free, and independent, and endowed by their Creator—mark, endowed by their Creator—with certain inalienable rights, &c. That editor held and taught, and was followed by a great majority of his party, that common men who had not the ability and opportunity to dive into the wells of knowledge and reach back into the mysteries of the history of the race were not competent to form a correct sense as to the meaning of the proposition, or to whom it applied, to all men or to only a part. The proposition is self-evident, and so say our fathers. It was just as true before it saw the light of liberty blazing through the fires of successful revolution on independence day as it was then, or is now, and is just as intelligible to the humblest individual as it is to the most exalted, and perhaps more so. Admit the equality of men in natural rights, and you confess their equality in all other rights. If all men have equal rights without regard to classification, or equal natural rights, as they are called, does it not follow that they must have the equal right to the means of protecting these rights, which is termed a political right—the ballot, which is the "palladium of our rights and liberties," as is universally conceded?

The gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] with fervent eloquence, says, and I agree with him in the main:

"Sir, the powers and rights and liberties of the States and people do not come down from Congress or the Federal Government. There are some powers with which Congress has not been intrusted. Congress cannot determine just how much of liberty the people shall enjoy, just how they shall speak and move and breathe. All the powers of the Federal Government come up from the States and people, and it never had and it never can have the rightful authority to exercise any power not granted in and by the Constitution. The exercise of any other is rank usurpation."

Here in this country, thank Heaven, the people are sovereign, and "vox populi" is the law of the land. Government is the creature of the people. Constitutions, powers, limitations, and rights "do not come down from Congress, the General Government," or the States, but come down from the people. Therefore, neither Legislatures, nor States, nor Congress, nor the United States can "determine just how much of liberty the people shall enjoy," nor discriminate as to the equal possession of equal rights by men. "The servant is not above his master," nor the creature greater than the creator. Can men, equal men, "endowed by their Creator with equal inalienable rights," say one to another, "thus far shalt thou go and no further," and go beyond himself; or, "This only thou shalt possess," and claim more for himself?

Here the unreasonable reasoning of some gentlemen makes itself apparent. As if I should say to my neighbor citizen, "Our rights are equal and stand upon the same foundation, but you have not the same right to the means of protecting yours." Here, I take it, is also shown the unsoundness of the theory that would make suffrage a privilege instead of a right. John Bright, of England, makes it a right, not merely a privilege. "If a privilege," asks John Hamilton, of Pennsylvania, "by whom granted or conferred? By one of superior to one of inferior rights? If a right, who would venture to withhold it but He that conferred, even the Creator, who has 'endowed all men' equally 'with certain inalienable rights?' To speak of it as a privilege supposes at once inequality of rights." Again he says, and he has bestowed upon the subject of human rights an abundance of thought:

"The right to vote is included in and growing out of equality of other rights; equality of one class of rights supposes equality of all others; otherwise, at what point will inequality begin? The Creator, who has the only right to make a difference, has not made it. For one class to assume superiority of rights leads to endless confusion of ideas. Human constitutions are not the fountain-head of law. The harmony, the truth of things, as it comes from the Divine head, the only sovereign law-giver, is law."

Mr. Hamilton says, and I ask to quote him a little further:

"Government is an ordinance of God. The church, the family, and the State organizations are instruments in the hands of the Divine head for governing the world and building up the kingdom of Christ. No authority in church or State or family, can of right assume powers not delegated by the Creator and head of all things. The people are to 'submit to the powers that be,' to honor the king, and to be in subjection to governors and magistrates as unto those who are sent by Him 'for the punishment of them that do evil and a praise to them that do well,' as to ministers of God assuming no powers but such as are delegated—dealing out justice to all without partiality, as to children of one common parent. Now, if we have established the doctrine of equal rights and equal protection for all men, what are the obligations of Governments to secure these rights and this protection to all citizens or subjects; and what the advantages of a faithful guarantee of the blessings of liberty to all men? Both are greater than we are apt to believe. While it remains a law of Divine economy, 'that righteousness exalteth a nation and sin is a reproach to any people,' both the advantages and the obligations will be very great; and blessed is that people whose God is the Lord."

Grotius assures us that "God approved and ratified the salutary constitutions of government made by men;" and Demosthenes declares that—

"The design and object of laws is to ascertain what is just, honorable, and expedient; and when that is discovered it is proclaimed as a general ordinance, equal and impartial to all."

Algernon Sidney maintains that—

"The Israelites, Spartans, and Romans"—

And, of course, Americans also—

"who framed their Governments according to their own will, did not do it by any peculiar privilege, but by a universal right conferred upon them by God and nature. They were made of no better clay than others; they had no right that does not as well belong to other nations. That is to say, the constitution of every Government is referred to those who are concerned in it, and no other has anything to do with it. 'The welfare of the people is the supreme law.'"

Allow me one other reference. The celebrated Beccaria writes that—

"In every human society there is an effort continually tending to confer on one part the height of power and happiness, and to reduce the other to the extreme of weakness and misery. The intent of good laws is to oppose this effort, and to diffuse their influence universally and equally. In a free State every man, who is supposed a free agent, ought to be concerned in his own Government; therefore the legislative power should reside in the whole body of the people. The political liberty of the citizen is a tranquillity of mind, arising from the opinion each person has of his safety. In order to have this liberty, it is requisite the Government be so constituted as that one man need not be afraid of another. The enjoyment of liberty, and even its support and preservation, consists in every man's being allowed to speak his thoughts and lay open his sentiments."

And I may add, in every citizen's possessing the highest, most sacred right of manhood-suffrage, which by this amendment to the Constitution we hope to secure to him. Mr. Speaker, do I make too broad an assertion in saying that the very fundamental basis of this Government is suffrage, the ballot, the means by which the people manifest and execute their will? Laws are a dead letter without the means to execute them; the will of the people would be worthless without the means to express it. The will of the people recently expressed through their great charter, fourteenth article, first paragraph, is as follows:

"All persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the States in which they reside."

Congress is the guardian of the Constitution; it is sworn to see that its provisions are observed both by the States and by the United States; that no State encroaches upon the rights of that portion of the people residing within the borders of a State; it is the guardian of the rights and liberties of the entire people of the United States. Mr. Speaker, I am not one of those who esteem the Constitution as above the nation. I was not one of those who, from fear of violating the Constitution to prevent it, would have permitted treason to stamp it under rebellion's foot while traitors and rebels held their bloody carnival all over the land. I speak with all deference of that sacred and inspired instrument; but I ask, in all seriousness, what would the Constitution be worth without this Government? Not the parchment on which it is written. I think we have heard Thaddeus Stevens, whose venerable presence in this chamber imparted a solenmity to its atmosphere, say that "The Constitution was made for the Government, not the Government for the Constitution."

Did the generation made illustrious by the possession of Washington, Madison, Hamilton and Jefferson, intend by this emanation of their wisdom to bind succeeding generations hand and foot? They well knew that the ever-changing necessities of a great people could not be anticipated, and therefore we find in our Magna Charta the following thoughtful provision, upon which I so confidently rely for this necessary amendment:

"ARTICLE V.—The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution."

Deeming it to be demanded by that inexorable master, necessity, we propose it to the people, and our work is done. To those who claim that this is an encroachment on the States, I would say that the States are independent only to such extent as the Union is independent; and I trust that such evidences will be made to appear upon State and Federal Constitutions, "in proof as clear as holy writ," as do the million untimely graves which furrow all the South, of the dangerous dogma of State's rights, and the atonement for the deprivation of the rights by Himself endowed of any of God's children.

The theory of centralization, or the polity advocated by Alexander Hamilton at the formation of the Government, and which subjected him to the unjust criticisms of the statesmen of that age, of establishing a strong central government as the best means to secure the liberties, the safety, and the unity of the people, the States, and the country, is seen no longer to be, if ever, a dangerous one. The theory of arbitrary States rights in a national government, of which those States constitute not a distinct but an integral party, so long and so warmly advocated by the Democratic party, especially in the South, has indeed proved a dangerous one—almost fatal to our national existence, upon which hinges the future freedom, glory, strength, and prosperity of all the States, and the high destiny of the Union.

Let us heed the lessons taught by the recent past, and recognize the equal manhood of all "created in the image of God." All men were brought into existence by the same common Creator, all placed upon the same common footing, and all are alike responsible to divine laws and to human government, and all should possess the same mutual advantages to meet the same common obligations. And must we even go to the Constitution of the United States or to those of the States for the authority to incorporate the just provisions of this amendment into the fundamental law of the land? May we not, should we not, rather, go to that source whence constitutions come and who create States—the people? The successful accomplishment of that gigantic end, the establishment of universal suffrage in the reconstructed States, and the triumphant vindication of its justice and wisdom by the freedmen whom it raised to full citizenship from a condition worse than vassalage, should be a most powerful incentive to the spreading of this benign blessing over all the land.

Our ears are still ringing with the cry from the North and from the South, from that party which has opposed, still opposes, every step of progress taken by the Republican party toward the high destiny of the Union, that "universal suffrage was forced upon the South." I acknowledge the fact, and I shall never rest, God helping me, until it is forced upon the North in the same way! Yes, sir, universal suffrage was forced upon the South; forced by justice, right, necessity, duty; forced by justice to that generous, loyal, noble, patriotic people, black though they be, who during the darkest days of the rebellion never faltered in their devotion to the Union—two hundred thousand of whom followed the flag of our country, though it was to them an emblem of wrong and oppression, through the fires of a hundred battles to protect it; who, with cautious care, led thousands of the nation's soldiers from the death-pens of rebel captivity to freedom and gladness beyond, themselves remaining in bondage and sorrow until the fulfillment of their Christian hope of God's blessing of liberty to them; forced by right to the national freedmen, Americans born upon our soil, citizens of a country they helped to save, brothers in the family of mankind, equals in the brotherhood of men; forced by necessity to save the nation from a second rebellion more wanton than the first, to secure and garner up the results of the victory of the sword, to restore and heal the shattered fabric of the Union, to protect the loyal whites of the South, to erect on the ruins of slavery the institutions of freedom; forced by duty to God. I dared to hope, though still distrustful, that while all around is new we would here begin anew for the future, guided by the lessons taught by the experience of the past, securely garnering the priceless harvest of the war, "with charity for all, with malice toward none," sacredly recognizing the equality of men, the manhood of the negro, their citizenship, and consequent right of suffrage. A celebrated poet has written, that—

"Man can no more exclude war than he can Exclude sorrow; for both are conditions of man
And agents of God. Truth's supreme revelations
Come in sorrow to men, and in war come to nations.
Then blow, blow the clarion, and let the war roll,
Strike steel upon steel and strike soul upon soul,
If in striking we kindle keen flash and bright
From the manhood in man, stricken thus into light."

If, as a chastisement of our too self-reliant people, and to purge this nation of the foul stain of slavery, the Almighty snatched from every home in the land the pride of each individual household, man's sorrow, and caused to flow through all our borders the desolating river of war, the nation's woe, it were rebellion still not to accept the stern sequel of events and turn ourselves to the atonement of our sins of omission as men and of commission as a nation. If, as the logical result of the war—a nation's judiciary—the manhood of a whole race has been stricken thus into light, how dare we appeal from this decision of the god of battles, the judgment of Heaven? If the manhood of the slave is a result of the war, is not his citizenship the result of his manhood and his franchise the natural sequence of his citizenship? All these successive conditions are as naturally the corollary of the first—manhood, as that an ocean-emptying stream flows from some higher fountain. Gentlemen complain of this ordering of events, and hope against the hopelessness of a change. As well attempt to dam the swelling flood, "the higher the dam the higher the tide; it will overflow or break through." It is done, inexorably accomplished, and it were unwise, nay criminal, to permit our passions and prejudices to sweep away the senses of our reason, or hesitate to conform ourselves to the uncompromising condition of things.

Is it not just and consistent that universal suffrage and equal rights in a republican government should march hand in hand with universal manhood and equal existence? Dare we appeal longer from the will of the nation? Republicanism is in the ascendancy; it has regenerated and recreated the South; it has raised aloft from the decrepid carcass of slavery and darkness to the high Olympus of a full citizenship of the proudest country on the face of the globe a race whom oppression and superstition bound down for ages under the ægis of the Democratic party, and it will spread its benign, enlightening, Christianizing influence to the furthest ends of the globe, until all men shall freely and fully possess and as freely and fully enjoy the inalienable endowments of Heaven.

Constitutional Amendment.

REMARKS OF HON. J. M. BROOMALL,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 30, 1869,

On the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, in the debate upon a bill introduced by myself at the last session of Congress, providing for universal suffrage, I gave my views at length upon that subject. Those views may be stated in short thus: every person owing allegiance to the Government and not under the legal control of another should have an equal voice in making and administering the laws, unless debarred for violating those laws; and in this I make no distinction of wealth, intelligence, race, family, or sex. If just government is founded upon the consent of the governed, and if the established mode of consent is through the ballot-box, then those who are denied the right of suffrage can in no sense be held as consenting, and the Government which withholds that right is as to those from whom it is withheld no just Government.

The proposition before the House is so to change the Constitution of the United States that no State shall hereafter discriminate among citizens of the United States with respect to the right of suffrage on account of family or race. This, though not going to the extent which I desire, is a great stride in the right direction, and therefore it commands my most hearty support.

It is no argument against inserting this provision in the Constitution that we have already the power to effect the same thing by legislation. Laws may be repealed, and it is not advisable that so important a principle of republican government should be left to the caprices of party. Its proper place is in the organic law.

A bill providing for impartial suffrage in the same particulars has been reported from the same committee and is now pending before the House. It is alleged that there is inconsistency in the same Congress proposing the amendment and passing the bill, both having the same object. This is a mistake, because, first, the bill is intended to produce immediately the same result which it may require the amendment several years to accomplish; and second, it is eminently right and proper that all those who are intended to be affected by the amendment should have an equal voice in its adoption or rejection. I shall therefore support the bill, as well as the proposed amendment.

It is interesting and instructive to trace the progress of the great party which is carrying into practical operation the cherished dreams of our fathers, step by step, toward the consummation of its holy purposes. It began less than fifteen years ago, by denying the right of slaveholders to carry their human chattels into the Territories against the will of a majority of the occupants. In 1860 it declared not that slavery was illegal, but that it could only exist by virtue of State laws and within the States whose laws recognized it.

Then came the rebellion; and it is humiliating to remember that in its early stages black men who had deserted their rebel masters in order not to be compelled to abet treason, and had sought the Federal camps to tender their feeble aid to the Government to which they owed so little, were arrested by men wearing the uniform of the nation and sent back to their masters to be scourged. But this could not long continue; and the next step, treating these poor fugitives still as chattels, confiscated them as contraband of war and employed them in menial services about the camps.

40TH CONG...3D SESS.

Affairs in the South—Mr. Newsham.

HO. OF REPS.

Next came the proclamation of emancipation, which was worthy of him who issued it, and this is saying much, and which shocked the nerves of gentlemen of nice conservative sensibilities by declaring all slaves within the rebel lines free. Soon followed the amendment to the Constitution by virtue of which the footprint of no slave shall ever again be found upon American soil. About this time it was suddenly discovered that the negro could fight, and the uniform of the nation was placed upon his limbs and its arms in his hands. In the fore-front of the battle circumstances gave him the courage of desperation. He knew that for him capture was death, and he did fight, let the history of the country tell how gallantly. It was not to be wondered at that at times he refused the quarter which he knew he never could receive. To have done otherwise would have proved him either more or less than human.

The arming of the blacks tolled the knell of the rebellion, and in 1865 its last armed forces surrendered. Then came a period fraught with more danger to the cause of human progress than any since the firing upon Fort Sumter. A generous victor might have been lulled into false security by a show of submission and repentance, and the rebels might have gained by political strategy all they had lost in war except their slaves, and these they might have put under an iron rule compared with which enslavement would have been a mercy, but an accidental and faithless Executive became an unconscious instrument of good. That man, the living exemplification of the declaration that God hardened the heart of Pharaoh, stimulated the conquered rebels imperiously to demand rights instead of graciously accepting favors. The result was the reconstruction of the South upon the basis of impartial suffrage. Thus far is written history. Frequently in the progress of those great events, the patriot heart despaired, and cried out, "How long, Oh, how long!" But in all that time there was taken not a step backward, and we shall never know that any advance was delayed beyond the period when it could be safely made.

The measure now before the House is necessary to the complete fulfilment of what has gone before it. To hesitate now is to put in peril all we have gained. Let this, too, pass into history as an accomplished fact. Let it be followed, in due course of time, by the last crowning act of the series—an amendment to the Constitution securing to all citizens of full age, without regard to sex, an equal voice in making and administering the laws under which they live, to be forfeited only for crime. Then the great mission of the party in power will be fulfilled; then will have been demonstrated the capacity of man for self-government; then a just nation, founded upon the full and free consent of its citizens, will be no longer a dream of the optimist.

Affairs in the South.

REMARKS OF HON. J. P. NEWSHAM,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 2, 1869,

On the condition of affairs in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. NEWSHAM. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully beg to lay before this House, in as terse a manner as the blunt powers of my speech will permit, the condition of things in the State I have the honor in part to represent. I wish the long-stilled voice of Louisiana to commingle with the more eloquent voices of her sister States in our national Halls of representation. Through conversations with northern gentlemen, Representatives upon this floor, and from citizens visiting the capital since my arrival here, I have gathered the impression that the exact status of the condition of affairs in the South is not understood by the northern people. An erroneous impression seems to prevail. It is generally believed that all or many of the riots, murders, and massacres are caused by a war of races; and in the existence of such a war many seem firmly to believe. This is an error. No such war ravages there. There is no objection on the part of the rebels of my State to the color or smell of the negro, so far as I have been able to ascertain; and I take this means, by placing myself upon the record, to disabuse the northern mind from this fallacious opinion.

The fundamental, original cause of all the bloodshed, murders, massacres, violence, fraud, and intimidation which have blackened the fame of the South, and which will forever blur the page of Louisiana's history, may be attributed and traced to the following causes: loyalty to the General Government; an unflinching attachment to the Union of these States during the dark and doubtful days of the Republic. The fact of once having served in the Federal Army has heretofore been sufficient reason, in the estimation of the people of my State, to incite riot and commit murder. The cause of all our trouble South has been in the hatred and bitter animosity of the people of Louisiana against anything like loyalty, against the policy of Congress, and against everything which was calculated to affect the perpetuity of the Union of these States. The holding and honest expression of Republican sentiments and principles has been and continues to be sufficient cause to murder the man who dares express them. The war is because of opinion's sake. It is a war of the rebel against the loyalist. Combinations are perfected and wield their influence against every man who holds Republican sentiments, no matter what may be the color of the Republican's skin, or occupation. The interdiction is hurled against the lawyer, the artisan, and the humble tiller of the soil. The cry is, "Drive them out!" "Send them to their mud-sill homes!" The classic soil of the South needs them not.

Gentlemen protected by the operation of our constitutional guarantees in security of life, liberty, and property are not expected to nor cannot appreciate the condition of things in Louisiana. But, gentlemen, facts are stubborn things; and in order that I may prove the position assumed I shall endeavor to adduce a few facts. Just prior to the late election in the parish of Bossier, in the fourth Representative district of Louisiana, one hundred and sixty-two men, all Republicans, were murdered without provocation for opinion's sake. In the parish of Caddo, in the same district and State, the only man who voted the Republican ticket was murdered the night of the day he polled his vote. No other cause was alleged in extenuation of this than that he voted the Republican ticket. George W. Smith, an honorable man and a member of the Texas constitutional convention, was assaulted by an armed mob in Jefferson City, in Davis county, Texas, immediately adjoining the parish of Caddo, Louisiana, who, in defending himself, wounded two of his assailants; after which he ran for his life, to save which he surrendered to the military authorities, and was committed to jail for safe keeping. The next night a disguised band of armed Ku Klux passed or bought the guard, who did not fire. The Ku Klux broke down the jail door and fired sixty bullets through the body of the unfortunate man, besides killing two freedmen.

What, you ask, was the cause of this tardily, cowardly, inhuman conduct? Why, the murdered man had been an officer in the Federal Army, had served with distinction in a New York regiment, and was a man without reproach. Shall I refer you to jails broken open, of persons adjudged guilty being by mob force liberated, as was done in the city of Jefferson in my own district? Shall I prove these utterances by telling you of men found dead in the roads, shot and horribly mangled; of laborers discharged without pay; of public notices to the rebel planters of the State notifying them not to employ the parties named, to lease them no land, without the reservation of the right to eject them without cause unless they voted the Democratic ticket; refer you to the report, made public, of the election committee of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, wherein eighteen hundred murders are reported, and each case proven, in the period of less than one year; or to the report of General Hatch, while in New Orleans; or to that of General Reynolds, of Texas, so lately laid upon the desks of members of this House?

In the parish of St. Landry, represented by my honorable colleague, I am informed two hundred men, all Republicans, were murdered in one month, in September. Men are compelled in that parish to wear red tape upon their arms, as a sign of rebel Democracy, to secure the guarantees of the Constitution. The mark is an evidence that they have joined the Democracy and their only security for life, liberty, and locomotion. The atrocious murders in cold blood of Colonel Pope and Judge Chase of that parish by the Democratic bandits of Louisiana, and the failure under the laws of the State and nation to bring the murderers to trial, presents a glimmering view of the state of republican liberty in Louisiana. Shall I refer you, to substantiate these utterances, to printing offices mobbed and the material thereof thrown into the river or otherwise destroyed? Or will you demand of me copies of papers in evidence to prove that nothing was therein written but a plain and, too often, a too mild statement of facts committed; that newspapers devoted to the diffusion of Republican principles were mobbed and yet not entirely destroyed, while a Ku Klux note, written in blood, is left at a man's door as a mild hint to the editor and proprietor that his life is in danger, ordering him to leave his home and property, and that the avenger is upon his track?

If the action of the Democracy, in this destruction of the bulwarks of civil liberty, was caused by passion or incited altogether because of gunpowder and whisky, or in a fit of frenzy; if it was committed by a class of men desperate in their character, unsupported and unbacked by the leaders of the best society, there might be some extenuating circumstances. I submit it to this House, in all candor, if a lawless ruffian practicing his barbarities and horrid murders could exist in any community any length of time unless he was supported in his atrocities by the community wherein he lived? The very fact that assaults are made upon the person and property of loyalists South; that notices written in blood are left in a man's pathway or sent to him through the mail; that coffins, upon whose lids the cross-bones and skull are laid, are left at a man's door; that newspapers are not at first entirely destroyed, but which, after the warning delivered, are doomed upon the second assault; that loyal men are subject to these indignities—evinces a determination upon the part of the southern rebels to enforce their threats, and that the perpetrators are protected and encouraged by the community in which they live.

I charge here that no cause has been given by the loyal people of my State to incite upon the part of their rebel neighbors such bitter animosity and unrelenting cruelty. The scalawag and the carpet-bagger, so termed, have brought this upon themselves, because they loved their whole country and the Union of these States, because when the Republic was bleeding at every pore, when she was mangled and weak, they showed themselves to be patriots and dared to be men. For this in the land they fought to save, wherein they have so long and so patiently suffered, they are at present, under a republican form of government established by this Congress, to endure tenfold what I am able to tell you.

I now appeal to your own memories, to the written history of the last two years, to support me in the statement that never have any people shown more magnanimity under the like cause for retribution than have the Republican party in the entire South in the framing of their new State constitutions under the wide margin allowed by the reconstruction acts of Congress. The liberality shown to their old oppressors, the entire forgetfulness of the past horrors they had from the nature of things to endure, stamps the course of the southern blacks as the most sublime and God-like course of any people under the sun. For this sublimity of forgiveness, for this almost divine magnanimity, they have been shot down and murdered as if they were swine in the butcher's pen—simply because they were true to the country and party who had given them their liberties and which afterward dared to give them citizenship. I am not ignorant of the fact that much of the success of the Republican party of the North in the late elections may be attributed to the mild and conciliatory policy adopted by the Republican party of the South in the reconstruction policy as pursued by them. What I complain of is that this success should have been purchased at such a fearful cost of life and security; that the people of the North should so superficially understand the exact status of affairs in the South; that the bleeding, devastated, wasted South should have the other burden, defeat, added to the catalogue of her sufferings; that loyal men of the South were made to bleed and die to secure success to the happy, prosperous, and peaceful North, East, and West.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that a share in the enjoyment of the general benefits resulting to the country, secured by the election of General Grant to the highest office within the gift of the American people, will accrue to Louisiana and to the people of the whole South; and Louisiana congratulates the whole American people upon the favorable auspices indicated by the late triumph of the Republican party. General Grant may depend upon the warm support and best wishes of the Republican party of Louisiana. Never did an Executive of the United States, since the first inauguration of Washington, enter upon his troublous voyage with a more thorough love of the American people than will General Grant after the 4th of March next.

Louisiana has an approximation majority of thirty thousand registered Republican voters. In the last election the Republican party was defeated by over thirty thousand majority in that State. The loyal men of Louisiana did not dare to vote. However dear to the heart of the liberated slave the high privilege of the American ballot may be—and I assure you no people more thoroughly appreciate its value—his love of life is equal to that of other men. The cries of his infant child commingled with the sobs of the wife and mother, when the Republican father of Louisiana went to vote at election, the affections stirred by this wailing may have lost the State to the Republicans, but it saved many a loyal life. The loyal men of Louisiana have lived long in hope, and patiently waited in poverty and hunger, without pay and clothing, for the coming day.

To-morrow, next day, or after the 4th of March next, the result of an election in Louisiana would be similar in bloodshed, murder, and terror to the one so lately made a monument to perpetuate the crime, folly, and madness of the unrepentant rebels. Louisiana has never known the boon of the privilege of a fair election. A republican form of government as contemplated by the language of the Constitution does not exist in Louisiana. The right of the people to peaceably assemble is denied. The security of life, liberty, and property are privileges almost unknown to loyal men. Many a martyr has sacrificed his life on the bleeding altar of liberty in Louisiana, and many another man is bound for

"The undiscovered country, from whose bourn No traveler returns."

because of his attachment to the principles of liberty and the equal rights of all men. The revolution in the South is not over. It is not dead, but only sleeping. It is coiled like a snake; its fangs are deadly poison—beware its sting! It is the boast of the South to-day that they are better-armed than in 1861. By sending the late election back to the people of Louisiana you inaugurate another reign of terror, commence again the destruction of newspapers, incite wholesale murders and massacres, and you will, phoenix-like, resurrect a new State Government out of and over the smoldering and putrid mass to be created by the military power. Forty thousand military and a million of money will be inadequate to secure the untrammelled expression of the people's will in Louisiana, and God only knows how many lives will pay the rest of the debt of affairs.

The rebel of the South to-day stands appalled at the verdict of the American people expressed by the election of General Grant. Their most cherished hopes have been ruthlessly scattered and cast to the ground. They know not which way to look for succor. They grope like blind men beneath the rays of the meridian sun. At present they are quiet. Do not trust it too confidently; it is the baffled effort of the wounded lion, whose rage is confined to his breast; it will break forth with a mighty rage, and its roar may make you tremble.

The history of the last three years is pregnant with historic facts. Shall we carelessly read its lessons and cast it unheeded by? Have not compromise and conciliation proven a failure? Has not kindness reverberated in lacerating stripes upon our backs? Do not the ghosts of the murdered dead of rebel vengeance in Louisiana rise up before you to sear your eyeballs? Has not your mercy, shown to an insulting and arrogant foe, returned to you permeated with poison bitter to the taste? Is not the action of Mississippi and Georgia proof enough? "The battle will be fought again, but the seat of war will be the North." This is their own language.

No wild beast crouched behind the foliage of his jungle ever yearned with a greater lust for the munched bone and pulpy flesh of his unsuspecting victim with a more intense thirst than does the rebel of Louisiana yearn for the destruction of this Government and for the spoils and emoluments of office. Does any sane man doubt that had the impeachment of Andrew Johnson been effected that one tenth of the crimes, murders, or self-asserted superiority of the rebels of Louisiana would have been committed? To this failure may be attributed and traced all the horrid, blood-stained history of Louisiana. I am satisfied that I express the sentiments of every loyal heart in Louisiana when I say that to the election of General Grant loyal men in Louisiana owe their lives as well as their privilege to reside there. What we want in Louisiana is a republican form of government, in its fullest, broadest sense and meaning. We want security for life and liberty and property; we want the late election investigated, and its whole catalogue of crime held up to the gaze of the world; we want peace and security—a desideratum which elections have failed to supply; we want our confidence in the General Government fostered and preserved by protection; we want the fourteenth constitutional amendment enforced in the South. To do this will cost less than our expensive Indian wars, and its complete vindication is of vastly more value to the nation.

Mr. Speaker, vacillation is dangerous; weakness is manifest defeat. There is but one hope left to the loyalist of the South, and that hope is in the manly, unflinching, aggressive policy of Congress. Away, then, with conciliation and compromise; this Congress should have nothing to do with it. The life of every man is secured by constitutional guarantees. This Congress would not hesitate to declare war against any European Power for an infringement upon an American citizen's rights; then why not protect the humblest citizen at home? He is as much entitled to it as the most exalted. If the laws prevent this protection they are foreign to the spirit and reason of our institutions, and should be repealed. A republic or any Government which cannot protect its citizens does not deserve the name of government and should be blotted from the map of nations. Let us legislate so as to secure to each his rights; and if the fundamental laws of the country hedge us in and bar us, let us rise above them. Centralize the Government, if need be, but secure to each and all life, liberty, and a fair chance.

Constitutional Amendment.

REMARKS OF HON. M. WELKER,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 30, 1869,

On the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WELKER. Mr. Speaker, I would very much have preferred the amendment proposed by my colleague [Mr. SHELLABARGER] to that of the Judiciary Committee. That of my colleague, and for which I voted, was as follows:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall deny or abridge to any male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years or over, and who is of sound mind, an equal vote at all elections in the State in which he shall have such actual residence as shall be prescribed by law, except to such as have engaged or may hereafter engage in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, and to such as shall be duly convicted of treason, felony, or other infamous crime.

But a majority of the House thought otherwise and refused to amend the original proposition. I will now vote for the amendment of the committee, which is as follows:

The right of any citizen of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of the race, color, or previous condition of slavery of any citizen or class of citizens of the United States.

This proposition simply prohibits all distinction between voters on account of color, race, or previous condition of slavery, and makes throughout the United States a uniform rule in that respect. Negro suffrage is no new question in this country. It is as old as our Government. The old Articles of Confederation allowed it. In their adoption an attempt was made to confine voting to white men, and the proposition only received the vote of two States for it to eleven against it. I believe all of the original States, in some form or other, allowed slavery. Of these original thirteen States, ten of them allowed negroes to vote under their constitutions, to wit: Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New York, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and North Carolina. South Carolina, Virginia, and Georgia never allowed it. This voting was confined to free colored men—slaves were not allowed the privilege. The ordinance of 1787, that gave freedom and free institutions to the great West, allowed it. Four of the old thirteen States have, through all the persistent efforts of the advocates of slavery, the terrible contests for its nationalization, continued to this day to give the ballot to the negro. These are New York, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island. The other States, at different times, changed their constitutions so as to prohibit this class of voters. Connecticut, for a period of thirty-one years, allowed them to vote, until 1818, when her constitution was changed to prevent it. Maryland, for fifty-five years allowed it, until 1831, when her constitution was amended prohibiting it. Delaware, for the same period, allowed it. North Carolina, in 1836, amended her constitution to prevent it, after allowing it for sixty-one years. Pennsylvania changed her constitution in 1838, inserting the word "white" in the suffrage part of her organic law, having allowed colored men to vote for sixty-two years. New Jersey, in 1840, changed her constitution to disqualify this class of voters, after having, for sixty-four years, allowed them to vote. Several of the States afterward formed allowed negroes to vote.

It is said that our fathers made this a "white man's" Government. It is not so written in the Constitution they made us. It nowhere confines the ballot to white men. Indeed, the delegates that made it were voted for by negroes. It nowhere makes color a qualification for office. It does not prevent a colored man from being elected to the office of President, Vice President, Senator, or member of Congress, or holding any office in the Federal judiciary, or representing our Government in foreign countries.

Our fathers made this for a free Government, one to which the prosecuted and downtrodden of the world might come and find secure asylum and equal rights. It was made by the people and for the people. The Declaration of Independence had announced the grand doctrine uttered by Paul and Peter centuries before, "that all men are born equal and possess certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." This declaration had been maintained through the great struggle that established on foundations of rock the great temple of liberty in the New World. Its deepest and broadest foundation was this equality of rights. On this was erected the grandest structure of Government the world had ever seen.

In England, France, Prussia, Italy, and other countries in which the ballot is given its citizens color is not made a test of voting—no distinction is made on account of color. In fifteen States of this Union, and in all the Territories, negroes are now allowed to vote. With this history of colored suffrage before us—these precedents of our fathers to guide us—let us now make the right uniform in all the States, and thus make this Government what it was intended to be by the patriots who made it, and secure to all men equal and exact justice. Why not now give the ballot to the colored man? He is free, and a citizen with us of a common country. In the late terrible contest for the life of the nation two hundred thousand black men went forth to fight for the Government that made them free. On every battle-field they freely offered up their lives that free institutions might live—that our country might be saved. No black man deceived us, or proved untrue to the flag. Side by side with the white soldier he marched to the conflict to save the nation. In all the States white and black are alike required to bear equal burdens—pay taxes, which are assessed without respect to color. They are alike punished for crime, and bound to obedience to the law. Let us, then, incorporate this amendment in our Constitution, and secure in all time to men of all races and color this great right of freemen, the elective franchise.

Heald and Wright Frauds on the Choctaw Indians.

SPEECH OF HON. W. MUNGEN,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 3, 1869,

On the Heald and Wright frauds on the Choctaw Indians.

Mr. MUNGEN. Mr. Speaker, some time last session, perhaps in April or May, 1868, it may be earlier than that, the claim of Heald and Wright was before the Committee on Indian Affairs. The honorable gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CLARKE] was instructed by a vote of four to three (there being but seven of the members of the committee present to take part in the matter) to report a bill in favor of the payment of the claim of Joseph G. Heald and Reuben Wright. There were some others connected with the firm, whose names and business it were perhaps better for the claimants should not be mentioned here; but with the consent of the House they will be named. Instead of reporting the bill on this question, as he was instructed by the committee, the gentleman from Kansas on Saturday afternoon, when nearly all the members of the House had gone to their homes, gets the claim of Heald and Wright inserted as an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill, not directly however, but in the form of selling bonds. Such a maneuver, such tactics, speak more for the ingenuity of the gentleman than for any other trait of character. It was a splendid piece of strategy, for which the gentleman deserves the thanks of Heald and Wright and their friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] who so assiduously attended to their claim before the Committee on Indian Affairs. He deserves the thanks of the other partners of the firm, F. E. Williams and Leonard B. Dow, of whom I shall speak hereafter.

Allow me to say that in my opinion such an amendment is entirely out of place in an appropriation bill, is not germane to the subject, has no business there, and, without impugning the motives or honesty of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. CLARKE,] was very adroitly dropped in at a time and place where it was likely to be overlooked. The amendment, instead of being an appropriation, is only a clause allowing certain stocks or bonds belonging to the Choctaw Indians to be sold from them to pay what I believe to be an unjust and "trumped-up" claim of three or four men, all of whose names do not appear on the face of the claim—having examined the matter thoroughly I know of what I speak; and two others, the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] and the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ROSS,] both members of the committee with me, signed the minority report which was laid upon the tables of the members this morning.

The House, I hope, will bear with me while I give a few of many of the very important reasons why this amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas should not prevail.

The amendment proposes to sell certain securities held by the United States under treaty stipulations, in trust for the Choctaw Indians, for the purpose of paying off claims set up by Joseph G. Heald, Reuben Wright, and others, under the forty-ninth and fiftieth articles of the treaty of April 28, 1866, with the Choctaws and Chickasaws.

The Choctaws have two funds of $500,000 each; one derived through the convention between them and the Chickasaws of January 13, 1837, and ratified by the United States, nearly all of which was invested in Virginia State stocks, which if they were to be sold now would have to be disposed of at a ruinous sacrifice. The other fund of $500,000, derived from what has been denominated "leased lands," was never appropriated or invested by the United States Government, but was retained in the Treasury, the United States preferring to pay an annual rate of interest of five per cent. on the amount; that is, $25,000 per annum, equivalent to a perpetual annuity of that amount. An order, therefore, to the Secretary of the Treasury to sell one hundred and eighty or one hundred and ninety thousand dollars under both articles of this fund is the same in effect as to make an appropriation of that sum to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. All these funds have been set apart by the Choctaws and Chickasaws to educational purposes, or made irreducible; and the ninth and tenth articles of the treaty of April 28, 1866, provides as follows:

"ART. IX. Such sums of money as have by virtue of treaties existing in 1861 been invested for the purposes of education shall remain so invested, and the interest thereof shall be applied for the same purposes in such manner as shall be designated by the legislative authorities of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, respectively.

"ART. X. The United States reaffirms all obligations arising out of treaty stipulations or acts of legislation with regard to the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations entered into prior to the late rebellion, and in force at that time, not inconsistent herewith, and further agree to renew the payment of all annuities and other moneys accruing under such treaty stipulations and acts of legislation from and after the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, in the year 1866."

By an examination of the constitution of the Choctaw nation we find in article seven, section six, the following words:

"No money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of an appropriation made by law. No money from the treasury shall be appropriated to objects of internal improvements unless a bill for that purpose shall be approved by two thirds of both branches of the general council."

The treaty articles nine and ten, above quoted, provide that money invested, &c., shall remain in the treasury of the Choctaw nation. They provide that the interest may be used, but only in such manner as shall be designated by the legislative authorities of the nation. If Congress pass this amendment, and take money belonging to the Choctaws out of the funds referred to, it will, in my opinion, be in clear violation of treaty stipulations. The Choctaw nation never having by their Legislature authorized even the appropriation of the interest, and the constitution of the nation being direct in its terms against the reduction of the principal of those funds, and the Government of the United States being bound by the treaty of April 28, 1866, to see that moneys invested and the interest thereof, &c., shall be applied for the same purposes, "in such manner as shall be designated by the legislative authorities of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations respectively," I cannot consent to this appropriation of the fund as proposed by the amendment.

Under the solemn treaty stipulations referred to I doubt very much whether Congress has any right by legislative action to disturb these trusts. The treaty of 1866 makes provision for the settlement of large claims—claims by which it is expected that considerable sums of money would be paid by the United States to the Choctaws and Chickasaws, much more than enough to meet all their liabilities without disturbing these funds so held in trust. The United States voluntarily assumed the guardianship of the Indian tribes, and in exercise of such authority as guardian caused these moneys of the Choctaw nation to be so invested, the interest only to be used or expended for the education of the children and support of the churches and government of the nation. It would be an act of bad faith on the part of the United States, as such self-constituted guardian, to take the moneys of its wards, thus sacredly invested for the promotion of their education and civilization, to pay a claim of doubtful justice, when at the same time the United States is largely indebted to those wards on other accounts in the sum of $300,000.

The fiftieth article of the treaty of 1866 recites that Joseph G. Heald and Reuben Wright "were licensed traders in the Choctaw county at the commencement of the rebellion, and claimed to have sustained large losses on account of said rebellion by the use of their property by said nation," &c., and then proceeds to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate said claims, and to set aside a sum of money not exceeding $90,000 to cover the amount to be allowed by said commissioners, "provided that no claim for goods or property of any kind shall be allowed or paid, in whole or in part, which shall have been used by said nation, or any member thereof, in aid of the rebellion, with the consent of said claimant." The above recital that Heald and Wright were licensed traders at the time of the commencement of the rebellion is incorrect in point of fact. By reference to the records of the Indian Bureau in Washington, it appears that the last license granted to J. G. Heald & Co., (F. E. Williams and Leonard B. Dow being the company,) was dated October 28, 1859, and approved December 7, 1859, and that the last license granted to Reuben Wright was on the 28th day of January, limited by law to twelve months, so that neither of these parties were licensed traders at the commencement of the rebellion, and consequently they were in the Indian country in violation of the intercourse act of 1834, which establishes the rules for all such trading.

Ho. OF REPS.

Heald and Wright Frauds on the Choctaw Indians—Mr. Mungen. 40TH CONG. . . 3D SESS.

Under the fiftieth article of the treaty Messrs. Rice and Jackson were appointed commissioners, and proceeded to Fort Smith, in the State of Arkansas, where they profess to have made the investigation required, and awarded the whole amount of $90,000 to Heald and Wright. I find that Messrs. Rice and Jackson made no such investigation as was contemplated by the fiftieth article of the treaty. The facts appear to be that several gentlemen of the Choctaw nation, sent here to negotiate the treaty under which the claim is made, and for that purpose and clothed with that authority only, and previous to the ratification of the treaty, agreed that the nation was indebted to the claimants, Heald and Wright, in the sums claimed, and on account of the items set out in their respective accounts an agreement which they were not authorized to make. These gentlemen excuse themselves to their nation for making such by asserting that but for such admission they feared that what political influence Messrs. Heald and Wright could control, with their very particular friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] at their head, would be used to their injury in their pending negotiations with the United States.

Messrs. Rice and Jackson, doubtless honestly misled by the belief that such admissions were conclusive under the treaty, adopted them as evidence; and so far as I can ascertain the only further evidence they took or looked for under their commission was to show the items of their award to Hon. Allen Wright, one of the gentlemen who first made the admission, and had in the mean time been elected principal chief, and to John Page, another of the gentlemen who first made the admission before the making of this treaty. They took no testimony as to the alleged loyalty of Messrs. Heald and Wright, or as to the correctness of any item in their account against the nation. And thus was their award made. The Secretary of the Interior was induced to ratify the award made by Messrs. Rice and Jackson through representations that the Choctaws were satisfied and made no objection to the award. This is the reason given by the Secretary, and I doubt not given sincerely, but the fact is that the Choctaw council entered a solemn protest against the whole proceedings of Commissioners Rice and Jackson so soon as they became cognizant of the fact that an award had been made against them, a certified copy of which I have obtained from the Indian office here, and read as follows, and is hereby made a part of my remarks:

Whereas a commission by the authorities of the United States did convene in the city of Fort Smith, Arkansas, in the month of September last, 1866, in compliance with the forty-ninth and fiftieth articles of the late treaty concluded and signed in the city of Washington on the 28th day of April, 1866, to investigate the claims of the loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, and Joseph G. Heald and Reuben Wright, of Massachusetts, as provided in said articles; and whereas it appears from the report of the parties engaged in the defense that fraudulent claims to a very large amount were presented and established against the national funds of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, upon the testimony of persons actuated by corrupt and mercenary motives; and whereas the convening of the court of commission beyond the limits of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations was a hardship to the defendants, as well as unusual in practice to parties litigant to go beyond their limits to adjudicate their differences; Therefore,

SECTION 1. Be it resolved by the General Council of the Choctaw Nation assembled, (the Chickasaw nation concurring.) That a solemn protest is hereby presented to the honorable Secretary of the Interior against the confirmation of the awards recommended by the said commission for the reason before stated; and further reason, that the hurried course of examination adopted by the commissioners gave the nation no chance to introduce rebutting testimony, nor to offer any legal remedy before the said court of commissioners. Hence they respectfully refer the final consideration of their interest to his honor, soliciting further indulgence to prepare a series of depositions under the supervision of the United States agent for the Choctaws and Chickasaws, in order to correct as far as practicable the wrong done to the defendants.

Resolved, further, That General Rice, one of the commissioners on the part of the United States, and Captain Campbell Leflore, junior counsel on behalf of the Choctaw nation, did agree "that testimonies might be taken by the defense and be considered as proper evidence by said commissioners upon cases already reported, and that such testimonies be taken in the presence of the United States agent, who shall certify that the same has been taken according to the usual rules of taking evidence;" therefore this nation, being a party interested, respectfully request the honorable Secretary of the Interior to favorably respond to the solicitation of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations.

And be it further resolved, That the principal chief of this nation be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to transmit a certified copy of the above resolution of the Secretary of the Interior, through the proper channel of communication with the Government of the United States, accompanied with such report and suggestions as he may deem necessary to make, to the effect that the claims made under the forty-ninth and fiftieth articles of the treaty above mentioned be suspended until this nation shall have further time to introduce rebutting testimony.

APPROVED, December 21, 1866.

ALLEN WRIGHT, P. C. C. N.

I do hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy from the original in the office of the national secretary, this 22d day of December, A. D. 1866.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS, March 25, 1868.

I certify on honor that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of an act of the general council of the Choctaw nation, approved December 21, 1866, relative to the forty-ninth and fiftieth articles of the treaty with the Choctaws and Chickasaws of April 28, 1866, as appears from the records in this office.

CHARLES E. MIX, Chief Clerk.

This protest of the general council of the Choctaws was entered on their journals on the 21st day of December, A. D. 1866. The report of Messrs. Rice and Jackson as commissioners under the treaty was filed in the Indian Office at Washington on the 31st day of December, 1866, ten days after the protest; and on the same 31st day of December, the Choctaws placed the foregoing protest, being an official transcript from their journals, on file in the Indian office here. There was no delay on their part, no neglect, no assenting to the payment of the claim of Heald and Wright, and the Secretary of the Interior must have approved the report made by Rice and Jackson without knowledge of the existence of the Choctaw protest. But beyond the treaty stipulations and legislative authorities resting upon the Government in regard to the funds of those Indians in a plain and direct manner there are other questions which should engage the attention of Congress and weighty reasons against the passage of the proposed amendment. It is certainly competent for Congress when called upon to appropriate money to inquire what the appropriation is for, whether it is just and equitable, whether there is any fraud attaching to the matter if it be a claim, and all the surrounding circumstances. It may be unnecessary to say that fraud vitiates all contracts. I propose to call the attention of Congress to some facts connected with this case.

On the 8th of April, 1858, as appears by the records in the Indian office, Joseph G. Heald entered into partnership with F. E. Williams and Leonard B. Dow to engage in the business of merchandising in the Choctaw country. This partnership was limited to three years and expired on the 8th day of April, 1861, which was previous to the commencement of the rebellion. By the terms of their partnership each of them agreed to put in $4,000, making their whole capital in trade $12,000. Heald sets up a claim against the Choctaws of $90,000 for himself alone, saying nothing about his partners, Williams and Dow; presuming, doubtless, that his loyalty would not be questioned because he hails from Massachusetts. He may have entertained the idea that their joint interests, whatever claim they might set up, would be covered and protected under his name in this behalf.

Let us next examine upon what the claims of Messrs. Heald and Wright are founded. The largest item in the account of Heald against the Choctaw nation is for the sum of $40,000 for a draft drawn by Sampson Folsom in favor of L. S. Lawrence & Co., bankers, of New York, on E. W. Lehman & Brother, of Philadelphia, and drawn in the summer of 1862, more than a year after the commencement of the rebellion, and drawn, too, in the Choctaw nation.

The history of this transaction is, that one F. E. Williams, before that time a partner of Mr. Heald in the business in the Choctaw nation, finding that Sampson Folsom was agent and attorney for Samuel Garland and others, of the Choctaw nation, to whom the gold (about thirty-three thousand dollars) belonged, proposed to purchase it of him and pay him in confederate notes or money or lands of the confederate States. After considerable negotiation Folsom gave Williams the draft or order for the gold, and he paid for it in the confederate currency. He had it drawn in favor of Lawrence & Co., but some man named Johnson, sharper or more fortunate than himself, connected with the house of Lehman & Brother, got it and kept it to this day. Mr. Heald, assuming the whole transaction to have been for his benefit, charges the Choctaw nation $40,000 for the failure. In this he implicates himself in purchasing gold with confederate money. Where did he get it? I cannot conceive that such a transaction entitles Mr. Heald to very favorable consideration at the hands of this Congress. The very moment he seeks to derive a benefit from such "illegal trafficking with the enemy" he makes himself liable as the guilty agent, and cannot say that Mr. Williams or Mr. Lawrence were the guilty parties, and not he. If Heald had any interest whatever in this transaction it does not appear from the evidence. I am therefore forced to this conclusion:

1. That this draft transaction was with individuals, and not with the nation as such, and that no valuable consideration was paid for the draft.

2. That such a transaction was in violation of the law of the land, and no benefit sought to be derived from it should be enforced by Congress.

I can find nothing in this transaction to sustain a claim for "money advanced to the nation," and look upon it as entirely a private speculating transaction on the part of F. E. Williams or Heald. The "chances of war" prevented it from paying, and we cannot see that this Congress should make it pay Mr. Heald by converting confederate State bonds and notes, furnished by rebels to his emissaries and agents in violation of law and morality, into current funds of the United States for his benefit. The act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes and to preserve peace on the frontier in the fourth section provides—

"That any person, other than an Indian, who shall attempt to reside in the Indian country as a trader, or to introduce goods or to trade therein without license, shall forfeit all merchandise offered for sale to the Indians so found in his possession, and, moreover, forfeit and pay the sum of $600."

The twenty-fourth section provides for the arrest by military force of any person violating any of the provisions of the act. Section twenty-six provides that offenders of this provision of the act may be arrested in any of the States or Territories of the Union. Section twenty-seven provides for actions and proceedings against the parties violating the provisions of the act, and section twenty-eight provides for proceedings against the property of offenders.

How can violators of the law come here and ask Congress to pay them for their illicit, not to say disloyal traffic? Section seven of article seven of the constitution of the Choctaw nation contains these words:

"No law shall ever be passed to raise a loan of money upon the credit of this nation for the payment or redemption of any loan or debt, unless such law be proposed in the senate or house of representatives, and be agreed to by a majority of each house and entered on their journals, with the yeas and nays taken thereon, and be referred to the next succeeding general council, and published throughout the nation for three months previous to the next general election," &c.

Nothing of this kind was ever done in this case; no loan was ever authorized by the nation from Heald. A people so jealous of and so completely guarded by the provisions of their fundamental law in regard to borrowing money never asked a loan from Heald, as pretended. Another item in the account of Heald is for sixty-two bales of cotton alleged to have been at Sculleyville, in the Choctaw nation, in 1861 or 1862. How came Mr. Heald to be the owner of cotton there, and in those years? Did he raise it or did he buy it? He claims to have been a loyal citizen and resident of Massachusetts at the time. I am of the opinion that if there were any cotton at Sculleyville in those years it belonged to some person other than Mr. Heald, perhaps to his late rebel partner, Mr. Dow, or his blockade-running agent and also late partner, Mr. F. E. Williams, who may have expended his confederate bonds in its purchase. If Mr. Heald had his cotton there at the commencement of the rebellion in 1861 what prevented him from sending it to market? All these things present themselves to my mind and force upon me the conviction that the claim is a fraud and an outrage upon the Choctaw nation. It bears the stamp of fraud on its face.

The next largest item is for a mill and machinery claimed to be owned by Heald at Sculleyville, in the Choctaw nation. The proof shows that this machinery was removed by United States officers to Fort Smith, Arkansas, and set up in the Government workshop there, and that the Choctaws never injured it in any way whatever.

There is strong reason to believe that the mill in question never was owned directly nor remotely by either of the noble quartette, Heald, Wright, Williams, or Dow; but was, in fact, the property of the confederate general, Albert Pike, or of the confederate government. In either case Heald or his partners had no right to the mill, nor have they any right to set up any claim here for damages. If they claim any right by purchase from the confederate government or from a confederate officer during the rebellion it is void, and the transaction should brand them as traitors to this Government.

There is strong reason to believe, however, that the saw-mill was returned by our Government to Heald and Wright, or some other one of the firm, and by some one of them, I believe Mr. Heald, sold to one J. K. Kennedy for some six thousand dollars, and that he is still running the mill at Fort Smith. At all events, the mill is still at Fort Smith, still sawing, and is yet the property of J. K. Kennedy, or was his at last accounts. No matter how this is, one thing is certain, that if Heald, or Heald & Wright, or Heald, Wright & Co., or Heald, Williams, Dow & Wright, or any or either or all of them are entitled to anything, the proof shows clearly that it is the United States, and not the Choctaw nation, to whom he or they should look for compensation. Other items in the accounts of Mr. Heald or Heald & Wright are for debts due by individual Indians, on account of goods sold them on credit, and running through the various years during which those gentlemen were licensed and unlicensed traders in the Choctaw country. It is almost if not quite certain that many of these charges are against Indians who were in the confederate service with the guilty knowledge of some of the firm and claimants now here as "Heald & Wright, of Massachusetts."

I have seen no evidence in their report to warrant Messrs. Rice and Jackson in allowing such demands against the Choctaw nation. Those here representing the Choctaws assert that Heald and Wright favored the rebel cause; that Wright readily furnished supplies to the rebel troops; and that if any connection still existed between Heald and Williams and Dow the concern was actively engaged in transactions with the rebel authorities in the years 1861 and 1862.

The claimants, Heald and Wright, although they knew this was charged against them during the pendency of this claim heretofore, have produced nothing to controvert this assertion, but, on the contrary, all their associations, and the written evidence produced, pretty conclusively establish the fact charged against them.

There is no doubt but that Heald was well informed as to the gold deposited in Philadelphia; and as things then were, it is evidence that all parties supposed it would be confiscated by the Government should its place of deposit be discovered.

Had Heald been the loyal man he claims to have been why did he not give information to the Government so that the gold could have been discovered? It was well known that the officers of the Government were endeavoring to discover this deposit at the very time Williams was endeavoring to purchase it and Heald was engaged in covering it up. Wright has not denied the charge that he furnished supplies to the rebel troops, nor is it denied that Dow, one of the partners of Heald & Co., was in the rebel service. The Choctaws deny that their treasurer ever borrowed any money of Joseph G. Heald. He had no right to do so without an act of the council of the nation authorizing such a loan.

The Choctaws therefore object to the proposed sales of stocks or bonds held and assumed as trusts for their benefit by the United States on the ground, first, that the terms of the treaty and obligations assumed by the Government do not authorize it; and second, that all or very nearly all of the claims set up by J. G. Heald and Reuben Wright are fraudulent and not covered by the terms of the fiftieth article of the treaty of April 28, 1866, and were in violation of the intercourse act of 1834.

In this view of the matter I concur, for I do not see how the United States can sell these funds without a violation of the trust assumed by them for the benefit of the Choctaws, and I am also satisfied that a great imposition has been practiced on the Government and on the Choctaws by the parties setting up these claims, and that they were acting in violation of the intercourse law.

It is proper to call attention again to the fact that the Indian tribes sustain the relation of wards to the Government, and they are therefore entitled to the benefit of all the moral as well as legal obligations which attach to that relation. One of the most obvious of these obligations or duties on the part of the guardian, which in this case is the Government, is that of protecting against wrong if attempted to be perpetrated by others, and a fortiori to abstain itself from the commission of wrongs. In this particular case this double duty rests upon the Government, in the first place to protect the Choctaws against claims set up against them which they have had no fair opportunity of contesting, and in the second place to preserve funds held in trust which have been solemnly devoted to the purposes of education or otherwise.

The grounds upon which the amendment is urged is, that the "Choctaw nation agreed to pay the amount," and that the bill only provides for the manner and means of payment. The only evidence of such facts, as I understand the question, is the statement of Messrs. Rice and Jackson in their report that Allen Wright, principal chief of the Choctaw nation, and John Page, a citizen of the nation, examined the claims of Heald and Wright, and admitted they were just and should be paid. I understand the Choctaw nation to have a written constitution and laws and a representative form of Government; and upon an examination of the constitution and laws can find no authority in the principal chief or Mr. Page to confess judgment against the nation. I have been furnished with no law making them attorneys for that purpose, nor have they pretended to produce authority from the Choctaw nation to act as their agents. Besides, it is a fact that Wright was only chief-elect at the time.

It is also contended that the delegates of the Choctaw nation, sent here only to negotiate the treaty of April 28, 1866, allowed the claim of Heald and Wright, and hence it ought to be paid. The Choctaw nation by solemn enactment denied their authority to do so. And the fiftieth article of the treaty under which the claims are set up does not admit of such a construction. If such were the fact, why the necessity of a commission to ascertain the facts?

The only evidence of any allowance or admission of indebtedness on the part of the Choctaw delegation of 1866 is found in the following paper, on file in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Here is the paper:

The Choctaws agree and stipulate to pay to Joseph G. Heald, of Massachusetts, who for many years traded among and befriended them, the sum of $70,288 80 in full of all demands for spoiliations upon his property, and for other reclamations and debts due to him by the Choctaws, which sum shall be paid out of the $300,000 in the event the Choctaws receive the same under the provisions of the third article of this treaty; and in the event they do not receive the same under said article, then to be paid in two annual installments with interest at the rate of five per cent.

The foregoing article, after full consideration, has been approved by us; and we request that it be inserted in the treaty, April 28, 1866.

ALLEN WRIGHT,
JOHN PAGE,
JAMES REILEY,
ALFRED WADE.

Now, these men, if they had any power, only had the power to negotiate the treaty and not the power to settle or allow claims or strike balances. The parties who obtained the names or signatures to the foregoing knew very well the trick they were playing and the advantage they gained if the paper were of any validity. Those who signed the paper will certainly receive the thanks of the Choctaw people, and will long be remembered by them, but I doubt whether they will be employed again in their behalf.

If Messrs. Heald and the other partners rely on this paper, they should be governed by its terms. Under its provisions the amount allowed to be paid, if it were just, is not yet due. The three hundred thousand is by the terms of the treaty held by the United States in trust, to be paid to the Choctaw nation or appropriated otherwise, as events might determine. Until the time when such contingency is to be determined and made certain according to the above agreement, if it be of any force, which I deny, they have no claim against the nation. They can have none until after such contingency has become a certainty. (See article three, treaty of 1866.)

I find no such allowance in favor of Mr. Wright, and the only evidence upon which his claim is based is the fact reported by Messrs. Rice and Jackson, that Allen Wright and John Page said the award in his favor was just and correct.

40TH CONG... 3D SESS.

I do not find a scintilla of evidence taken by the commissioners to establish the fact that Heald and Wright were licensed traders in the Choctaw nation at the commencement of the rebellion; that they were and remained loyal during the war; or that no portion of the articles charged for were furnished the nation or individuals thereof in aid of the rebellion without their consent. These points are very material under the treaty, and their claim must fail without this proof.

It seems manifest to me that the amendment should not pass; that simple justice demands that a new investigation be ordered in accordance with the terms of the treaty; that the Choctaw authorities have proper notice of the time and place of meeting of the commission; that such meeting be held within the limits of the Choctaw country, and at such place therein as the authorities of the nation and the commissioners may agree upon, and that the Choctaw authorities may be permitted to be present at the investigation.

This Government owes the Choctaw nation some fifty thousand or more dollars of an unpaid balance under treaty stipulations exclusive of the $1,000,000 I have mentioned. If the claims of Heald and Wright and their confederates were just it should be paid out of this balance without disturbing the trust funds sacredly held by our Government and dedicated to the purposes of education and civilization—to schools and churches, and made by the most solemn enactments and declarations irreducible. Let us not disturb those trusts and violate the plighted faith of our Government, and disregard the obligations we are under as the guardian of those people.

SPEECH OF HON. BURTON C. COOK,
OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 3 and 4, 1869,

On the bill (H. R. No. 621) to authorize the building of a military and postal railway from Washington, District of Columbia, to the city of New York.

MR. COOK. I presume that it will be admitted by every one that a railroad from this city to New York such as is proposed by this bill would be of very great advantage to the Government and to the public. A single road is now the only means of communication between the political capital and the commercial capital of the nation, between this city and the northern section of the country. Not long since, when this capital was menaced by enemies on every side, we saw how utterly insufficient for the transportation of troops, material of war, and subsistence for the Army to secure the safety of the capital of the nation was this single road; we saw also that it was entirely unsafe to depend upon a single road for the transportation of troops and supplies when that road was liable at many points to be assailed and broken up. It cannot be denied successfully that the construction of an air-line road from this city to New York would be as legitimate an exercise of the power to provide for the common defense as the casting of cannon or the establishment of magazines.

The road is necessary to secure the certain transmission of the mails. It has appeared in evidence before the committee, by the statement of the Postmaster General, that he has not been able to make a contract for the carrying of the mails between Washington and New York upon the conditions prescribed by law, and that the proposition that the railroad corporations forming the continuous line between said cities might refuse to carry the mails of the United States has been frequently stated by the officers of said roads, and the committee see no reason why it is not in the power of the corporation to cut off all railway postal communication between Washington and New York. The construction of the road is necessary to relieve commerce from the burdens imposed upon it by State legislation.

The eighth section of the law of Maryland, passed in 1832, provides that "one fifth of the whole amount which may be received for the transportation of passengers on said railroad by said company during the six months last preceding shall be reserved and paid to the treasurer" of the State of Maryland. It is then provided—

"That the charge for conveying each person the whole distance between the cities of Baltimore and Washington shall not be reduced below the maximum of $2.50 hereinbefore established, unless by the consent of the General Assembly."

It is then provided further:

"That in no case shall the amount received by the State from the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, for the conveyance of each person the whole distance between the two cities, be less than twenty-five cents."

The second section provides for a reduction of fare where there are a certain number of passengers to be carried from one city to the other, and to be returned within three days, in which event the rate of fare is to be reduced, which would be an anomaly now in railroad fares; but the section concludes:

"Provided always, That one fifth of all such passage money so received be accounted for and paid into the State treasury as aforesaid."

The law of New Jersey chartering the Camden and Amboy railroad provides:

"That from and after the completion of the said road or roads it shall be the duty of the treasurer of the said company, under oath or affirmation, to make quarterly returns of the number of passengers and the number of tons of goods, wares, and merchandise transported on said road or roads to the treasurer of this State for the time being, and thereupon to pay to the said treasurer of the State at the rate of ten cents for each and every passenger, and the sum of fifteen cents for each and every ton of merchandise so transported thereon, and that no other tax or impost shall be levied or assessed upon the said company."

We have seen, also, within a few months, that persons passing along the existing route have been violently assailed for their political views and beaten and outraged. I do not say that the road was responsible for this; I do not know whether this was so or not; but I state a historical fact when I say that passengers have been placed in great peril and subjected to gross outrage on account of their political opinions.

But I only propose to state, not to discuss, some of the reasons why an air-line railroad from this city to New York would be of very great public benefit, and to confine my remarks to a discussion of the question whether Congress has the constitutional power to pass this bill. The eighth section of the first article of the Constitution provides—"That Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the several States."

There are some questions arising under this clause of the Constitution that have been so often decided by the Supreme Court, and the construction given so long acquiesced in by every department of the Government, as to have become fixed and settled permanently, and to be no longer open to discussion; and

1. It is settled by judicial definition that the term commerce, as used in this clause of the Constitution, means the interchange of merchandise and the intercourse of persons between two or more States.

2. It is also settled that the power to regulate commerce conferred upon Congress is a power to prescribe rules in conformity with which commerce must be carried on, and extends to the persons who conduct it and to the instruments used.

3. It is also settled that the means used for the transportation of merchandise and of passengers from one State to another are the instruments of commerce. In support of these propositions I cite the case of Cooley vs. The Board of Wardens, 12 Howard, 316, as one of many cases that might be cited.

The commerce among the several States when the Constitution was adopted was limited to a few million dollars. In the year ending March 31, 1867, the value of freight transported by railroad across the State of Illinois alone, from east to west, was $411,000,000. The value of freight transported across the same State by railroad from west to east was $235,000,000.

It cannot be successfully controverted that the immense traffic now carried on between the several States, the interchange of the commodities of such States, and the transit of passengers from one State to another, constitute commerce among the several States according to the strictest meaning of these words as used in the Constitution; and in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, (9 Wheaton, 191,) it was expressly held by the Supreme Court of the United States that wherever "commerce among the States goes the power of the nation goes with it to protect and enforce its rights." That at this day railroads extending from one State to another are the instruments of commerce among the States cannot be questioned, and if the power to regulate commerce among the several States extends to the instruments of commerce as settled by the Supreme Court in the case of Cooley vs. The Board of Wardens, (12 Howard, 316,) then the power of Congress to pass this bill cannot be successfully denied.

It is well known that one of the principal reasons which led to the adoption of the Constitution was to rescue commerce from the embarrassments and restrictions resulting from the legislation of so many different States, and to place it under the protection of a uniform law. The debates in the convention show that the national power over commerce was conceded to be of primary importance. Of what avail would it be to prohibit States from imposing any tax or impost upon the commodities of other States passing through it if the State has a right to control the avenues of commerce and to authorize corporations created by the State to impose any tariffs of freight, and place any restrictions upon the commerce of other States that may be for their interest? In either case the power is the same for one State to render others tributary to it in their commercial relations.

A very material and essential object of this power to regulate commerce among the States was the relief of those States which, from their peculiar geographical position, must import and export through other States, from the improper contributions which might be levied upon them by the latter. Were the several States at liberty to regulate the question between State and State, means might be resorted to to load the articles of export and import, during their passage through their jurisdictions, with burdens which would fall with peculiar severity on the citizens of the interior States. Since the adoption of the Constitution the importance of these considerations has greatly increased. A large number of new States have grown up, at a great distance from the seaboard, whose exports and imports are carried mainly over the great lines of railroad. If any State has the right, either directly or indirectly, to collect from the inhabitants of other States passing through it any tax or impost whatever, whether the same be collected directly from the passenger or freight, or from the corporation, in proportion to the number of its passengers or the amount of its freight, and so indirectly from the passenger or freight, or if a State may lay a special tax upon any particular line of road, its passengers, or earnings, different from that imposed on other roads, and in consideration of the payment of such tax may grant to the corporation the right to fix its own charges, and provide by law against the construction of any competing line, a very heavy burden may be imposed upon the people of the interior States, and the relief sought to be secured by the pro-

It is argued with great earnestness that Congress has no right to create a corporation in a State. I grant that this is so, except in cases where the creation of such a corporation is a necessary, or at least a proper means of carrying into effect some one of the powers expressly granted to Congress by the Constitution. If the power to regulate commerce among the several States be one of these powers, if that commerce must be to a very great extent carried on over railroads, to deny to Congress the right, under proper restrictions and limitations, for the benefit of commerce, to create a corporation for the purpose of making that commerce free from the imposts and heavy charges imposed either by individual States or by corporations created by such States, would be to construe the Constitution as if it read thus: "Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce among the several States, subject, however, to the control of each individual State at its pleasure." This is not a case of first impression. The precise point was argued by very eminent counsel and decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Osborn vs. United States Bank, 9 Wheaton, 860, Chief Justice Marshall delivering the opinion of the court, and deciding that Congress has the power to create a corporation in any case where it is a proper instrument to carry into effect any power vested in the Government of the United States. Whether the bank was a necessary agency in carrying out any of the express powers conferred by the Constitution upon Congress may be a matter of argument, but no one can doubt that a railroad between Washington and New York is an agency necessary for the postal, military, and commercial service of the United States.

But it is insisted that Congress has not the right to authorize the taking the land of individuals within the several States. The right of eminent domain existing in the States is qualified by whatever right the Constitution has vested in the United States. The question is: is it necessary or proper, for the proper regulation of commerce among the several States, that a railroad should be constructed between two or more States? If it is, Congress has clearly the power to authorize its construction, and it is believed to be precisely the same exercise of power as would be the improvement by Congress of the navigation of a river running through several States. In both instances it would be the creation of a means of transportation of commerce not before existing, and would require in each case the appropriation of some soil of the State; and yet the power to improve the navigation of the rivers extending from one State to another has long been exercised, and is believed to be unquestionable. The right to authorize the building of bridges across the navigable waters of the country has been repeatedly exercised by Congress, and the exercise of such right repeatedly sustained by the Supreme Court.

It is urged that Congress can pass no law whereby the title to the soil can be divested from the owner and vested in the corporation, and that the power of the Government, uninterruptedly exercised from the beginning, to erect light-houses, forts, arsenals, and dock-yards is derived, not from their authority to regulate commerce, but from the following clause in the Constitution:

"To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress become the seat of the Government of the United States; and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings."

And contending that the consent of the State was by this clause required to the erection of light-houses, dock-yards, and other needful buildings; and it is argued that this is inconsistent with the idea that Congress possessed the power under other grants of the Constitution. The mistake in this argument is evident in not adverting to the real object of the clause in question, which is not to enable the United States to hold lands in the States, but simply to give Congress exclusive jurisdiction over such places as should be purchased with the consent of the States.

The Supreme Court have decided (3 Wheaton, 388) that Congress may purchase land for a fort or light-house and erect such buildings without the consent of the States, but that in such cases the jurisdiction remains with the State, and cannot be acquired by the United States except by a cession.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. COOK. I will.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I would inquire of the gentleman why the several State conventions, preparing constitutions for the respective States, expressly declared the power of eminent domain to be in the States, while the Federal Constitution does not mention that power at all?

Mr. COOK. Because the principle is inherent in every Government to the extent that it is sovereign and need not to be specified.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I am speaking now in regard to the power of the Federal Government to go into a State and appropriate private property for the use of the Government.

Mr. COOK. I will discuss that point at the proper time.

Mr. WOOD. Has the Government of the United States any national sovereignty except what was delegated to it by the States?

Mr. COOK. I suppose the power of the national Government is derived from the people of the United States under the Constitution, and not from the States.

Mr. WOOD. Did not the people when they delegated their authority expressly declare that the powers not directly delegated were reserved to the States and to the people thereof?

Mr. COOK. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOOD. That is all the answer I want.

Mr. COOK. But they also declared that there were certain powers expressly delegated to the United States, and that whatever powers were necessary to carry those delegated powers into execution were also delegated to the national Government.

But, to return to my argument, I was saying when interrupted, that it has been decided by the courts that Congress may purchase land for a fort or light-house, and erect such buildings without the consent of the States. This was actually the case with Fort Niagara, which was held for many years by the United States before the jurisdiction was ceded by the State of New York. There is no power given in the Constitution to the United States to erect light-houses, dock-yards, &c., except the power to regulate commerce. That the power to take private property for public use is given to the national Government may be clearly inferred from the last clause of the fifth article of the amendment of the Constitution: "Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." This is simply a restriction upon the power possessed by the Government of the United States under the Constitution. (Fox vs. State of Ohio, 5 Howard, 484.)

An attempt is made to place a different construction upon the clause in the Constitution which gives Congress power "to regulate commerce among the several States" from that universally given to the clause giving the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and with the Indian tribes. The power to regulate foreign commerce has been always conceded to give the right to build light-houses, dock-yards, and harbors, to open harbors, to deepen the mouths of rivers, and to create avenues of commerce where they did not before exist. Can any one draw a distinction between the right to do this and the right to create new avenues of commerce between two or more States?

Can one State without appeal authorize or forbid at its pleasure the passage of the commerce of another State through its limits by railroad communication? Is the authority of every State over the greater portion of the commerce of the several States superior to that of Congress? By what right can you create a new avenue for foreign commerce if you may not do so for commerce among the several States?

The necessity of the exercise of this power may be seen from the fact that it is in the power of great corporations created by the laws of one State, by the use of controlling capital, to become virtually the owners of connecting lines in other States, and thus to form great trunk lines of communication over which the commerce of the interior States must be carried on, and thus to subject that commerce to such impositions as their own interests may dictate, and thus virtually to "regulate commerce among the several States" by a power wholly unknown to the Constitution, and wholly independent of the people. Nor do I believe that any plan can be devised by which the government of any one State can remedy this evil.

Mr. O'NEILL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COOK. Certainly.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman has said that these railroad corporations chartered by a State are entirely independent of the State. I wish to ask him if they are not bound by the provisions and conditions of the charters granted by the States through which they run?

Mr. COOK. Undoubtedly. But the gentleman has misapprehended the point of my argument. The Erie railway was chartered by the Legislature of the State of New York; but when it acquires control, by means of its capital, over lines of railroad entirely outside of the State of New York, then it is exercising management of railroads over which the State of New York has no control.

Mr. O'NEILL. I do not suppose the gentleman wishes to be understood as arguing that the Erie railway, in the instance he has referred to, is acting under corporate powers given to them by the State of New York.

Mr. COOK. I have been insisting that the power to regulate commerce, which ought to be exercised by Congress, is being exercised by monopolies which are responsible to no one. So far as the Erie railway exercises control of great trunk lines running west, outside of the State of New York, it is not possible for the State of New York to exercise control outside of its limits.

There is another reason, which addressed itself to the committee with some degree of force, why Congress should exercise power to regulate railroads as instruments of commerce. The great lines of railroad west of the Mississippi river, which connect the Atlantic with the Pacific ocean, are being built mainly by means furnished by the national Government; the money which is used in their construction is taken from the common fund belonging to all the States. It is well settled that every highway and all public improvements made by Congress in a Territory, and which the Federal Government has not a right to establish in a State, passes by necessity to the State government when the change from a territorial to a State organization takes place. Congress cannot by legislation for a Territory obtain a power in the future State which it cannot originally exercise without it. This has been frequently decided. The control, therefore, of the Pacific roads can be continued after States are organized along their lines only by the assertion of a power to charter a railway within their limits after their admission.

Such has been the pressing necessity for the exercise of the power to regulate the connection of these roads where they form lines passing through different States that attempts have been made to exercise this indispensable power by authorizing the consolidation of companies chartered by different States. Three or four States get up a new confederation among themselves, under which they attempt to create a corporation by conjoint legislation. What will ultimately be the effect when exigencies occur which call for a legal solution of the difficulties arising from this legislation cannot be foretold. That great confusion has already ensued no one can doubt. What are the powers of a consolidated railroad company whose several charters contain the most conflicting provisions? How can a mortgage be foreclosed upon a railroad in several States? No American court, State or Federal, has jurisdiction beyond the State in which it sits. We see to-day the disgraceful spectacle presented by the Erie railroad war. Gentlemen take a boat in the evening and row themselves and their corporation out of the jurisdiction of the courts. If followed, no tribunal can be found in which can be impleaded more than a fraction of the property and persons concerned. These facts show the necessity of the exercise by Congress of the power conferred by the Constitution to regulate commerce among the several States, a commerce not limited either in fact or by constitutional definition to the navigable waters of the country, but for the most part carried on over the great national highways extending in every direction through the length and breadth of the land.

And where does Congress derive the power to create corporations to build railroads in the Territories? The power is given to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States. These words are no broader or more comprehensive than the words to regulate commerce. "To make needful rules and regulations for," and "to regulate," mean exactly the same thing, and to restrict the power of Congress over the Territories, as it is claimed to be restricted over commerce among the several States, has never been attempted except, perhaps, in the Dred Scott case.

The practical question is can Congress regulate the vast and increasing commerce among the States carried on by means of railways, or must that commerce be regulated by monopolies whose power over such commerce is limited only by the amount of capital at their command? It will be seen that the details of this bill have been framed with care to prevent the creation of fictitious capital stock, to prevent heavy charges, to prevent unnecessary delays; and it is confidently believed that the road can and will be built should this bill become a law, and a speedier, cheaper, and better communication be established between this capital and New York.

In regard to one provision of the bill I will say that I think it is open to amendment. Perhaps it is not sufficiently guarded to prevent a consolidation of the powers granted to this company with those of any other corporation. But I conceive that the great difficulty with the railroad corporations now existing in the country is that the capital stock does not represent the cost of the road, but represents precisely the amount which in the judgment of the directors or those having control of the road is necessary to carry on its operations successfully. When Massachusetts sought, by legislation, to prevent the increase of the capital stock of her railroads, and also the declaring of dividends greater than a specified per cent., the result was that the usefulness of the roads was greatly diminished, the roads doing no more work than was sufficient to earn the specified rate of dividend upon the capital stock. The only way, it seems to me, by which these evils can be guarded against in a measure of this kind is by fixing, as is done in this bill, the maximum rate of fare and tariff of freight. In other words, we say to this company, "You may earn all the money you can; but you must impose no greater charge for passengers or freight than we here specify; you must make the trip in a certain number of hours; you must comply with certain regulations as to the time of starting and arriving." If this bill should become a law it will be found that, so far as the traffic over this road is concerned, the commerce will be effectually regulated for the interest of the public.

Mr. O'NEILL. I am sorry to interrupt the gentleman with another question, but I wish to inquire whether the object the gentleman seeks would not be better accomplished if he would prepare and present to the House a measure to be enacted by Congress as a general railroad law? I think he has shown most clearly the power of Congress to pass a bill of this kind, but if his object is to assert that power, why not urge upon the House the passage of a general railroad law which might extend, if capital could be raised for the purpose, a railroad from the Atlantic to the Pacific?

Mr. COOK. In the first place, the Committee on Roads and Canals were under instruction, if in their opinion Congress had power over this subject, to prepare a bill regulating commerce on railroads, not authorizing the building of roads, but regulating commerce over them. Now, I agree that until some members of the House shall be able to give time and study to this subject, to the exclusion of every other, and shall be furnished with the necessary statistics and other information, it will be impossible for us to adopt such a law as will be fully operative and effectual. To frame, as was contemplated by the resolution of instruction, a general law for the purpose of regulating the running of trains, the connection of roads, the kinds of cars to be used, the precautions against fire and other accidents, &c., is, with the ordinary demands of our legislative duty from day to day, beyond the power of any committee. In the British Parliament commissioners were appointed to examine this class of questions and to report from session to session all the information obtained. Without something of the same kind in this country it will, I think, be impracticable for us to frame such a general law as was contemplated in the resolution instructing the committee. I believe the importance of the subject demands that we should have a bureau of statistics upon the question; that the statistics should be prepared as other important statistics are prepared, by a commissioner, whose attention should be devoted exclusively to this subject.

Now, as to the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL,] "Why not report a general railroad law?" the answer is very evident. Our power to charter a railroad grows out of the necessities of commerce. We must in each individual case decide upon our sworn responsibility as legislators that in our opinion it is necessary for the purposes of free commercial intercourse that a road should be built upon a particular route. I submit that such being the nature and extent of our power, we cannot authorize a general system of railroads, which might extend anywhere at the pleasure of those who might choose to build them.

Mr. TWICHELL. The gentleman says that this bill requires the company to make the through trip within a given time. I wish to know what is to be the penalty in case they do not run through in that time?

Mr. COOK. There is, I believe, a general provision for a forfeiture of the charter in case of any failure to comply with its requirements.

Report of Special Commissioner of the Revenue.

SPEECH OF HON. W. D. KELLEY,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 4, 1869.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's annual message—

Mr. KELLEY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: On the 19th of January the Committee on Printing submitted a resolution to print twenty thousand copies of the report of the Special Commissioner of the Revenue for the use of the House, and one thousand bound copies for the use of the Treasury Department, and though I had no hope of preventing its adoption, I felt constrained to resist the motion and submit the reasons which impelled me thereto as fully as I could in the brief time allowed me by the courtesy of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ELA,] who presented the resolution. I could not hope that the House would refuse to print a report the preparation of which had cost the Government so much money in the pay of the Commissioner and his clerical assistants. What I sought to do was in some measure accomplished; it was to send with the report a note of warning to the country. I then said:

"I hope the resolution reported by the committee will not be adopted. I do not think thereport ought to receive such an indorsement. I do not see how Congress can consistently cast it broadcast over the country. It is a report full of figures, which are so ingeniously selected and marshaled that one might suppose it had been prepared specially to show the pestilent character of that most false and dangerous of all the aphorisms embodied in the English language, namely, that 'figures cannot lie.' They are so culled and marshaled in this report as to lead to conclusions false, delusive, and damaging to our country, and especially unjust to that Congress which has carried the country through the great struggle from which she has just emerged. I do not mean to say that the figures embodied in it are in themselves false; upon that point I do not speak now; but I do mean to say that they are so detached from their correlatives as to lead to conclusions utterly at variance with facts which are notorious and familiar to every gentleman on this floor."

"The gentleman who is announced several times in the report as collecting the statistics and making the calculations has, so far as I know, done his duty fairly; but the Commissioner who selected the material for this report, and prepared and marshaled it, has not done so with a view to letting Congress and the country deduce conclusions from an impartial array of facts, but to sustain a foregone conclusion and advocate a favorite theory of his own, which is, in my judgment, at variance with the true interests of the country."

And again:

"The thesis of the report is that we have since 1860 so legislated that while wealth is accumulating more rapidly than it ever accumulated in any other land or age the poor are steadily growing poorer and the rich richer; that the yawning gulf between poverty and wealth is ever widening in this country, and that the laboring man and his family cannot live as well upon their earnings as they could in 1860."

"The report—and it is voluminous—devotes five or six pages only to the progress of wealth and productive power in this country, but they suffice to show that it is with constantly increasing velocity and momentum. If it be true in that respect, and the laboring people are really becoming poorer daily, we are on the eve of an aristocracy more potent than any that has preceded it, and of a social condition such as the world has never seen. I propose to inquire whether this startling proposition be true. The Commissioner, assuming that his array of facts have established it, says on page 21:

"It has been well said that there can be no true theoretic conclusion which will not be proved by the facts whenever the theory can be applied. We have given the theory of the effects of inconvertible paper money, and we find that the facts prove it. The rich become richer and the poor poorer."

"Not satisfied with this, he says:

"The aggregate wealth of the country is increasing, probably, as rapidly as at any former period; yet it does not follow that there is the same increase in general prosperity. The laborer, especially he who has a large family to support, is not as prosperous as he was in 1860. His wages have not increased in proportion to the increase in the cost of his living. There is, therefore, an inequality in the distribution of our annual product which we must, in no small degree, refer to artificial causes. This inequality exists even among the working classes themselves. The single man or woman, working for his or her support alone, is in the receipt of a rate of wages from which savings may be made equal or greater than ever before, especially in the manufacturing towns, where the price of board is, to a certain extent, regulated artificially by the employer."

"And again, I ask gentlemen to listen to the Commissioner's statement of the condition to which their legislation has reduced our countrymen:

"Unmarried operatives, therefore, gain; while those who are obliged to support their own families in hired tenements lose. Hence, deposits in savings-banks increase, while marriage is discouraged; and the forced employment of young children is made almost a necessity in order that the family may live."

"If this be the condition of our country, do we not, as I have said, perpetrate a fraud when we ask the laboring immigrant to come and dwell among us?"
